PREFACE

TO

THE NEW EDITION.

In the present edition the whole work has been revised; most of the articles formerly contained in the Appendix have been inserted in their proper places in the body of the volume; a considerable number of new articles and headings have been added; and the statistics and other information have been, as far as possible, brought up to date. The services of one of the original authors being no longer available, his place has been taken by the Rev. T. B. Scannell, B.D. The American editor, Mr. T. F. Galwey, and the Rev. Joseph Wilhelm, D.D., have also contributed articles.

PREFACE

TO

THE FIRST EDITION.

THE WORK here submitted to the public is intended to meet a practical want which has long been felt among English-speaking Catholics—the want, namely, of a single trustworthy source of information on points of Catholic doctrine, ritual, and discipline. All existing English works of a similar character—such as Hook's "Church Dictionary," Blunt's "Dictionary of Theology," Blunt's "Dictionary of Sects," &c.—were compiled by Protestants, and it is scarcely possible to turn over ten pages in one of them without meeting with some more or less open attack upon Catholicism. To this censure the "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities," conducted by Dr. Smith and Professor Cheetham, is not open; but the large scale of that work, and the fact of its stopping short at the age of Charlemagne, are sufficient of themselves to prevent it from meeting the need above indicated.

Their Eminences the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster and Cardinal Newman have been pleased to express their approbation of the undertaking. Cardinal MANNING wrote: "I am very glad to hear that it is proposed to publish a 'Dictionary of Catholic Theology and History.' It will supply a great want in our English literature. Such works exist in French and German, but we have nothing worthy of the name." Cardinal NEWMAN, after saying that such a work had been long "a desideratum in our literature," added: "Our doctrines, rites, and history have been at the mercy of Protestant manuals, which, however ably written, and even when fair in intention, are not such as a Catholic can approve or recommend. So much have I felt the need that once, many years ago, I began such a work myself, though I was soon obliged to give over for want of leisure."

The Rev. W. E. Addis, of Lower Sydenham, and Thomas Arnold, Fellow of the Royal University of Ireland, have written nearly the whole work. They are indebted, however, to American contributors for a certain number of articles; to the Very Rev. Father Bridgett, of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, for the article "Redemptorists"; and to the Rev. S. H. Sole, Missionary Rector of Chipping Norton, for the article "Plain Chant." As a rule, the articles on dogma, ritual, the ancient Church, and the Oriental rites, are by Mr. Addis; those on mediæval and modern history, the religious orders, and canon law, by Mr. Arnold. Theological subjects have been regarded chiefly from an historical and critical point of view, and questions of School theology avoided as far as possible. In almost every case the quotations of Scripture are made from the original texts, and not from the Latin Vulgate.

In conclusion, the Authors offer their best thanks to many kind friends who have helped and encouraged them in their labour. Their gratitude is due in a very special degree to the Rev. Father Keogh, of the London Oratory. The office of Censor which he undertook was in itself a tedious one, but besides this, and on points which did not concern him in his official capacity, he furnished the writers with many valuable suggestions and corrections. At the same time it is right to add that the "Nihil obstat" appended by him certifies indeed that the limits of Catholic orthodoxy have been observed, but by no means implies the Censor's personal agreement or sympathy with many of the opinions expressed.

A CATHOLIC DICTIONARY

ABBACOMITES. The abbacomites or abbates milites, count abbots or noble abbots, were lay intruders, to whom courts gave abbacies for pecuniary profit. Thus Bernard, the youngest of Charles Martel's six sons, was lay abbot of Sithiu or St. Quentin. Sons, daughters, wives, &c., were thus benefited before the time of Charlemagne, who, however, effected a reform and made monasteries the seats of schools and literature. In latter days other princes, claiming the right of investiture, reintroduced similar abuses; secular priests were often made commendatory abbots.

ABBESS, from Abbatissa. The superior of a community of nuns, in those orders in which convents of monks are governed by abbots. The dignity of an abbess cannot be traced back so far as that of abbot; it appears to have been first regularly instituted about 591, in the time of Pope Gregory the Great. Regulations touching their election, powers, and rights were gradually framed, and incorporated in the canon law. The electors must, as a general rule, be professed nuns. The age at which a nun can be elected abbess has been variously determined at different times; finally the Council of Trent[1] fixed it at not less than forty years, of which eight should have been passed in the same monastery. The voting is secret; generally a simple majority of votes is sufficient for a valid election, but in the convents depending on Monte Cassino a majority of two-thirds is required. In the case of a doubtful election, the ordinary intervenes, and selects the nun whom he may think most suitable for the office. The benediction of an abbess, a rite generally but not always necessary, may be performed by the bishop on any day of the week. When elected, the abbess has a right to the ring and staff, as in the case of abbots, and to have the abbatial cross borne before her. In certain orders where there were usually double monasteries, one for monks the other for nuns, as in the Brigittines and the order of Fontevrault, the monks were bound to obey the abbess of the related nunnery. An abbess, moreover, could, and often did, possess and exercise large ecclesiastical patronage, subject to the approval of the ordinary. These powers are included within that capacity of ruling and possessing property which every truly civilised state has recognised in woman no less than in man; but when the power of the keys, or even any exercise of authority bordering on that power, is in question, the abbess is no more than any other woman. Thus she cannot, without the bishop's sanction, choose confessors either for herself or for her nuns; nor can she dispense a nun from the obligations of the rule of her own authority, nor suspend nor dismiss her.

ABBEY. A monastery governed by an abbot. [See ABBOT.]

ABBOT. The "father" or superior of a community of men living under vows and according to a particular rule. The transference of the idea of fatherhood to the relation between the head of a congregation or a religious community and his subjects is so natural that already in the apostolic times we find St. Paul reminding the Corinthians[1] that they had not many fathers in Christ ("for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you," &c.), notwithstanding the apparent prohibition in the gospel of St. Matthew.[2] But it was customary to call bishops by the Greek word for father; hence the corresponding designation for the head of a community of monks was taken, to avoid confusion, from the Chaldaic form (abba, abbas) of the word which means "father" in the Semitic languages. In a paper of extraordinary research, but more learned than lucid, contributed by the late Mr. Haddan to the "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities," at least a dozen transitory uses of the word Abbot, in ancient times alone, are enumerated. But these are of little or no importance. The true Abbot, being a natural outgrowth of the Christian doctrine and spirit, comes into sight in the third century, and still fulfils—though under a variety of designations—his original function in the nineteenth. The name imports the rule of others, but as the essential foundation for such rule it implies the mastery of self. The monk was before the abbot. Eusebius has no mention of monks as such in his "Ecclesiastical History;" but when he tells us of persons, male or female, living austere lives and aiming at perfection, when he notes that Narcissus, bishop of Jerusalem at the end of the second century, retired into the desert on account of difficulties arising in his diocese, and lived there for many years as a solitary contemplative, we see already the germs of the monastic life. St. Antony (250–355) is usually regarded as the patriarch of the monks. But if we hear much in his later years of the numbers and the reverent devotion of his disciples, we know that for twenty years after his first quitting the world he lived in nearly absolute solitude, conversing with God and taming his own spirit. The clamours of persons desiring to see him and ask counsel of him forced him at last from his cell; and he, who in conflict with his own lower nature or with evil spirits had attained an unwonted spiritual strength and a vast breadth of spiritual experience, consented now to take upon him the direction of a number of men of weaker will and less regulated mind. If he was to do them any good, they must place themselves in his hands, and do exactly what he bade them. That mastery of the passions, and subjugation of the natural man under the yoke of reason, which he, aided by the Holy Spirit, had worked out for himself, they, following his directions, must win through him. Hence we find the principle of unquestioning obedience—what Gibbon calls the "slavish" spirit of the monks—laid down from the first. St. Pœmen, a famous Egyptian abbot of the fourth century, said to his disciples, "Never seek to do your own will, but rather rejoice to overcome it, and humble yourselves by doing the will of others." And, "Nothing gives so much pleasure to the enemy as when a person will not discover his temptations to his superior or director." Induced partly, no doubt, by the confusions and oppressions of the empire, but chiefly by the haunting thirst to know the secret of the perfect life, and solve the riddle of existence, great numbers of men towards the end of the fourth century sought the deserts that hem in the valley of Egypt, and were formed into monastic communities under abbots. Great captains of the spiritual life arose, such as Pachomius, Hilarion, Pambo, and Macarius. Speaking of the effect produced by Antony in Egypt even in his lifetime, St. Athanasius says: "Among the mountains there were monasteries as if tabernacles filled with divine choirs, singing, studying, fasting, praying, exulting in the hope of things to come, and working for almsdeeds, having love and harmony one towards another." For full information on these "fathers of the desert," the reader should consult the celebrated work of the Jesuit Rosweide, "Vitæ Patrum."

[1] Sess. xxv. c. 7. De Reg. et Mon.

[1] 1 Cor. iv. 15. [2] xxiii. 9.

The status of these early abbots, as of the monks whom they governed, was a lay status. In the great monastic colonies of Palestine and Egypt, each containing several hundreds of monks, there would be but one or two priests, admitted in order to the celebration of the divine worship. But the proportion of ordained monks gradually increased, the bishops being generally glad to confer orders upon men, most of whom were of proved virtue. For abbots ordination before long became the rule: yet even in the ninth century we read of abbots who were only deacons, and a Council of Poitiers in 1078 is still obliged to make a canon enjoining upon all abbots, on pain of deprivation, the reception of priests' orders. The original lay character here referred to must of course not be confounded with the status of those profane intruders described by Beda in his letter to Egbert, archbishop of York, who were rich laymen pretending to found monasteries for the sake of obtaining the exemption from civil burdens which monastic lands enjoyed, and could only be called pseudo-abbots.

The election of an abbot originally rested with the monks, according to the rule "Fratres eligant sibi abbatem." We meet, indeed, with many cases of episcopal intervention in elections, but the right of the monks is solemnly recognised in the body of the canon law. In the West, as the endowments of monasteries increased, temporal princes and lords usurped the right of appointing abbots in the larger monasteries, no less than of nominating bishops to the sees; our own history and that of Germany is full of stories of disputes thence arising. [See INVESTITURE.] At the Council of Worms in 1122 Pope Calixtus obtained from the emperor the renunciation of the claim to invest with ring and crosier the persons nominated to ecclesiastical dignities. The first article of Magna Charta (1215) provides that the English Church shall be free: by which, among other things, the right of monks to choose their own abbots was understood to be conceded. Practically, the patronage of the larger English abbeys for two centuries before the Reformation was divided by a kind of amicable arrangement between the Pope and the king.

St. Benedict (480–543), the patriarch of Western monachism, allows in his rule (which from its greater elasticity superseded other rules which were for a time in competition with it [see BENEDICTINES; RULE, RELIGIOUS]) a large discretion to the abbots of his convents, who were to modify many things in accordance with the exigencies of climate and national customs. Such modifications led of course in time to relaxation, the reaction against which led to reforms. A curious report of the discussion between the monks of Molesme and their abbot Robert (1075), who wished to restore among them the full observance of the rule of St. Benedict, may be read in the eighth book of Ordericus Vitalis. Not prevailing, St. Robert, with twelve companions, left Molesme and founded Citeaux, under a reformed observance. [CISTERCIANS.]

The privileges of abbots grew to be very extensive. They obtained many episcopal rights, among others that of conferring minor orders on their monks. A practice which had arisen, by which abbots exempt from episcopal jurisdiction [EXEMPTION] claimed to confer minor orders even on seculars, was condemned by the Council of Trent.[1] The use of mitre, crosier, and ring was accorded to the abbots of great monasteries; these mitred abbots were named abbates infulati. In England mitred abbots had seats in Parliament: twenty-eight, with two Augustinian priors, are said to have sat in the Parliament immediately preceding the dissolution of monasteries. A remarkable privilege is noticed by Beda,[1] in virtue of which the abbots of Iona exercised a quasi-episcopal jurisdiction in the west of Scotland and the Hebrides.

The name of abbé, abate, has come to be assumed by a class of unbeneficed secular clerks in France and Italy, apparently in the following manner. The practice by which laymen held abbeys in commendam—commenced in troubled times in order that powerful protectors might be found for the monks, and might have inducements to exercise that protection—grew by degrees into a scandalous abuse. Young men of noble families were nominated to abbeys, and could enjoy their revenues, long before they could take priests' orders; they were not bound to residence; and under Louis XIV. and Louis XV. many of these abbés commendataires never saw the abbeys of which they were the titular rulers. The possibility of winning such prizes drew many cadets of noble families, who had only just taken the tonsure, to Versailles; those who had succeeded in obtaining nominations still fluttered about the Court, not being bound to residence; and the name Abbé, which was really, though abusively, applicable to these, came to be applied in social parlance to the aspirants also, whom no external signs distinguished from the real abbés. By a further extension, the name came to be applied as a title of courtesy to unbeneficed clerks generally; just as in England the title "esquire," which is properly applicable only to persons entitled to bear arms, is extended by the courtesy of society to anyone who, as far as outward ma k go, seems entitled to take the same social rank.

Benedictine abbeys, following the general Oriental rule, have always been independent of each other in government; but an honorary superiority was accorded in the middle ages to the abbot of the mother house at Monte Cassino; he was styled abbas abbatum. In other orders various names have replaced that of "abbot;" the head of a Franciscan friary is a "guardianus," that of a Dominican convent a "prior," that of a Jesuit house a "rector." There is a prior also in Benedictine convents [PRIOR], but his normal position is that of lieutenant to the abbot; sometimes, however, he was almost practically independent as the head of a priory, a cell founded by monks migrating from some abbey.

The duties of an abbot in early times may be learned from Rosweide; somewhat later, and in the West, they were defined with great clearness and wisdom in the rule of St. Benedict. A deeply interesting sketch of the manner of life of an English abbot in the seventh century is preserved for us in Beda's "Lives of the Abbots of Wearmouth and Jarrow." Even more trying was his work in the twelfth century, as we know from the narration by Jocelyn de Brakelonde of the government of the abbot Samson at Bury St. Edmunds; with which may be read the striking, and on the whole appreciative, commentary of Mr. Carlyle.[1]

The name corresponding to Abbot in the Greek Church is Archimandrita, or Hegumenos.

ABBREVIATORS. The name given to a class of notaries or secretaries employed in the Papal Chancery. They are first met with about the beginning of the fourteenth century; were abolished in the fifteenth, but afterwards restored. They are generally prelates, and the office is considered one of great dignity and importance. It is not incompatible with Church preferment. The name arose from this, that the abbreviator made a short minute of the decision on a petition, or reply to a letter, given by the Pope, and afterwards expanded the minute into official form. (Ferraris.)

ABJURATION OF HERESY. This is required in the canon law as a preliminary to baptism, or, when there is no question of that (as in the case of converts from the Eastern Church), before the convert makes his confession of faith. There are decrees of several councils to this effect: thus the Council of Laodicea (about 364) ordains that Novatian and Photinian heretics, "whether they be baptised persons or catechumens, shall not be received before they have anathematised all heresies, especially that in which they were held." A celebrated instance of abjuration is that of Clovis (496), to whom St. Remy said before baptising him, "Meekly bow down thy head, Sicambrian; adore what thou hast burnt, and burn what thou hast adored." An early German council requires the Saxon converts to renounce belief in "Thor and Woden and Saxon Odin" before being received into the Church.

Ferraris sums up the canonical requirements in the matter of abjuration as follows:—that it should be done without delay; that it should be voluntary; that it should be done with whatever degree of publicity the bishop of the place might think necessary; and that the abjuring person should make condign satisfaction in the form of penance.

The modern discipline insists mainly on the positive part, the profession of the true faith. Thus in the Ritual of Strasburg (1742) the abjuration required is merely general: "Is it your firm purpose to renounce in heart and mind all the errors which it [the Catholic religion] condemns?" In England at the present time the abjuration is, so to speak, taken for granted in ordinary cases, since converts are not admitted into the Church except after suitable instruction, and the Creed of Pope Pius IV., which everyone desiring to become a Catholic must read and accept, expressly denounces most of those errors which infect the religious atmosphere of this country.

ABLUTION. A name given, in the rubrics of the Mass, to the water and wine with which the priest who celebrates Mass washes his thumb and index-finger after communion. When he has consumed the Precious Blood, the priest purifies the chalice; he then, saying in a low voice a short prayer prescribed by the Church, holds his thumb and index-finger, which have touched the Blessed Sacrament and may have some particle of it adhering to them, over the chalice, while the server pours wine and water upon them. He then drinks the ablution and dries his lips and the chalice with the mundatory. This ceremony witnesses to the reverence with which the Church regards the body and blood of Christ, and to her anxiety that none of that heavenly food should be lost. It is impossible to say when this rite was introduced, but we are told of the pious Emperor Henry II., who lived at the beginning of the eleventh century, that he used when hearing Mass to beg for the ablution and to receive it with great devotion. This ablution is mentioned by St. Thomas and Durandus. The former, however, gives no reason to suppose that it was consumed by the priest, and the latter expressly says that the ablution used formerly to be poured into a clean place. (Benedict XIV. "De Missa," III. xxi. C.)

ABRAHAMITE. [See PAULICIANS.]

ABRAXAS, Ἀβράξας or Ἀβραξάξ.

[1] Past and Present, part ii.

A magical word used by the Basilidians, a Gnostic sect. They believed in the existence of 365 heavens, over which Abraxas presided, the numeral value of the Greek letters which composed the word being 365.[1] Many gems still exist with this word inscribed on them. An account of them and of the immense literature to which they have given occasion, will be found in Kraus' "Archæological Dictionary," under Abraxas.

ABSOLUTION. Classical authors use the Latin word absolutio (literally, unbinding or unloosing) to signify acquittal from a criminal charge, and ecclesiastical writers have adopted the term, employing it to denote a setting free from crime or penalty. But, as crime and its penalties are regarded even by the Church from very different points of view, "absolution" in its ecclesiastical use bears several senses, which it is important to distinguish from each other.

I. Absolution from Sin is a remission of sin which the priest, by authority received from Christ, makes in the Sacrament of Penance. It is not a mere announcement of the gospel, or a bare declaration that God will pardon the sins of those who repent, but as the Council of Trent defines (sess. xiv. can. 9), it is a judicial act by which a priest as judge passes sentence on the penitent.

With regard to absolution thus understood, it is to be observed, first, that it can be given by none but priests, since to them alone has Christ committed the necessary power; and, secondly, that since absolution is a judicial sentence, the priest must have authority or jurisdiction over the person absolved. The need of jurisdiction, in order that the absolution may be valid, is an article of faith defined at Trent (sess. xiv. cap. 7), and it follows from the very nature of absolution as defined above, since the reason of things requires that a judge should not pass sentence except on one who is placed under him, as the subject of his court. This jurisdiction may be ordinary—i.e. it may flow from the office which the confessor holds; or delegated—i.e. it may be given to the confessor by one who has ordinary jurisdiction with power to confer it on others, as his delegates. Thus a bishop has ordinary jurisdiction over seculars, or religious who are not exempt, in his diocese, and within its limits he can delegate jurisdiction to priests secular or regular. Again, the prelates of religious orders exempt from the authority of the bishop, have jurisdiction, more or less ample, within their own order, and they can absolve, or delegate power to absolve, the members of the order who are subject to them; nor is it possible, ordinarily speaking, for the bishop, or a priest who has his powers from the bishop only, to absolve such religious. Moreover, a bishop or a prelate of a religious order, in conferring power to absolve his subjects, may reserve the absolution of certain sins to himself. [See under RESERVED CASES.] The Church, however, supplies all priests with power to absolve persons in danger of death, at least if they cannot obtain a priest with the usual "faculties" or powers to absolve.

Thirdly, absolution must be given in words which express the efficacy of absolution, viz. forgiveness of sin. The Roman Ritual prescribes the form "I absolve thee from thy sins, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Beyond all doubt, the form "I absolve thee from thy sins" would suffice for the validity of the sacrament. But would a precatory form avail—such for example as, "May Jesus Christ absolve thee from thy sins"? The affirmative has been maintained by the celebrated critic Morinus, while Tourneley and many others have followed his opinion. They maintain their contention chiefly by two arguments: viz. (a) that the Sacramentaries, Pontificals, and Penitential Rituals used in the Western Church during the first thousand years after Christ contain only precatory forms of absolution; (β) that such forms have been employed from time immemorial by the Greeks. On the other hand, many even among modern theologians adhere to the opinion of St. Thomas, and insist on the strict necessity of an absolute form ("I absolve thee," &c.). It seems possible to reconcile the two opinions. A precatory form is enough, if it is used in an absolute sense—if, in other words, the circumstances in which the prayer is uttered make it more than a mere prayer. So that the priest, when he says, "Absolve, O God, this man from his sins," means "Absolve this man through my ministry," and intends at the same time to utter a prayer which must needs be granted, provided that the requisite conditions have been fulfilled. Still it must be remembered that in any case it is unlawful to use such a form even in the East, since Clement VIII. in his instruction on the rites of the Greeks, issued 1595, required them to employ the form prescribed in the Council of Florence—viz. "I absolve thee," &c.

Lastly, the form of absolution must be uttered by the priest himself in the presence of the person absolved. This follows as a necessary consequence from the nature of the form of absolution sanctioned by the perpetual tradition of the Church; for the very words, "I absolve thee," imply the presence of the penitent; and the contrary opinion held by some Spanish theologians, who considered that absolution could be validly given by letter or by means of a messenger, was expressly condemned by Clement VIII. in the year 1603.

[N.B. For full information on the proofs from Scripture and antiquity for the Catholic doctrine of Confession and Absolution, see PENANCE, SACRAMENT OF.]

II. Absolution from censures is widely different from absolution from sins, because whereas the latter gives grace, removes guilt, and reconciles the sinner with God, the former merely removes penalties imposed by the Church, and reconciles the offender with her. [See under CENSURES.] It may be given, either in the confessional, or apart altogether from the Sacrament of Penance, in the external forum—i.e. in the courts of the Church. It may proceed from any cleric, even from one who has received the tonsure only, without ordination, provided he is invested with the requisite jurisdiction. This jurisdiction resides, in the case of censures imposed by an individual authority through a special sentence, in the ecclesiastic who inflicted the censure, in his superior, in his successors, and in those to whom competent authority has delegated power of absolution. For example, if a bishop has placed a subject of his under censure, absolution may be obtained (1) from the bishop himself, (2) from a succeeding bishop, (3) from the metropolitan, in certain cases where an appeal can be made to him, or if he is visiting the diocese of his suffragan ex officio, (4) from any cleric deputed by one of the above. With regard to censures attached to certain crimes by the general law of the Church, unless they are specially reserved to the Pope or the bishop, any confessor can absolve from them; and this is generally considered to hold good also of censures inflicted by the general (as opposed to a particular) sentence of a superior. Again, it is not necessary that the person absolved from censure should be present, or contrite, or even that he should be living. As the effects of censures may continue, so they may be removed after death. Excommunication, for instance, deprives the excommunicated person of Christian burial. It may happen that he desired but was unable to obtain remission of the penalty during life, and in this case he may be absolved after his soul has left the body, and so receive Catholic burial and a share in the prayers of the Church.

III. Absolution for the dead (pro defunctis). A short form, imploring eternal rest and so indirectly remission of the penalties of sin, said after a funeral Mass over the body of the dead person, before it is removed from the church.

IV. Absolutions in the Breviary. Certain short prayers said before the lessons in matins and before the chapter at the end of prime. Some of these prayers express or imply petition for forgiveness of sin, and this circumstance probably explains the origin of the name Absolution which has been given to such prayers or blessings.

ABSTINENCE, in its restricted and special sense, denotes the depriving ourselves of certain kinds of food and drink in a rational way and for the good of the soul. On a fasting day, the Church requires us to limit the quantity, as well as the kind, of our food; on an abstinence-day, the limit imposed affects only the nature of the food we take. The definition given excludes three possible misconceptions of the Church's law on this point. First, the Church does not forbid certain kinds of food on the ground that they are impure, either in themselves or if taken on particular days. On the contrary, she holds with St. Paul[1] that "every creature of God is good," and has repeatedly condemned[2] the Gnostic and Manichean error, which counted flesh and wine evil. Next, the abstinence required is a reasonable one, and is not, therefore, exacted from those whom it would injure in health or incapacitate for their ordinary duties. Thirdly, Catholic abstinence is a means, not an end. Abstinence, says St. Thomas, pertains to the kingdom of God only so far "as it proceeds from faith and love of God."[3]

But how does abstinence from flesh-

meat promote the soul's health? The answer is, that it enables us to subdue our flesh and so to imitate St. Paul's example, who "chastised his body and brought it into subjection."[1] The perpetual tradition of the Church is clear beyond possibility of mistake on this matter, and from the earliest times, the Christians at certain seasons denied themselves flesh and wine, or even restricted themselves to bread and water.[2] Moreover, by abstaining from flesh, we give up what is, on the whole, the most pleasant as well as the most nourishing food, and so make satisfaction for the temporal punishment due to sin even when its guilt has been forgiven. [See also FAST and PENANCE (4).]

The abstinence (as distinct from fasting) days to be observed in England are, all Fridays, except that on which Christmas Day may fall, and the Sundays in Lent, though on these last the faithful now receive an annual dispensation from the abstinence. Saturday was an abstinence-day in England, till it ceased to be so in virtue of a Rescript of Pius VIII., in 1830.

It may be of some interest, in conclusion, to trace the history in the Church of abstinence as distinct from fasting. Abstinence-days were observed from ancient times by the monks. Thus Cassian tells us that in the monasteries of Egypt, great care was taken that no one should fast between Easter and Pentecost, but he adds that the "quality of food" was unchanged. In other words, the religious fasted all the year, except on Sundays and the days between Easter and Pentecost. These they observed as days of abstinence. Again, it is certain that the faithful generally did not, and, indeed, could not, fast on Sundays in Lent, for the early Church strongly discouraged fasting on that day; but it is also certain that they did abstain on the Sundays in Lent. For, during the whole of that season, says St. Basil, "no animal has to suffer death, no blood flows." We learn incidentally from Theophanes and Nicephorus, that no meat was exposed during Lent in the markets of Constantinople. The Sundays, then, in Lent were kept in the ancient Church as days of abstinence. With regard to the abstinence-days of weekly occurrence, Thomassin shows that Wednesday and Friday have been from ancient times observed in the East, not only as abstinence, but as fasting-days. Clement VIII., in 1595, in laying down rules for Catholic Greeks under Latin bishops, excuses them from some of the Latin fasts, on the ground that, unlike the Latins, they fasted every Wednesday and Friday. Thomassin illustrates the custom of the West, by quoting a number of statutes, &c., prescribing sometimes abstinence from flesh, sometimes fasting and abstinence, on Friday. His earliest authority is Nicolas I. (858–867), and he concludes, "even after the year 1400, the Saturday abstinence was rather voluntary than of obligation among the laity; but the Friday abstinence had long since passed into a law. I say abstinence, for, in spite of efforts made, the fast was never well established." (See Thomassin, "Traité des Jeûnes," from which the foregoing historical sketch is taken.)

ABSTINENTS. A name given to the Encratites (q.v.), or Manichees, because of their professed abstinence from wine, marriage, &c.

ABYSSINIAN or ETHIOPIAN CHURCH. Tradition relates that the officer of Candace, Queen of Ethiopia, whom Philip the Deacon met and converted near Gaza,[1] on his return home spread the Christian faith among the peoples dwelling on the Upper Nile. But if this were so, the seed then planted must have withered away, for in the middle of the fourth century—when the narrative of Rufinus, in his "Ecclesiastical History," casts a strong light for us on Abyssinian affairs—the zeal of Athanasius appears to have raised up a church in an absolutely heathen land. Frumentius of Tyre, the apostle of Abyssinia, first visited the country, when a mere youth, in 316; his uncle, with whom he travelled, was murdered by the natives: he was himself brought up as a slave in the court of Axum; but his virtue and intelligence led to his being enfranchised; and in his person Christianity, to which he had strictly adhered, appeared attractive. Repairing to St. Athanasius, then recently raised to the patriarchal chair of Alexandria, Frumentius was consecrated by him the first bishop of his adopted country. When he returned, the king and his people willingly received baptism. He chose Axum for his see; and this place remains to this day the official centre of Abyssinian Christianity. As the work of conversion proceeded, this see became the residence of a Metropolitan (abuna, father), having under him seven suffragans. The name and rank of "Abuna" are still retained, but the seven suffragans have disappeared.

The bright promise of this commencement was soon overclouded. An effort, indeed, of Constantius to introduce Arianism failed; but when, in the fifth century, Alexandria, along with the majority of the Eastern churches, rejected the decrees of Chalcedon, and the patriarchate became Monophysite, the Abyssinians followed in the wake of their mother church, and they have never unanimously, or for long together, shaken off the heresy down to this day. In the sixth century the country was the object of a religious rivalry between Justinian and the Empress Theodora, the former wishing to attach it to the Roman Church, the latter to preserve it for her Monophysite friends at Alexandria.[1] The empress, aided by the popular sympathies, prevailed; and the Abyssinian church, cut off from true Catholic communion, and severed from the chair of Peter, became in the course of ages the strange, unprogressive, semi-pagan institution which modern travellers have described. Thus, although never persecuted for the faith like the Irish and the Poles, the Abyssinians allowed its lustre to be tarnished and its moral fruits to pine and wither, through casting off that vitalising communion with the Holy See which has kept alive the Irish and Polish nationalities in the face of secular persecution.

In the seventeenth century, Abyssinia having been almost an unknown land to Europe for a thousand years, it was entered by Portuguese Jesuits, whose preaching was attended for a time by marked success. Two emperors in succession became Catholics; a Jesuit was nominated patriarch of Æthiopia, and an outward reconciliation with Rome was effected. But the masses of the people remained uninfluenced, and their hearts still yearned towards Egypt; the patriarch Mendez is said to have acted imprudently in attempting to abolish the rite of circumcision;[2] the second Catholic emperor died, and his son expelled the Jesuits, and restored the connection with Alexandria. After a long interval of exclusion, Catholic missionaries have again entered Abyssinia in our days, and flourishing congregations have been formed in the northern and north-eastern districts, near Massowah.[3] In 1875, Monsignor Touvier, stationed at Keren, was Vicar Apostolic of the whole country. About that time missioners were sent into Amhara, the most important province, with the best results. "The sending of missioners into Amhara," wrote M. Dutlos, in June 1875, "so often criticised, is now justified by the immense results which it has produced."

The Abuna, or head of the Abyssinian church, is always an Egyptian monk, nominated by the Patriarch of Egypt. The cross is held in honour by the Abyssinians, but the use of the crucifix is unknown. They tolerate paintings in their churches, but no sculptured figures. Their priests can marry once only, as in the Greek church. There is considerable devotion to the Blessed Virgin, but, along with this and other Christian characteristics, various superstitious beliefs and practices are rife among them, to the great detriment of their morals and intellectual advancement.

ACCIDENT. [See EUCHARIST, I. (γ).]

ACCLAMATION. The elevation to an ecclesiastical dignity by the unanimous voice of the electors, without voting. This is one of the three modes in which a Pope may be elected, and the election is said to be per inspirationem, because "all the Cardinals, with a sudden and harmonious consent, as though breathed on by the Divine Spirit, proclaim some person Pontiff with one voice, without any previous canvassing or negotiation, whence fraud or insidious suggestion could be surmised." (Vecchiotti, "Inst. Can." ii. 10.)

ACCOMMODATED SENSE. If we quote Scripture to prove a point of doctrine, we must of course try to ascertain the precise meaning of the sacred writer, and then argue from the proper sense of his words. We may, however, take the words of Scripture and make an application of them which was not originally intended. In other words we may accommodate the sense to the needs of our own discourse or the subject we wish to illustrate. Thus when Baronius said of his unaided labour in compiling his ecclesiastical Annals, "I have trodden the wine-press alone," he used the words of Isaias in an accommodated sense. This practice is innocent in itself, as is shown by the example of our Lord (Matt. iv. 4), and of St. Paul (Acts xxviii. 25–28), and is frequently adopted by the Church in the Missal and Breviary.

ACEPHALI. In the year 482 the Greek emperor Zeno issued his "Henoticon," in order to reunite the Monophysites with the Church. The heretical leaders—e.g. Peter Mongus, Patriarch of Alexandria—were ready to accept the emperor's terms, but many of the heretics were more obstinate, and so were nicknamed "headless" (ἀκέφαλοι).

ACŒMETI (sleepless). A name given to Eastern monks who maintained perpetual prayer, day and night. Each monastery was divided into three or more choirs, which relieved each other. This institute is said to have been introduced by Abbot Alexander, in a monastery on the Euphrates, at the beginning of the fifth century; but their most famous house was that of Studium, in Constantinople. It was founded and endowed by the Roman Studius, from whom it took its name. In 533 the Acœmeti attacked a formula used by other monks—"One of the Trinity suffered in the flesh"—and tried to procure its condemnation by the Holy See. In this they failed; they themselves fell into Nestorianism, and the formula was approved by Pope John II., and under anathema by the Fifth General Council.[1]

ACOLYTE, from ἀκολουθέω, to follow; and here, to follow as a server or ministrant: a name given to the highest of the four minor orders. It is the duty of the acolyte to supply wine and water and to carry the lights at the Mass; and the bishop ordains him for these functions by putting the cruets and a candle into his hand, accompanying the action with words indicating the nature of the office conferred. The order of Acolyte is mentioned along with the others by Pope Cornelius[2] in the middle of the third century. Their ordination is mentioned in an ancient collection of canons commonly, though wrongly, attributed to the Fourth Council of Carthage.[3] The functions of acolytes are now freely performed by laymen, though the order is still always received by those who aspire to the priesthood.[4]

ACTION. (1.) A word used for the Canon of the Mass. Thus infra actionem, in the rubrics of the Missal, means "within the Canon." Probably, the literal sense of "action" in this case is sacrifice.

(2.) The treatment of a particular subject in the session of a council. (Kraus, "Archæol. Dict.")

ACTS OF THE MARTYRS. "Acta" is technically used in Latin (1) for the proceedings in a court of justice, and (2) for the official record of such proceedings, including the preliminaries of the trial, the actions and speeches of the contending parties, the sentence of the judge; which last, when it had been committed to the Acta, was proclaimed aloud by the public crier. "Acta martyrum," then, in its strict and original sense, meant the official and registered account of a martyr's trial and sentence. Naturally enough, the early Christians were anxious to possess these accurate narratives of the witness which their brethren made to the truth of the Christian religion. In some cases, as appears from the Acta of St. Tarachus in Ruinart, they were able by means of a bribe to get a copy of the official document. This, however, could not always be done, and the want was supplied sometimes by accounts of his trial written by the martyr himself and supplemented with the history of his "passion" or suffering from the hands of those who had witnessed it; sometimes by accounts which proceeded entirely from friends of the martyr; sometimes, lastly (as in the Roman Church), notaries were appointed for the special purpose of setting down the incidents of the martyrdom in documents meant for public use in the Church. Thus the expression "Acta martyrum" came to be used in a more extended sense for any account of a martyr's confession and death.

A vast number of original Acts perished in the year 303, when Diocletian by an imperial edict required Christians to deliver up to the magistrates their sacred books and books in ecclesiastical use. After the persecution of Diocletian was over, Eusebius of Cæsarea made two collections of the Acts of Martyrs. One of them, entitled τῶν ἀρχαίων μαρτυρίων συναγωγή, a general Collection of the Acts of Martyrs, has perished; the other, "On the Martyrs of Palestine," still survives as an appendix to the eighth book of his Church History. In the ninth century the Church of Constantinople possessed a great collection of the Acts of the Martyrs in twelve volumes, and this probably formed the basis of the legends of saints and martyrs compiled by Simeon Metaphrastes (about 900). In the West, the most famous collection of the Lives of saints and martyrs was the "Legenda Aurea" of Jacobus de Voragine (died 1298).

It is scarcely necessary to say that the value of the extant Acts of the Martyrs varies very much. Some, like the Acts of the Martyrdoms of St. Ignatius and of St. Polycarp, rank among the purest sources of ecclesiastical history. In other cases the original Acts have been interpolated in such a manner that it is hard to distinguish the basis of historical fact from the structure of legend and fable which has been raised upon it. The Acts of St. Cæcilia furnish a striking instance of Acts which exhibit this mixed character. Other Acta again, like many of those compiled by Metaphrastes, possess little or no historical value. After the Renaissance, criticism set itself to distinguish what was ancient from that which was comparatively modern in the current Acts of the Martyrs, and in 1689 the learned Ruinart, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, published in a folio volume the "Acta sincera martyrum" ("Pure Acts of the Martyrs"), a work which can scarcely be surpassed in honest and accurate scholarship. In 1748, Stephen Assemani, a Maronite, issued his "Acta SS. martyrum orientalium et occidentalium," in two volumes folio. It includes the history of the martyrdoms east and west of the Tigris. ADAM, the first man. The Hebrew word, which probably means earth-born,[1] is used for man in general, and also, as a proper name, for the first man. It is in the latter of these two senses that the word is taken here. Adam was formed from "the slime of the earth" by God, who "breathed into his face the breath of life and made him to his own image and likeness." From him all mankind are descended.[2] So far all is clear. But there are great differences, with regard to the state in which Adam was created, between the teaching of Catholic and Protestant theologians, and, unless the doctrine of the Church with reference to the state of Adam in Paradise is clearly apprehended, it is impossible to understand many other parts of the Church's dogmatic system. We must begin by distinguishing between the gifts bestowed on him in the order of nature and in that of grace.

In the order of nature, Adam received from God human nature, including its constituent principles and all which flows from them or is due to them. Thus, as a man, he possessed reason and free will; he could know God as the Author of the world, if he chose to make a right use of his reason, and love Him with his will as the giver of natural good. God might have left man thus, without conferring any higher gift, for it would not have been unjust to create man for a state of "pure nature." So created, he would have been subject to disease, suffering, and death, to ignorance and to the rebellion of the appetites. He would have been destitute of grace, and could never have hoped for the happiness of heaven. But, at the same time, he would have had the ordinary help of God's providence to assist him in avoiding sin and doing his duty; and if faithful to the natural law, he would have had his reward, in knowing God eternally, so far as He can be known by reason, and in union with Him by love.

Such a state was possible.[1] But as a matter of fact, God poured into the soul of Adam, while he was in Paradise,[2] a boon which transcends all nature—that of sanctifying grace. He was able to believe in God as He is known by the light of faith, to hope that he would see Him after this life face to face, and to love Him with supernatural charity. Further, this fullness of the gifts of grace affected his natural powers. As grace subjected his soul to God, so the body in its turn was subject to the soul. The body could neither suffer nor die; the lower appetite could not rebel against the reason.[3] He had, moreover, that full knowledge of things human and divine which beseemed him, as the head of the human race.

The Scriptural account of the fall is in striking harmony with the Catholic doctrine on original justice. Our temptations come very often from within; in Adam and Eve, because their appetites were in perfect subjection, such temptation was impossible. The Serpent tempted Eve, and Eve Adam, to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, that they might "become as gods." By the rebellion, Adam lost that sanctifying grace which made him the friend of God. He also forfeited that "integrity of nature,"

[1] See Gen. ii. 7.

[2] Gen. iii. 20.

[1] This is evidently the doctrine of the Church. See the propositions of Baius, especially 26, 55, condemned by the Popes.

[2] It is not certain, though generally held, that Adam was created in grace. The Council of Trent left the matter open.

[3] "By sin," St. Paul says, "[came] death" (Rom. v.). Adam and Eve before the fall, although naked, "were not ashamed," which indicates the complete subjection of the lower nature (Gen. ii. 25).

as theologians call it, which flowed from original justice, and thus his body passed under the yoke of suffering and death; the flesh became a constant incentive to sin. He still preserved reason and free will, was still capable of natural virtue and even of corresponding to the grace of repentance; but just as the effects of the grace in which he had been constituted at first overflowed on his natural faculties, so now the fall from grace darkened his intellect and weakened his will.

Adam was the representative of the human race. If he had persevered in obedience, his descendants would have inherited from him, along with human nature, original justice and the virtues annexed to it. As it is, men come into the world destitute of grace, and so unable to attain the end for which they were created; while their very nature is wounded and impaired through the fall of their first parent. It is heresy, however, to hold, with Calvin and the other Reformers, that even fallen man is wholly evil. It is grace, not nature, which he has lost, and in his degradation he still keeps reason and free will; he is still capable of natural good. [See CONCUPISCENCE and ORIGINAL SIN.]

ADAMITES. (1.) An obscure Gnostic sect, said to have been founded by Prodicus, son of Carpocrates, in the second century. They are alleged to have met together without clothes and abandoned themselves to horrible immorality.

(2.) A fanatical sect of the middle ages. Their leader, who called himself Adam, was a Frenchman whose real name was Picard (he may perhaps have come from Picardy). From France they spread through Holland and Germany, but had their chief settlement in Bohemia, where they flourished at the time of the Hussite troubles. They were annihilated with frightful severity by Ziska in 1421. They recommended their followers to go naked, and gave unrestrained licence to sensuality.

ADMINISTRATOR. When a bishop is lawfully absent from his diocese for a prolonged period, the Pope sometimes grants him an "apostolic administrator" to take charge of the see. So, too, when a prince was appointed to a bishopric before he was capable of governing it.

The name is commonly applied to a priest in charge of a parish, but who is not himself the rector of the parish. Thus, a bishop's parish is under the care of an administrator.

ADOPTION. The Roman law held that by adoption a civil or legal kindred was established between the parties, which in many respects had the same effects as natural kindred. To this as a general principle the canon law adhered. But since, in proportion to the degree in which the adoptive was assimilated to the real relationship, impediments to marriage were multiplied, it became necessary in the interest of Christian society to restrict the effects of adoption within reasonable limits. So intricate a subject cannot be fully treated here, but the outlines of the compromise which the canonists ultimately acquiesced in may be briefly stated.

The Roman law made void a marriage between (1) the adoptive father and his adopted daughter; (2) the adopted children and the natural children of the same parent; (3) the adoptive father and the adopted son and the widows of these two respectively. In the first two cases the impediment to marriage was legal consanguinity: in the third, legal affinity. The canon law has affirmed the impediment in the first and in the third case. A Catholic may not marry his adopted daughter, nor the widow of his adoptive father. In the second case the impediment only exists so long as the adopted child and the child by blood, or either of them, remain in the father's power; that power being withdrawn, by death or otherwise, the impediment ceases. (See the chapter in Vecchiotti, "Inst. Can." v. 13, De cognatione civili seu legali.)

Adoption has never been recognised as a legal institution in England or Scotland. In the United States it is admitted, with more or less of restriction according to the ideas of jurisprudence prevailing in different States. In Massachusetts, by the law of 1876, adoption is an impediment to marriage between the adopter and the adopted, but to no other unions. The Code Napoléon allows adoption, but under rigorous conditions. (See Whitmore's "Law of Adoption in the U.S.")

ADOPTIONISM. A heresy which arose in Spain and is closely allied to Nestorianism. Towards the end of the eighth century, Felix, bishop of Urgel, and Elipandus, bishop of Toledo, held the opinion that Christ as man is only the adopted son of God. They supported this error by passages quoted from the Fathers and by the expression "homo adoptivus" which occurs in the Mozarabic Missal.

Pope Hadrian, in a letter to the Bishops of Spain, condemned this error as Nestorian, and a like sentence was passed against it in three synods convoked by Charlemagne, at Ratisbonne in 792, at Francfort in 794, and at Aix-la-Chapelle in 799. Alcuin, Paulinus of Aquileia, and Agobard wrote against the error. Both Felix and Elipandus died in heresy, but, owing to the zeal of Leidrad of Lyons and Benedict of Anagni, who made repeated visits to Spain, the followers of the heresiarchs were converted and the error died out.

The Catholic Doctors in their controversy with the Adoptionists rightly urged that adoption implies that the person adopted was, previous to his adoption, alien to the person who adopts him. Now, even as man, Christ, far from being alien to God, was the natural son of God. His sacred Humanity was united from the first moment of its existence to the Person of God the Word. When we say "this man," we indicate not only the possession of human nature: the words signify a person. Hence "the man Christ" or "Christ in His human nature" is equivalent to God the Son subsisting in human nature; and He cannot have been adopted, for the simple reason that He was son by nature. So St. Paul speaks of Him even in His humanity as the proper Son of God. God, he says, did not spare His own Son (τοῦ ἰδίου υἱοῦ) "but gave him up for us all:"[1] where the reference clearly is to Christ as man.

The Adoptionist heresy "halts between two opinions"—viz. Catholic doctrine and Nestorianism. If in Christ there had been two persons, one human and one divine, then there might also have been two sons, one by adoption, one by nature. (See Petavius, "De Incarnat." i. 22, and vii. 1 seq.; and for the opinion of Scotus, who seems to have used the form "Christ as man is the adopted Son of God," but in an orthodox sense, see Billuart, "De Incarnat." Diss. xxi.)

ADORATION OF THE CROSS, &c. [See LATRIA. See also PERPETUAL ADORATION.]

ADULTERY. The Catholic Church holds that the bond of marriage is not and ought not to be dissolved by the adultery of either party; see the decree of the Council of Trent (Sess. xxiv., Can. 7.) It remains to consider in what way the act affects, though it cannot break, the nuptial tie. The canon law allows of divorce from bed and board (a toro et cohabitatione), whether permanent or temporary, for various causes. Of these causes adultery is one of the chief. The right to this species of divorce, or, as it is called in England, judicial separation, accrues to either party in consequence of the adultery of the other, provided that the guilt be certain and notorious, whether in fact or in law. It was formerly held that this right, though it undoubtedly belonged to the husband after the misconduct of his wife, ought not to be similarly extended to a wife on account of the adultery of the husband. This opinion is not now held, and it is agreed that the adultery of either party is a sufficient cause entitling the innocent person to claim a judicial separation for life.

Several questions, however, arise. Is the husband whose wife has committed adultery bound to separate himself from her, or does he merely enter into a right which he may either exercise or not as he likes? Arguments of great weight have been adduced by canonists on either side of this question. But there is no doubt that the wife, in the parallel case, is not so bound, and that for reasons such as these: (1) that her husband's guilt implies no acquiescence on her part, which could hardly be the case were the wife the offender; (2) that the honour of the family and the legitimacy of the children are not stained or imperilled in the one case as they are in the other; (3) that her insisting on being separated from him is not likely to lead to the husband's reformation, but rather the contrary.

Another question arises, as to the legal effect of the commission of adultery by the innocent party after the sentence of divorce (judicial separation) has been pronounced. On this point, opinions are greatly divided, some holding that the divorce is a res judicata, which no subsequent misconduct on the part of the spouse innocent at the date of the sentence can affect; others maintaining that the sentence itself saddles the party relieved with an implied condition "quamdiu bene se gesserit," and that if that condition is violated, the spouse against whom the judgment was given may justly claim the restitution of conjugal rights.

Various impediments to divorce on account of adultery are allowed by the canon law, of which the chief are, the proof of adultery against the spouse seeking a divorce, and condonation.

The statute law of England, as is well known, holds the adultery of the wife to be a good cause, not only of the limited species of divorce treated above, but of the absolute severance of the nuptial bond, provided always that, as the saying is, the husband comes into court with clean hands. But the proof of adultery alone does not entitle a wife to obtain a divorce a vinculo against the husband; it must, to have that effect, be coupled with cruelty or desertion. [See MARRIAGE.]—Vecchiotti, v. 14, § 123.

ADVENT, SEASON OF. The period, of between three and four weeks from Advent Sunday (which is always the Sunday nearest to the feast of St. Andrew) to Christmas eve, is named by the Church the season of Advent. During it she desires that her children should practise fasting, works of penance, meditation, and prayer, in order to prepare themselves for celebrating worthily the coming (adventum) of the Son of God in the flesh, to promote His spiritual advent within their own souls, and to school themselves to look forward with hope and joy to His second advent, when He shall come again to judge mankind.

It is impossible to fix the precise time when the season of Advent began to be observed. A canon of a Council at Saragossa, in 380, forbade the faithful to absent themselves from the Church services during the three weeks from December 17th to the Epiphany; this is perhaps the earliest trace on record of the observance of Advent. The singing of the "greater antiphons" at vespers is commenced, according to the Roman ritual, on the very day specified by the Council of Saragossa; this can hardly be a mere coincidence. In the fifth century Advent seems to have been assimilated to Lent, and kept as a time of fasting and abstinence for forty days, or even longer —i.e. from Martinmas (Nov. 11) to Christmas eve. In the Sacramentary of Gregory the Great there are Masses for five Sundays in Advent; but about the ninth century these were reduced to four, and so they have ever since remained. "We may therefore consider the present discipline of the observance of Advent as having lasted a thousand years, at least as far as the Church of Rome is concerned."[1]

With regard to fasting and abstinence during Advent, the practice has always greatly varied, and still varies, in different parts of the Church. Strictness has been observed, after which came a period of relaxation, followed by a return to strictness. At the present time, the Wednesdays and Fridays in Advent are observed as fast days by English and Irish Catholics; but in France and other Continental countries the ancient discipline has long ago died out, except among religious communities.

There is a marvellous beauty in the offices and rites of the Church during this season. The lessons, generally taken from the prophecies of Isaias, remind us how the desire and expectation, not of Israel only, but of all nations, carried forward the thoughts of mankind, before the time of Jesus Christ, to a Redeemer one day to be revealed; they also strike the note of preparation, watchfulness, compunction, hope. In the Gospels we hear of the terrors of the last judgment, that second advent which those who despise the first will not escape; of the witness borne by John the Precursor, and of the "mighty works" by which the Saviour's life supplied a solid foundation and justification for that witness. At vespers, the seven greater antiphons, or anthems—beginning on December 17th, the first of the seven greater Ferias preceding Christmas eve—are a noteworthy feature of the liturgical year. They are called the O's of Advent, on account of the manner in which they commence; they are all addressed to Christ; and they are double—that is, they are sung entire both before and after the Magnificat. Of the first, O Sapientia, quæ ex ore Altissimi prodisti, &c., a trace still remains in the words O Sapientia printed in the calendar of the Anglican Prayer Book opposite December 16—words which probably not one person in ten thousand using the Prayer Book understands. The purple hue of penance is the only colour used in the services of Advent, except on the feasts of saints. In many other points Advent resembles Lent: during its continuance, in Masses de Tempore, the Gloria in excelsis is suppressed, the organ is silent, the deacon sings Benedicamus Domino at the end of Mass instead of Ite, Missa est, and marriages are not solemnised. On the other hand, the Alleluia, the word of gladness, is only once or twice interrupted during Advent, and the organ finds its voice on the third Sunday: the Church, by these vestiges of joy, signifying that the assured expectation of a Redeemer whose birth she will soon celebrate fills her heart, and chequers the gloom of her mourning with these

ADVOCATUS DEI. ADVOCATUS DIABOLI. [See CANONISATION.]

ADVOCATUS ECCLESIÆ. Ferraris distinguishes four classes of advocati ecclesiarum, but the most important class, and that with which alone we shall concern ourselves here, was that of advocate-protectors, princes or barons, or other powerful laymen, who, for a consideration, undertook to protect the property of a church or monastery, as well as the lives of the inmates. In the turbulent period between the ninth and the thirteenth centuries this practice was largely resorted to. The advocatus sometimes received a kind of rent, either in money or in kind, but more generally he was put in possession of Church lands, which he might use for his own benefit on condition of protecting the rest. "But these advocates became too often themselves the spoilers, and oppressed the helpless ecclesiastics for whose defence they had been engaged."[1] The Lateran Council, in 1215, had to decree (chap. 45) "that patrons or advocates, or vidames, should not in future encroach on the property entrusted to them; if they presume to do otherwise, let them be restrained by all the severity of the canon law." As law and order became stronger in Europe, the practice of employing advocati naturally fell into disuse. (Ferraris.)

ÆON. [See GNOSTICISM.]

AETIUS and AETIANS. Aetius was a native of Antioch, born in the first half of the fourth century. He was a good example of the "Græculus esuriens" satirised by Juvenal; after having been successively a slave, a charcoal-burner, a tinker, and a quack doctor, he applied himself to the profession of philosophy, and finally to that of theology. He became a pupil of Leontius, who, on being made Patriarch of Antioch in 350, ordained Aetius deacon. The Arian sentiments to which he could not help giving expression, led to his expulsion from Antioch; he sought refuge at Alexandria, where he learnt from a sophist the Aristotelian logic, and contrived to ingratiate himself with George the Arian patriarch. Aided by a zealous disciple, Eunomius, who joined him at this time, he denied not only the doctrine of Nice, which the great Athanasius was engaged in defending, but also that of the Homoiousians that the Son was like to the Father. The laxity and recklessness of his language were such that the people called him "the atheist." In 358, hearing that Eudoxus, an inveterate and audacious Arian, was installed at Antioch, Aetius went thither, and soon became a person of some importance. But Eudoxus could not prevail upon the bishops of the neighbouring sees to consent to his reinstating Aetius in the diaconate. Basil of Ancyra complained to the Emperor Constantine of the licence which was allowed to heresy at Antioch; and the Emperor in alarm ordered Eudoxus and Aetius to come to Constantinople. The authorship of an exposition of faith in which the unlikeness of the Son to the Father was maintained was brought home to Aetius, and the Emperor banished him to Phrygia (360). His place of exile was changed to Mopsuestia, and afterwards to an unhealthy town in Pisidia. Here he is said to have maintained his heresy yet more openly, and published in support of it a syllabus of forty-seven articles, which St. Epiphanius has preserved and refuted. The date of his death is not recorded. (Fleury, "Hist. Ecclés." xii.–xiv.)

AFFINITY, in the proper sense of the word, is the connection which arises from cohabitation between each one of the two parties cohabiting, and the blood-relations of the other. It is regarded as an impediment to marriage in the Jewish, Roman, and canon law.

In the Jewish law a man is forbidden, by reason of affinity, to marry his step-mother, step-daughter, and step-grand-daughter, his mother-in-law and daughter-in-law, the widow of his father's brother (the Vulgate adds the widow of his mother's brother), the widow of his brother, if he has left children.[1]

In the Roman law marriage was forbidden between a man and his mother-in-law, daughter-in-law, step-mother, step-daughter, the wife of his deceased brother, the sister of his deceased wife. It also forbade a step-father to marry the widow of his step-son, and a step-mother to marry the surviving husband of her step-daughter.

The canon law, starting from the principle that man and woman who have intercourse with each other become one flesh, considered the marriage of one party with the relations of the other as equivalent to a marriage with his or her own relation. Affinity was computed by degrees just as consanguinity was, according to the legal maxim, "The degree of a person's consanguinity with one of a married pair is the degree of his affinity to the other." Thus gradually marriage was forbidden to the seventh degree of affinity.[1] Further, although the relations of one married person could espouse the relations of the other, on the principle that "affinity does not produce affinity," still the impediment of affinity was extended to the children a woman had by her second marriage and the relations of her first husband. Moreover, two other kinds of affinity were introduced, viz. of the second and third class (secundi et tertii generis), so that marriage was unlawful between a man married to a widow and those who had affinity to his wife's former partner, or, again, who had affinity to those who were in affinity to the former partner. Finally, all these degrees of affinity were contracted by unlawful intercourse as well as by marriage

In 1215 the fiftieth canon of the Fourth Lateran Council abolished the impediment from affinity of the second and third class, as well as that from affinity between the children a woman had in second marriage and the relations of her first husband, and limited the impediment of affinity in the strict sense to the first four degrees. Lastly, the Council of Trent[2] confined the impediment of affinity from unlawful intercourse to the first two degrees, and so the law of the Church continues to the present day. Thus, affinity arising from previous marriage, to the fourth degree, and from unlawful intercourse, to the second degree (both inclusive), makes marriage null and void, and, if it supervenes after marriage, deprives the guilty party of his or her marriage rights. However, with one possible exception, viz. that between a man and the woman whose mother or daughter he has married, or, vice versa, between a woman and a man to whose father or son she has been married, affinity impedes marriage only by ecclesiastical, not by natural law, so that the Pope can grant a dispensation.[3]

Besides the various classes of affinity properly so called, there are further two species of quasi-affinity, known as legal and spiritual affinity. With regard to the former, the Church has adopted the determination of the Roman law, according to which marriage cannot be contracted between an adopted son and the widow of his adoptive father, or between the adoptive father and the widow of the adopted son. [See ADOPTION.] According to the canon law, spiritual affinity nullified marriage between the widow or widower of the God-parent in baptism and the person baptised or confirmed, and between the widow or widower of the God-parent and either parent of the person confirmed or baptised. Since, however, the Council of Trent, in reforming the older law on spiritual relationship (cognatio spiritualis), makes no mention of spiritual affinity, it is generally supposed that the latter is no longer to be recognised as an impediment to marriage.

AFRICAN CHURCH AND COUNCILS. Among the witnesses of the Pentecostal miracle[1] were Jews, not from Egypt only, but also from "the parts of Libya about Cyrene," and by some of these Christianity must have been extended in North Africa at a very early period. Eusebius tells us that St. Mark went into Egypt, and founded the Church of Alexandria, of which he was the first patriarch. The first see founded further west is believed to have been Carthage, which, at the time when we first hear of it, through Tertullian, one of its presbyters, writing about 200, was already the centre of a flourishing Afro-Roman Christian province, in which the majority of the inhabitants were Christians. Monachism sprang up in Egypt [ABBOT] in the third century, and the heresy of Arius appeared at Alexandria near the beginning of the fourth. A flood of light is thrown upon the condition of the African Church in the fifth century by the writings of its greatest son, St. Augustine, bishop of Hippo, whose vast and disciplined genius has never ceased to instruct and delight the Catholics of every later age. When St. Augustine died (430), his episcopal city was being besieged by the Vandals from Spain, who soon after made themselves masters of the whole of Roman Africa. They were Arians, and cruelly persecuted the orthodox Church, which in the time of St. Augustine could count its four hundred sees. The Donatist schism, which seduced great numbers into a state of alienation from Catholic communion, had already arisen about the beginning of the fifth century. [ARIANISM; DONATISTS.] Belisarius in the sixth century defeated the Vandals and recovered Africa for the Emperor Justinian; but Christianity had not had time to recover from the blows which war and heresy had inflicted, before the swords of the Arabs, fanatical propagators of the religion of Mohammed, hewed down, from the Nile to the Pillars of Hercules, all authority but their own. Under their baneful sway, which in the early ages of Islam was wielded with great political skill, Christianity became all but extinct in North Africa. Only in our own day, through the conquest of Algeria by the French, the Cross has driven back the Crescent on the Barbary coast; and the intrepid Cardinal Lavigerie, Archbishop of Algiers, seems likely to reillume a ray of the ancient glory of the African Church.

The present state of Christianity in Africa may be briefly described as follows: (1) In Egypt, to which is annexed Arabia, there are two vicariates, one for the Latins, the other of the Coptic rite. Following the Mediterranean coast, we find (2) an archbishop's see at Carthage (Tunis), and (3) an archbishop's see at Algiers, with two suffragan sees, Constantina and Oran. 4. Ceuta, a Spanish possession opposite Gibraltar, gives part of his title to the Bishop of Cadiz. 5. In the islands on the west coast of Africa are four bishoprics: the Canaries, under Seville; Madeira, St. Thomas, and the Cape de Verd Islands, under Lisbon. 6. The vicariate of Senegambia. 7. All the coast from Sierra Leone to the Niger, including the vicariate of Benin, has been lately committed by the Holy See to the charge of the Society of African Missions at Lyons. 8. The See of Angola (Portuguese). 9. A large thinly peopled district, between the Portuguese possessions and the Orange River, has been recently erected into a prefecture under the title of Cimbebasia. 10. At the Cape are two vicariates, the Eastern and the Western. 11. The vicariate of Natal. 12. The see of Port Louis, Mauritius, is immediately dependent on the Holy See. 13. The vicariate of Madagascar. 14. North Zanzibar is under a vicar apostolic; the southern portion is under a prefect apostolic. 15. The vicariate of the Gallas. 16. The Abyssinian Christians [ABYSSINIAN CHURCH] are under the jurisdiction of the Latin vicar apostolic of Egypt. 17. The vicariate of Central Africa with its seat at El Obeid in Cordofan.

Thus is Africa ringed round with Catholic missions, so that, if France should ever have a Christian government, or Portuguese governors go out animated by the fervour of the Albuquerques of former days, a great and sudden spread of Christianity among the descendants of Ham is far from improbable. On the other hand it has to be admitted that the Moravians, the Presbyterians, the Independents, the Anglicans, and other sects, have shown much activity in indoctrinating the native tribes (especially of South Africa and Madagascar) in their respective systems, and met with considerable success.

AFRICAN COUNCILS. These were for the most part held at Carthage. In the first four centuries the African Church, full of activity and fervour, and represented by men of the highest intellectual eminence, among whom we need but name St. Cyprian and St. Augustine, bore its part to the full in those memorable conciliar discussions which settled the form of doctrine and discipline that Christianity was to bear in the world. The chief subjects discussed at the African councils which preceded the Vandal invasion were, the re-baptism of heretics returning to the Church, the Donatist controversy, the heresy of Pelagius, and the adjustment of questions of discipline either internal or between Africa and Rome. Fleury enumerates seventeen Councils of Carthage, the last of which, held in 535, busied itself with repairing the havoc which the ravages of the Arian heretics had made. We read of an African Council, the last of the entire series, held in 646, which condemned the Ecthesis of Heraclius. In the following year the Caliph Othman despatched the expedition which, with others that followed it, brought utter ruin on the Roman and Christian civilisation of Africa.

AGAPE (from ἀγάπη, love). A name given in Jude 12 to the brotherly feasts of the early Christians, which are described at length in 1 Cor. xi. They were instituted in part on the analogy of the common meals usual among the Greeks (συσσίτια) to which each contributed his share; but this common meal was elevated by the spirit of Christian charity and designed to commemorate the last supper which Christ held with His disciples, as well as to serve for the relief of the poor. Thus it received a liturgical character, so that the Apostle calls it "the supper of the Lord."[1] It was also closely connected with the sacred mysteries, and, more probably, preceded them. However, this custom of taking other food before the communion soon died out, although in St. Augustine's time the custom still survived of permitting communion once a year — viz. on Holy Thursday — to those who had just partaken of the agape.[2]

The Agape thus separated from the Eucharist survived for many centuries in the Church, although it was evident even in St. Paul's day how liable it was to abuse, and the complaints of St. Augustine prove that he was familiar with similar scandals. The Synod of Gangra, about the middle of the fourth century, anathematises those who despise the Agape, although Van Espen is of opinion that in this place the Agape means no more than a common meal charitably supplied to the poor.[3] Be that as it may, the Agapai still continued to be celebrated in the Church. The Council of Laodicea, in the latter part of the fourth century, forbade "eating in the house of God," but the Synod in Trullo, centuries after, had to repeat the prohibition, which was placed by Gratian in the corpus juris.[4]

AGE, CANONICAL. The Church, like the State, fixes certain ages at which her subjects become capable of incurring special obligations, enjoying special privileges, of entering on special states of life, or of holding office and dignity. The following is a summary of the principal determinations regarding age, so far as they affect (1) the ordinary life of a Christian, (2) the ecclesiastical and religious state. It must be observed that the canonical age is reckoned from the day of birth, not from that of baptism.

1. With regard to ordinary Christians. The age of reason is generally supposed to begin about the seventh year, though of course it may come earlier in some cases, later in others. At that time a child becomes capable of mortal sin, and so of receiving the sacraments of penance and extreme unction, which are the remedies for post-baptismal sin. The Holy Eucharist and Confirmation, according to the discipline of the West, are usually given some time after the use of reason has been attained, when the child has received some instruction in Christian doctrine, and is able to understand the nature of these sacraments. Further, at seven years of age, a child becomes subject to the law of the Church (e.g. with regard to abstinence, Sunday Mass, &c.), and can contract an engagement of marriage. [See ESPOUSAL.]

The age of puberty begins in the case of males at fourteen, in that of females at twelve. Marriage contracted by persons under these ages is null and void (nisi malitia suppleat ætatem). Till the age of puberty is reached, no one can be required to take an oath.

At twenty-one, the obligation of fasting begins; it ceases, according to the common opinion, at sixty.

2. With regard to religious and ecclesiastics.— At seven, a person may be tonsured. No special age is named in the canon law for the reception of minor orders. A subdeacon must have completed his twenty-first, a deacon his twenty-second, a priest his twenty-fourth, and a bishop his thirtieth year. A cleric cannot hold a simple benefice before entering on his fourteenth year; an ecclesiastical dignity—e.g. a canonry in a cathedral church—till he has completed his twenty-second year; a benefice with cure of souls attached to it, before he has begun his twenty-fifth year; a diocese, till he has completed his thirtieth year.

A religious cannot make his profession till he is at least sixteen years old, and has passed a year in the noviciate. He must be thirty years of age before he can hold a prelacy which involves quasi-episcopal jurisdiction. A girl must be over twelve years of age before she assumes the religious habit. A woman under forty cannot be chosen religious superior of a convent, unless it is impossible to find in the order a religious of the age required, and otherwise suitable. In this case, a religious thirty years old may be chosen with the consent of the bishop or other superior. (See Council of Trent, Sess. xxiii. xxiv. xxv. Ferraris, "Bibliotheca Prompta.")

AGNOETÆ. A sect of Monophysites founded by the Alexandrian deacon Themistius, and hence also called Themistians. Themistius, although, being a Monophysite, he held only one nature of the Incarnate Word, maintained that this nature was subject to ignorance. Timothy,

[1] In Estius ad loc. convincing reasons are given for distinguishing the "Supper of the Lord" from the Eucharist.

Patriarch of Alexandria, and his successor Theodosius (537–539) opposed this assertion, which led logically to the confession of two natures, or to the open denial of Christ's divinity. Thereupon, the Agnoetæ formed themselves into a special sect which lasted till the eighth century. (See Petavius, "De Incarnat." I. xvi. 11. Hefele, "Conciliengeschichte," ii. 574.)

AGNUS DEI. (1) A prayer in the Mass, which occurs shortly before the communion—"Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world, have mercy on us. Lamb of God, who takest away the sins of the world, have mercy on us. Lamb of God, &c., give us peace." It has been used since the time of Pope Sergius, in the seventh century. Originally (according to some, till the time of John XXII.), each petition ended with "have mercy on us"; and this custom still continues in the Lateran basilica (Gavant.). (2) The figure of a lamb stamped on the wax which remains from the Paschal candles, and solemnly blessed by the Pope on the Thursday after Easter, in the first and seventh years of his Pontificate. Amalarius, writing early in the ninth century,[1] mentions the fact that in his time the Agnus Dei's were made of wax and oil by the Archdeacon of Rome, blessed by the Pope, and distributed to the people on the octave of Easter. A bull of Gregory XIII. forbids persons to paint or gild any Agnus Dei blessed by the Pope, under pain of excommunication.[2]

ALB. A vestment of white linen, reaching from head to foot and with sleeves, which the priest puts on before saying Mass, with the prayer—"Make me white, O Lord, and cleanse me," &c. It sprang from the under-garment (the tunica, or ποδήρης) of the Romans and Greeks, which was usually white, although alba does not occur as a technical term for the white tunic till nearly the end of the third century. The Greek under-garment had sleeves, and it was this which the Christians adopted for ecclesiastical use. The alb was adopted for Church use from early times. Eusebius speaks of bishops clothed in the holy ποδήρης. A canon attributed to the Fourth Council of Carthage, 398, and which certainly belongs to that period, orders deacons to use the alb "only at the time of the oblation or of reading." In 589, the Council of Narbonne forbade deacons, subdeacons, or lectores to put off the alb before the end of Mass. At the same time, long after this date the alb continued to be worn, at least by clerics, in daily life. Thus, in 889, a Bishop of Soissons forbids an ecclesiastic to use at Mass the same alb which he is accustomed to wear at home.

The shape of the alb has remained much as it was, for it is a mistake to suppose that it ever was a tight-fitting garment. As a rule, too, it was always made of linen, whence it is often called linea, but it was sometimes made of silk, and adorned with gold and with figures. It was also in ancient times ornamented with stripes of purple or gold. Another ancient ornament of the alb consisted in the paratura, which was in use from the eleventh to the sixteenth century. This paratura (from parare, to adorn: French, parure) was a square piece of coloured embroidery from half a foot to one foot in length, sewed on at four places in the alb.

The mystical meaning of this vestment is plainly indicated by the prayer given above. (Hefele, "Beiträge," &c.)

ALBIGENSES. These heretics were so named from the town of Alby in Languedoc, where a Council was held in 1176 which condemned their doctrines. They owed their Manichæan tenets to the Paulician sect, which, originally formed in Armenia in the eighth century, was exiled to Bulgaria, and, becoming very powerful there, gradually extended its numbers and influence up the valley of the Danube, and passed out of Swabia into the south-east of France. Their teachers assumed a great simplicity of manners, dress, and mode of life; they inveighed against the vices and worldliness of the clergy; and there was sufficient truth in these censures to dispose their hearers to believe what they advanced and reject what they decried. They taught the well-known doctrine of the Manichæans, that there are two opposing creative principles, one good, the other evil: the invisible world proceeding from the former, the body and all material things from the latter.[1] They also rejected the Old Testament, said that infant baptism was useless, and denied marriage to the "perfect," as they called their more austere members. The condemnation of their tenets by the Council of Alby produced little or no effect; they still multiplied and spread; and Raymond

VI., Count of Toulouse, protected them. Innocent III. sent Peter of Castelnau to Languedoc, as his legate, to oppose the spread of the mischief. In 1206 Diego, the holy Bishop of Osma in Spain, attended by Dominic his sub-prior, engaged in a mission in the south of France, the result of which was to bring back great numbers to the Catholic faith. The legate having been murdered in 1208 by a servant of the Count of Toulouse, Innocent proclaimed a crusade or holy war, with indulgences, against the Albigensian heretics, and requested Philip II., the King of France, to put himself at its head. The king refused, but permitted any of his vassals to join it who chose. An army was collected, composed largely of desperadoes, mercenary soldiers, and adventurers of every description, whose sole object was plunder. Raymond, in great fear, not only promised all that was demanded of him, but assumed the Cross himself against his protégés. The war opened in 1209 with the siege of Béziers and the massacre of its inhabitants. Simon de Montfort, the father of the famous Earl of Leicester, was made Count of the territories conquered. The war lasted many years and became political; in its progress great atrocities were committed, Languedoc was laid desolate, and the Provençal civilisation destroyed. Peace was made in 1227, and the tribunal of the Inquisition established soon after. St. Dominic, who preached zealously in Languedoc while the war was proceeding, and founded his celebrated Order in 1215, is thought by some to have been the first Inquisitor; but this seems to be a mistake. (Gibbon, liv.; Fleury, lxxii.)

ALEXANDRIA (Church of). The foundation of this Church by Mark the Evangelist, the ἑρμηνευτὴς Πέτρου, as he is called by Papias, has been already noticed [AFRICAN CHURCH]. The names of eighteen bishops of Alexandria between St. Mark and St. Athanasius are on record, but little is known about most of them. Demetrius, who died in 234, is known as having been the great Origen's bishop, who first favoured and afterwards persecuted that extraordinary man. The eighteenth in succession to St. Mark was Alexander, one of the fathers who sat at Nicæa. Under him arose the Arian controversy [ARIANS, ARIUS]. Athanasius [see that article] succeeded Alexander in 326, and after battling with Arianism for more than forty years, passed the close of his stormy life in peace, dying in 373. Even in the fourth century, a large proportion of the people of Alexandria were idolaters, as is shown by the story of George the intrusive Arian bishop, murdered in a popular rising because he was believed to have insulted some of the heathen rites. In the fifth and sixth centuries Monophysite bishops had possession from time to time of the see of Alexandria, which now began to be called a patriarchate [PATRIARCHATE]. The people of Egypt became generally attached, with the greater part of their clergy, to the doctrine of one nature in Christ, and rejected the decrees of Chalcedon. But these decrees, after a long period of more or less direct opposition, were espoused by the Byzantine emperors, and imposed by force on all the countries under their rule. Hence it happened that the Coptic Monophysites, when Amrou, the lieutenant of Omar, invaded Egypt in 638, were in the position of an oppressed sect, and they eagerly joined their forces to those of the Arabs in order to drive out the Greek officials and the orthodox creed. From that time the patriarchate of Alexandria has been Monophysite, and severed from Catholic communion. Alexandria having again become a place of considerable trade, there is now a fair sprinkling of Catholics in the population, for whom Gregory XVI. created a Vicariate. On the present Patriarch of Alexandria of the Latin rite, see PATRIARCH.

ALEXANDRIA (School of). Founded by Alexander the Great about B.C. 330, Alexandria rapidly grew in population and wealth, and numbered, towards the Christian era, more than six hundred thousand inhabitants.[1] Under the Ptolemies Greek literature flourished there with extraordinary brilliancy in every department of thought. The Jews, who settled there in great numbers, struck by the fecundity of the Greek mind, strove to turn it from its errors, and convert it to the belief in the unity of the Godhead. The Hebrew Scriptures were under this impulse translated into Greek [SEPTUAGINT], and a school of eminent writers arose, among whom the most distinguished were Philo and Josephus. In a place so full of learning and intellectual strife, Christianity could only hold its ground, after being once planted, by entering seriously into the philosophical debate, and justifying, by arguments which the learned would appreciate, the wisdom of God in the revelation through Christ.

[1] Gibbon, ch. x.

Hence arose the Christian school of Alexandria, the great lights of which—Pantænus, Origen, and Clement—lived in the third century. Among the numerous works of Origen the most celebrated are his commentaries on Scripture (he was the founder of Biblical criticism), the "Principia" and the book "Contra Celsum." Clement is known chiefly as the author of the "Pedagogus" and the "Stromata." The latter (the name means "hangings," "tapestries") is a multifarious treatise, in which he professes to fashion a web of Christian philosophy, discussing the conduct and the sentiments which should belong to a Christian in all the more important relations and emergencies of life. The rise of Arianism, and the conflicts to which it led, checked the prosperity of the School of Alexandria. St. Athanasius writes rather as a worker than as a thinker, and after him no great name occurs till that of Cyril of Alexandria, who, though not inactive as a writer, employed his stern will and vigorous intellect chiefly in repressing all dissent from the creed of Ephesus (430).

ALLEGORICAL SENSE. [See MYSTICAL SENSE.]

ALLELUIA. From two Hebrew words united by a hyphen, meaning "praise Jah," or "praise the Lord." It occurs frequently in the last fifty psalms, but nowhere else in the Old Testament, except Tobias, c. 13. In the Apocalypse, St. John mentions that he heard the angels singing it in heaven. The early Christians kept the word in its original Hebrew form, and we know from St. Jerome that children were taught to pronounce it as soon as they could speak, while it was sung during his time by the Christian country-people in Palestine, as they drove the plough.

According to Sozomen, the Roman Church did not use it in her public services, except on Easter Sunday. At present, it constantly occurs in the Roman Mass and office; indeed, it is always used in the Mass between the Epistle and Gospel except at certain times when the Church omits it altogether, as a sign of mourning. It is thus omitted from Septuagesima to Holy Saturday; in ferial Masses during Advent; on the feast of the Holy Innocents, unless it falls on a Sunday; on all vigils which are fasting-days, if the Mass of the vigil be said, and in all Requiem Masses. It is, however, used in the Mass on the vigil of Easter (Holy Saturday) and of Pentecost, because the Masses were anciently said at night, and belonged to the solemnity of the respective feasts. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss." ii. 5.)

ALL SAINTS. As early as the fourth century, the Greeks kept on the first Sunday after Pentecost the feast of all martyrs and saints, and we still possess a sermon of St. Chrysostom delivered on that day. In the West, the feast was introduced by Pope Boniface IV. after he had dedicated, as the Church of the Blessed Virgin and the Martyrs, the Pantheon, which had been made over to him by the Emperor Phocas. The feast of the dedication was kept on the thirteenth of May. About 731 Gregory III. consecrated a chapel in St. Peter's Church in honour of all the saints, from which time All Saints' Day has been kept in Rome, as now, on the first of November. From about the middle of the ninth century, the feast came into general observance throughout the West. It ranks as a double of the first class with an octave.

ALL SOULS DAY. A solemn commemoration of, and prayer for, all the souls in Purgatory, which the Church makes on the second of November. The Mass said on that day is always the Mass of the dead, priests and others who are under obligation of reciting the breviary are required to say the matins and lauds from the office of the dead in addition to the office which is said on that day according to the ordinary course, and the vespers of the dead are said on the first of November, immediately after the vespers of All Saints. This solemnity owes its origin to the Abbot Odilo of Clugny, who instituted it for all the monasteries of his congregation in the year 998. Some authors think there are traces at least of a local celebration of this day before Odilo's time. With the Greeks Saturday was a day of special prayer for the dead, particularly the Saturday before Lent and that which preceded Pentecost. (Thomassin, "Traité des Festes," liv. ii. ch. 21.)

ALMS (from ἐλεημοσύνη), originally a work of mercy, spiritual or temporal, and then used to denote material gifts bestowed on the poor.

Almsgiving is frequently and urgently enjoined in the Old Testament.[1] So highly did the Jews think of this duty, that in Chaldee almsgiving is expressed by a word which signifies justice or righteousness, and in the LXX the word ἐλεημοσύνη or "almsgiving" is often used to translate the Hebrew for justice or righteousness. In the New Testament Christ makes almsdeeds in those who are able to perform them an absolute condition of salvation.[1] St. Paul exhorts the faithful to lay by every week something for the needs of the poor; and the numerous religious orders which devote themselves chiefly or in part to the care of the poor, prove that the spirit of Christ and His Apostles still animates the Church.

All are of course strictly bound to relieve the poor, when they are in extreme necessity—i.e. when they are in proximate danger of death, or grievous sickness through want. Besides this, St. Liguori teaches that persons are bound, out of that part of their income which remains over when they have made suitable provision for themselves and their families, to relieve the ordinary necessities of the poor. The sum which a rich man is strictly bound to give in charity must vary in varying circumstances, and can never be fixed exactly; but, apart from strict obligation, the blessings promised to generous almsgiving for the love of God will always prove a strong incentive with the Christian soul. Ecclesiastics are bound to spend all the revenues of their benefices, except what is required for their own maintenance, in pious uses. The poor of the place, if they are in serious need, must be considered first,[2] and if the cure of souls is attached to the benefice, the cleric who holds it is bound to seek out the poor in his district. (St. Liguor. "Theol." lib. iii. 31 seq., lib. iv. 497.)

ALMONER (eleemosynarius). An ecclesiastic at the court of a king or prince, or in a noble mansion, having the charge of the distribution of alms. From the fourteenth century the office of Grand Almoner in France rose into even greater importance, because this officer had the charge of the king's ecclesiastical patronage. The Revolution swept it away; under the Second Empire it reappeared; but it has not survived Sedan. One of the Anglican bishops has the title of Lord High Almoner, and dispenses the sovereign's alms. Chaplains of any kind are commonly called almoners in France. The aumônier de la flotte is a functionary of considerable importance, on whose nomination chaplains are appointed to ships, and also to hospitals.

[2] So at least some grave authors say.

ALOGI. A name given by Epiphanius to heretics who denied the doctrine of the Word (Λόγος) and rejected St. John's writings (i.e. the Apocalypse as well as the Gospel) on the ground that they did not agree with the rest of Scripture. Epiphanius speaks of Theodotus of Byzantium as an offshoot of this sect. This man, known as Theodotus the tanner, held that Jesus was a mere man, born, however, miraculously of a virgin; that Christ was united to him at his baptism, descending on him as a dove and conferring supernatural powers. Artemon taught the same doctrine. The heretics claimed to have the early Roman Church on their side, alleging that it had been corrupted by Zephyrinus, an assertion, as a contemporary writer quoted by Eusebius observes, abundantly confuted by the writings of the first Christians, and the hymns in which "from the beginning" Christ had been called God. Theodotus was excommunicated by Pope Victor at the end of the second century. Theodotus, the money-changer, taught similar doctrine, with the addition of certain Gnostic extravagances. He made Christ an æon who had descended on Jesus, Melchisedec an æon superior to Christ.[1]

Eusebius, with other ancient authorities, speaks of Paul of Samosata as renewing the error of Artemon. Paul, bishop of Antioch, was notorious for his avarice, love of worldly pomp, and irregular life. He conceived of the Word and Holy Ghost as mere attributes of God, not divine Persons. Jesus was a mere man, born of a virgin and enlightened in an extraordinary degree by the Word or Wisdom of God. After twice deceiving the bishops assembled in council at Antioch by false statements and false promises, he was deposed at a third Antiochene council in 269.[2] [See ANTIOCH, par. 7.]

Similarly Beryllus, bishop of Bostra in Arabia, denied the pre-existence and divinity of Jesus Christ. The bishops who met in council against him called in Origen to their help, and the latter succeeded in bringing back Beryllus to the truth.[3]

ALTAR. The Hebrew word מִזְבֵּחַ which is usually translated "altar," means literally "a place for sacrifice;" and in the New Testament its equivalent is θυσιαστήριον. The sacred writers avoid the common Greek word for altar, βωμός,[1] "a raised place," adopting the unclassical word θυσιαστήριον, because by doing so they avoided the heathen associations connected with the common Greek term, besides expressing much more distinctly the purpose of sacrifice for which an altar is built. Whether the Christian altar is mentioned by name in the Bible is doubtful. There is some ground for supposing that it is referred to in Matt. v. 23, and in Hebrews xiii. 10. It has been argued that when our Lord imposes a precept of forgiveness before the gift is presented at the altar, he did not mean to give the Jews a new law with regard to their sacrifices, which were soon to pass away, but to establish the indissoluble connection between the Eucharist Sacrifice of His Church and brotherly love. Similarly, it is urged that when the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews asserts "we have an altar, of which they have no right to eat who serve the tabernacle," he is setting altar against altar, and declaring the impossibility of partaking in the Jewish sacrificial feastings and joining at the same time in the sacrificial banquet of the new law. It is certainly difficult to understand the "altar" as the altar of the cross, which is never once called an altar in the New Testament, and though, of course, an altar it indisputably is, still nobody ate of the sacrifice offered on it. At the same time, these interpretations are by no means held by all Catholic commentators.[2]

However it may stand with the name, the existence of the thing is implied in the New Testament doctrine of sacrifice [see MASS], and the name occurs in the very earliest Christian writers. "There is one flesh," says St. Ignatius the disciple of St. John, "one flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ, and one chalice for union with His blood, one altar (θυσιαστήριον), as one bishop."[3] So Tertullian describes Christians as standing at the "altar of God;"[4] and the same word "altar" is used in the Apostolic Constitutions and in the ancient liturgies. These testimonies are in no way weakened by passages in Minucius Felix and Arnobius, who in their controversies with Pagans deny the existence of Christian altars. Obviously, they deny that altars such as the Pagan ones were in use among Christians; just as one of these authors allows that there were no temples among Christians, though churches are distinctly recognised in the edicts of the Diocletian era, and are known to have existed at a still earlier date.[1]

In early times the altar was more usually of wood; and an altar of this kind is still preserved in the church of St. John Lateran at Rome, on which St. Peter is said to have celebrated Mass.[2] But the tombs of martyrs in the Catacombs and elsewhere were also used for the Holy Sacrifice, the slab of marble which covered the sepulchre serving as an altar-table; and for almost fourteen centuries, that part of the altar on which the Eucharist is consecrated has always been of stone or marble. After the time of Constantine, when sumptuous churches were erected, careful arrangements were made for the position of the altar. It did not lean, as it often does now, against the sanctuary wall, but stood out with a space round it, so that the bishop when celebrating Mass looked towards the people. Thus the altar looked in the same direction as the portals of the church, and often both were turned towards the east. This ancient arrangement is still exemplified by the "Papal" altars in the Roman basilicas, but particularly in St. Peter's, where the Pope still says Mass on the great Festivals, looking at one and the same time to the people, to the portals of the church, and to the east.[3] The altars in the Catacombs were still employed, but even new altars were sanctified by relics, a custom to which so much importance was attributed that St. Ambrose would not consecrate an altar till he found relics to place in it. Then, as now, the altar was covered with linen cloths, which, as appears from a rubric in the Sacramentary of St. Gelasius, were first blessed and consecrated. It was surmounted by a canopy, supported by columns between which veils or curtains were often hung, and on great festivals it was adorned with the sacred vessels placed upon it in rows, and with flowers. The cross was placed over the canopy, or else rested immediately on the altar itself. The language and the actions of the early Christians alike bespeak the reverence in which the altar was held. It was called

"the holy," "the divine table," "the altar of Christ," "the table of the Lord." The faithful bowed towards it as they entered the church; it was known as the ἄσυλος τράπεζα, or "table of asylum," from which not even criminals could be forced away.[1] Finally, before the altar was used, it was solemnly consecrated by the bishop with the chrism. The date at which this custom was introduced cannot be accurately determined; but the Council of Agde, or Agatha, in Southern Gaul, held in the year 506, speaks of this custom as familiar to everybody.[2]

The rubrics prefixed to the Roman Missal contain the present law of the Church with regard to the altar. It must consist of stone, or at least must contain an altar-stone large enough to hold the Host and the greater part of the chalice; and this altar, or the altar-stone, must have been consecrated by a bishop, or by an abbot who has received the requisite faculties from the Holy See. [See CONSECRATION OF ALTARS.] The altar is to be covered with three cloths, also blessed by the bishop, or by a priest with special faculties. One of these cloths should reach to the ground, the other two are to be shorter, or else one cloth doubled may replace the two shorter ones. If possible, there is to be a "pallium," or frontal, on the altar, varying in colour according to the feast or season. A crucifix[3] is to be set on the altar, between two candlesticks: the Missal placed on a cushion, at the right-hand side looking towards the altar: under the crucifix there ought to be an altar-card,[4] with certain prayers which the priest cannot read from the Missal without inconvenience.

With regard to the number of altars in a church, Gavantus says that originally, even in the West, one church contained only one altar. On this altar, however, the same author continues, several Masses were said on the same day, in proof of which he appeals to the Sacramentary of Leo. He adds that even in the fourth century the church of Milan contained several altars, as appears from a letter of St. Ambrose, and he quotes other examples from the French Church in the sixth century.

ALTAR-BREADS are round wafers made of fine wheaten flour, specially prepared for consecration in the Mass. The altar-breads according to the Latin use (followed also by the Maronites and Armenians) must be unleavened. They are usually stamped with a figure of Christ crucified, or with the IHS. They are of two sizes: one larger, which the priest himself consecrates and receives, or else reserves for the Benediction with the Blessed Sacrament; the other smaller, consecrated for the communion of the faithful.

The practice of stamping altar-breads with the cross or IHS seems to be ancient, and is widely diffused. Merati mentions the fact that the cross is stamped on the altar-breads used by Greek, Syrian, and Alexandrian (Coptic?) Christians.

ALTAR-CARDS. As mentioned under ALTAR, the rubric requires that an altar-card be placed in the centre under the crucifix; custom has introduced two others, one on each side, the object of all three being to aid the priest's memory, should it fail at any time during the celebration of Mass, though he is expected to have the prayers committed to memory. The centre card contains the "Gloria in excelsis," the "Credo," the Offertory prayers, the "Qui pridie," or beginning of the Canon, the form of consecration, the prayer before Communion, and the "Placeat," or last prayer. That at the Epistle side contains the prayer said while putting the water into the chalice, and the "Lavabo," said at the washing of the fingers. That at the Gospel side contains the prologue of St. John's Gospel (i. 1–14).

ALTAR-CLOTHS. The rubrics of the Missal require three fair cloths to be placed on the altar, or two cloths of which one is doubled. They must be blessed by the bishop, or by a priest with special faculties. In the fourth century St. Optatus speaks of the linen cloth placed on the altar as usual in his time, and Pope Silvester is said to have made it a law that the altar-cloth should be of linen. Mention, however, is made by Paulus Silentiarius of purple altar-cloths, and, in fact, both the material and the number of these cloths seem to have varied in early times. AMBO (Gr. ἀναβαίνειν, to ascend). A raised platform in the nave of early Christian churches, surrounded by a low wall; steps led up to it from the east and west sides. The place on it where the Gospel was read was higher than that used for reading the Epistle. All church notices were read from it; here edicts and excommunications were given out; hither came heretics to make their recantation; here the Scriptures were read, and sermons preached. It was gradually superseded by the modern pulpit. A good example of the "ambo" may be seen in the church of San Clemente at Rome. (Ferraris.)

AMBROSIAN CHANT. [See PLAIN CHANT.]

AMBROSIAN LITURGY. An ancient Liturgy still used in the church of Milan instead of the Roman Mass, from which it differs in many striking points. [See LITURGY.] We read in Walafrid Strabo, an author of the ninth century, that St. Ambrose regulated the Mass and Office of his church at Milan, but some parts of this rite are older than St. Ambrose, while, on the other hand, the Ambrosian Missal contains great additions which date from St. Gregory the Great. According to the Ambrosian rite, there is no Mass for the Fridays in Lent; and the offering of bread and wine by the people for the sacrifice is still retained in solemn Masses. The Ambrosian rite was confirmed by Pope Alexander VI. in 1497, and is still retained. (Ceillier, "Auteurs Sacrés," tom. xiii. c. 1.)

AMBRY (Lat. armarium, whence almarium; Fr. armoire). A closet or cupboard, place for tools, chest. "In the form almery corruptly confused with almonry, as if a place for alms" (Murray's Dictionary). The same authority explains an ambry in a church as "a cupboard, locker, or closed recess for books, sacramental vessels, vestments, &c." In its corrupt use the word was applied, Stow tells us, to the old almonry of Westminster Abbey, "for that the alms of the abbey were there distributed to the poor."

AMEN. A Hebrew word signifying "truly," "certainly." It is preserved in its original form by the New Testament writers, and by the Church in her Liturgy. According to Benedict XIV., it indicates assent to a truth, or it is the expression of a desire, and equivalent to γένοιτο, "so be it."[1]

"Amen" signifies assent when used at the end of the Creeds. In the ancient Church the communicants used it as an expression of their faith in the Blessed Sacrament. Thus we read in the Apostolic Constitutions[1]—"Let the bishop give the oblation, saying, 'The Body of Christ,' and let the recipient say, 'Amen.'" St. Ambrose explains the "Amen" used thus in communicating as meaning "it is true."

At the end of prayers "Amen" signifies our desire of obtaining what we ask. Thus it is said by the server, after the collects in the Mass, as a sign that the faithful unite their petitions to those of the priest. In Justin's time, the people themselves answered "Amen" as the priest finished the prayers and thanksgivings in the Mass, and was about to distribute the Holy Communion.[2]

AMICE (Amictus. Called also "humerale," "superhumerale," "anaboladium," from ἀναβάλλειν, and, in a corrupt form, "anabolagium"). A piece of fine linen, oblong in shape, which the priest who is to say Mass rests for a moment on his head and then spreads on his shoulders, reciting the prayer—"Place on my head, O Lord, the helmet of salvation," &c.

For many centuries priests celebrated with bare neck, as may be seen from many figures in the Roman Catacombs, and from the mosaic at San Vitale in Ravenna. The amice, however, is frequently mentioned after the opening of the ninth century.[3] Originally, as Innocent III. expressly testifies, it covered the head as well as the neck; and to this day Franciscan and Dominican friars wear the amice over their heads till they reach the altar. It also was not at first concealed by the alb, as is now the case, and it was often made of silk and ornamented with figures. At present it is made of linen, and only adorned with a cross, which the priest kisses before putting on the amice.

Mediæval writers have given very many and very different symbolical meanings to this vestment. The prayer already quoted from the Roman Missal speaks of it as figuring the "helmet of salvation," and a similar prayer occurs in most of the ancient Latin Missals.

ANAGOGICAL (literally, "leading up"). A name given to things typical of Christ in the Old, or to the actions of Christ in the New Testament, so far as they signify the eternal glory which awaits the elect. The anagogical is a subdivision of the spiritual or mystical senses. (See St. Thomas, S. i. 1, 10.)

ANAPHORA. Greek word for Offertory, in the Mass.

ANATHEMA. A thing devoted or given over to evil, so that "anathema sit" means, "let him be accursed." St. Paul at the end of 1 Corinthians pronounces this anathema on all who do not love our blessed Saviour. The Church has used the phrase "anathema sit" from the earliest times with reference to those whom she excludes from her communion either because of moral offences or because they persist in heresy. Thus one of the earliest councils—that of Elvira, held in 306—decrees in its fifty-second canon that those who placed libellous writings in the church should be anathematised; and the First General Council anathematised those who held the Arian heresy. General councils since then have usually given solemnity to their decrees on articles of faith by appending an Anathema.

Neither St. Paul nor the Church of God ever wished a soul to be damned. In pronouncing anathema against wilful heretics, the Church does but declare that they are excluded from her communion, and that they must, if they continue obstinate, perish eternally.

ANCHORITE. [See HERMIT.]

ANGEL. The word (ἄγγελος, a translation of מַלְאָךְ) means messenger, and is applied in a wide sense to priests,[1] prophets,[2] or to the Messias[3] as sent by God. Specially, however, it is used as the name of spiritual beings, created by God but superior in nature to man. The existence of such superhuman intelligences was conjectured even by heathens such as Plato; and although the Sadducees[4] believed "neither in angel or spirit," angels are mentioned so frequently in the Old and New Testament that it would be idle to allege Scriptural proofs on the matter. When they were created, Scripture does not distinctly tell us. "The most ancient Fathers," says Petavius, "especially the Greeks and such Latins as are used to follow the Greeks," held that the angels were created "before the heavens and all material things." The contrary opinion, that the heavens were first created and the angels in the heavens, is that of St. Thomas, and has been commonly held since his time among the Latins. The Fourth Lateran Council declares that God created angels and material beings "at the same time from the beginning." But the council had no intention of deciding this question, which still remains open, as has been pointed out by St. Thomas himself, by Vasquez, Petavius, and others.

With regard to the nature of angels, many early Fathers believed that they were corporeal. This opinion is not difficult to account for when we consider such a history as that of the marriages between the "sons of God" and "the daughters of men," given in the sixth chapter of Genesis.[1] At the Seventh General Council, the Patriarch Tarasius argued that angels might be painted, because they were "circumscribed (ἐπειδὴ περίγραπτοί εἰσιν) and had appeared to many in the form of men;" nor did the council censure his words, limiting itself to a simple decision that it was lawful to represent angels in pictures. However, our Lord's words[2] imply, that angels are incapable of marriage, and so exclude the interpretation which regards the "sons of God" in Genesis vi. as a synonym for angels. Many of the Fathers deny that angels have bodies; so do all modern theologians. The Fourth Lateran Council separates angelic from corporeal natures, and Petavius rightly characterises the contrary opinion as "proximate to heresy." At the same time, angels are capable of assuming bodies; to which they are for the time intimately united; which they move and which they use to represent either their own invisible nature or the attributes of God. Passages of Scripture, which imply this, will readily occur to the reader.

The angels, then, are purely spiritual intelligences and, for that very reason, superior to man, who is composed of body and soul. They are immortal, since death consists in the separation of soul and body, nor could they be destroyed, except by the omnipotence of God. Their knowledge, unlike that of man, which is slowly acquired by means of the senses, depends upon images received from God along with the nature He has given them. They do not reason, as we do, for the keenness of their intellect enables them to see by intuition the conclusions which are involved in principles. Their intelligence is in perpetual exercise, and although the future, the thoughts of the human soul, and above all the mysteries of grace, are hidden from them, except so far as God is pleased to reveal them, still they can know and understand many things which are hidden from us. They can move from place to place with a swiftness impossible to man. Finally, they are endowed with free-will and are able to communicate with each other.[1]

To a nature so noble God added sanctifying grace. They received power to know God as revealed by faith, to hope in Him, to love Him, and afterwards, if they were worthy, see Him face to face. But, during the time of their probation, Lucifer and many other angels fell. It is hard to determine the precise nature of their sin, but we may quote Petavius, who places it in "a desire of absolute dominion over created things, and in hatred of subjection." The rebel angels were at once deprived of all supernatural gifts and thrust into hell without hope of pardon; the angels who had persevered were at once rewarded with everlasting bliss. The very greatness and perfection of angelic nature, says St. Gregory the Great, made their sin unpardonable.

Holy Writ represents the number of the good angels as exceedingly great.[2] They are, according to the common teaching of theologians, divided into three hierarchies, each of which includes three orders. The first triplet consists of Seraphim, Cherubim, Thrones; the second of Dominations, Principalities, Powers; the third of Virtues, Archangels, Angels. This enumeration occurs for the first time in Pseudo-Dionysius, from whom it was adopted by St. Gregory the Great, and so became current in the Church. But it is founded on the mention of seraphim and cherubim in Isaias and Ezechiel; of angels and of archangels throughout Scripture; and of the other orders in St. Paul's Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians. The meaning of St. Paul is much disputed. But we may remark that very early writers divide the angels into orders, and count thrones, dominations, &c., among them,[1] though it is well to remember that the existence of these particular classes of angels is no article of faith.

As to the employment of the angels, we read in the Epistle to the Hebrews that they are "all ministering spirits." They serve God continually in heaven, and they also defend countries, cities, churches, &c., besides offering to God the prayers of the faithful, particularly, according to the Fathers and ancient liturgies, those which ascend to heaven during the Mass. Further, each man has an angel who watches over him, defends him from evil, helps him in prayer, suggests good thoughts, and at last, if he is saved, presents his soul to God.[2]

The Church, on her part, shows to the angels that veneration or inferior honour which is their due, and, knowing from Christ's words[3] that they are acquainted with things which pass on earth, she begs their prayers and their kind offices. It is true that St. Paul condemns the θρησκεία, or religion of angels, in writing to the Colossians (i. 16), but every scholar is aware that he is warning them against the Gnostic error which regarded angels as the creators of the world: and with equal reason, the same passage might be alleged as in condemnation of humility. It is true also that, when St. John in the Apocalypse bowed down before an angel, the latter said, "See thou do it not, for I also am thy fellow-servant. . . . Adore God."[4] But if Protestants think the veneration of angels idolatrous, or at least unlawful, they ought not to suppose the holy Apostle so ignorant as to offer it—not to speak of his shortly after repeating the crime. Rather, surely, the angel refused the homage out of respect to the honour which human nature has received from the Incarnation and to the apostolic dignity; just as a bishop might out of humility decline the homage of one whom, although inferior to himself in ecclesiastical rank, he venerated for his great virtue. The Catholic may answer those who accuse the Church of idolatry for her cultus of angels, as St. Augustine and St. Cyril answered long

ANGELS, EVIL. [See DEVIL.]

ANGELS, FEAST OF. Since the fifth century churches were dedicated, both in the East and West, to the holy angels. In the West, there was a famous apparition of St. Michael on Mount Garganus, an event which Baronius places in the year 493; and this apparition gave occasion to the feast of St. Michael which the Roman Church keeps on September 29, and which is mentioned in the martyrologies of Jerome, Bede, and others, as the Dedication of St. Michael. There was another apparition of the same archangel in France during 706. "It is this apparition," says Thomassin, "on Mount Michael, or In Periculo Maris, which was once so celebrated in France, and of which the commemoration is still observed in some dioceses."

In the East, the constitution of Manuel Comnenus mentions a feast of the apparition of St. Michael on September 6, and a feast of the angels in general on November 8.

The feast of Angel Guardians was instituted under Paul V., at the request of Ferdinand of Austria, afterwards emperor. (Thomassin, "Traité des Festes.")

ANGEL GUARDIANS. [See ANGEL.]

ANGELICALS. An order of nuns, following the rule of St. Augustine, founded by Luigia di Torelli, Countess of Guastalla, about 1530. She had been married twice, but being left a second time a widow when only twenty-five years of age, she resolved to devote the rest of her life and her large fortune to the divine service.

She founded her first convent at Milan. Her religious took the name of Angelicals in order to remind themselves whenever they uttered it of the purity of the angels. Every nun adopts the name of "Angelica," prefixing it to that of a patron saint and her family name—e.g. "Angelica Maria Anna di Gonzaga." Their constitutions were drawn up by St. Charles Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan.

ANGELUS. By this name is denoted the Catholic practice of honouring God at morning, noon, and evening, by reciting three Hail Mary's, together with sentences and a collect, to express the Christian's rejoicing trust in the mystery of the Incarnation. The first sentence begins "Angelus Domini nuntiavit Mariæ;" whence the name of the devotion. A bell, called the Angelus bell, rings at the several hours. The evening Angelus was introduced by Pope John XXII. in the fourteenth century; that at noon, according to Mabillon, arose in France, and received Papal sanction at the beginning of the sixteenth century. In Paschal time the "Regina Cœli" [q.v.] is recited instead of the Angelus.

ANGLICAN ORDERS. The validity of Anglican orders is a subject of controversy or not, according to the view taken of the nature and effects of ordination. The late Archbishop Whately (see his treatise on the "Kingdom of Christ," passim) held (1) that the Church of Christ consisted of many separate communions having nothing necessarily in common but the profession of belief in Jesus Christ as the Redeemer of mankind; (2) that Christ's kingdom was "not of this world," i.e. not intended to be sustained by temporal coercion, as earthly kingdoms are; (3) that every Christian Church or sect, while repudiating all coercive means either for or against itself, had the right to organise itself and manage its internal affairs; (4) that a necessary part of such organisation was the appointment of office-bearers and ministers. Considered thus, Anglican orders are undoubtedly "valid;" for no one doubts that the Anglican Church has a separate corporate existence, and laws and a government of its own, nor that its clergy are regularly appointed in conformity to those laws. Nor would any one holding this view justly object to the ordination of Anglican clergymen who have submitted to the Roman Church and desire to become priests; for he would admit that his view of ordination and that held in the Catholic Church were totally distinct things, so that to treat an Anglican clergyman as if he had not been previously ordained would merely imply a radical difference of conception as to the nature of ordination, and convey no slur on the rites or formalities by which his admission as an office-bearer in the Anglican Church had been prefaced.

But it is well known that there is a large and increasing section of Anglicans, who hold much the same theory as to the nature and effects of ordination that Catholics do—viz. that in virtue of authority derived in an unbroken chain from the Apostles [ORDER, HOLY] the bishop who ordains a priest confers on him the right and the duty of offering the sacrifice of the New Law by celebrating the Eucharist, and of absolving penitents from their sins. If Anglican ordination really conferred these powers, the consideration of the manner in which they have been used for the last three hundred years, and of the manner in which they are used now, would be one of the most painful and perplexing subjects of thought on which a Catholic could enter. At the same time, the Anglican party referred to have no choice but to claim for their ordinations nothing less than the potency above described, for they hold, as we do, that a priest in the Catholic Church is either all this, or he is—nothing. Hence an earnest and searching controversy has arisen of late years, with the view of sifting and testing the validity of those orders of which the consecration of Parker by Barlow in 1559 was the fountain-head.

The subject is encumbered with innumerable details, and we have only space for a few important propositions in connection with it.

1. The Roman Church, though it has never pronounced a formal decision on the validity of Anglican orders, has in practice treated them as invalid, since Anglican clergymen have to go through all the usual stages before being admitted to the priesthood, as though they were simple laymen.

2. No record of the consecration of Barlow (who consecrated Parker) is in existence, and it is doubtful whether he was ever consecrated at all.

3. The ordinal used at Parker's consecration—that of Edward VI.—shows a manifest intention of not making a Catholic bishop, as then and now understood, but of appointing a sort of overseer, who, deriving his power from the sovereign, should administer discipline, teach, and preach.

4. Similarly, the Anglican ordinal for making priests, at any rate down to the time of Charles II., bore on its face the intention, not to make sacrificing priests, but "a Gospel ministry."

5. Even if their orders were valid, Anglicans would not any the more belong to the true Church. "Catholics believe their orders are valid, because they are members of the true Church, and Anglicans believe they belong to the true Church, because their orders are valid."[1]

ANGLO-SAXON CHURCH, HISTORY OF. [See ENGLISH CHURCH: ANGLO-SAXON PERIOD.]

ANGLO-SAXON CHURCH (FAITH AND DISCIPLINE OF). We have thought it well to devote a separate article to show how truly Roman, and how identical with the Catholic creed and worship of to-day, were the Anglo-Saxon creed and worship. When Aethelheard, archbishop of Canterbury, demanded of the bishops assembled in council at Cloveshoe (803) an exposition of their belief, they unanimously answered: "Know that the faith which we profess is the same as was taught by the Holy and Apostolic See when Gregory the Great sent missionaries to our fathers." In theory, then, the Anglo-Saxon faith was identical with the Roman. We proceed to show that it was also identical in practice.

1. The Sacrifice of the Mass.—Everywhere, both in the East and in the West, we meet with the priest who officiates at the "sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ," the altar on which the victim is offered, and the liturgy or form of prayer with which that offering is accompanied. The Britons, before the arrival of the Saxons, had "their altars, the seats of the heavenly sacrifice,' and "their priests who stretched out their hands over the most holy sacrifices of Christ"; (Gildas, pp. 37, 76, ed. Stevenson, 1838) and the Scots, in the remote isle of Icolmkille, "celebrated the sacred mysteries of the holy sacrifice, and consecrated, according to custom, the body of Christ." (Cuminian, "Vita S. Columb." pp. 29, 32.) With some accidental variations, especially in the parts preceding the Canon, the form of the service was substantially the same as in all Churches, Eastern and Western, each carefully preserving the Trisagion or Tersanctus, the invocation, the consecration of the elements, the commemoration of the living and the dead, the fraction of the host, and the communion of the faithful. The several improvements which the Pontiffs of the fifth and sixth centuries had introduced in the preparatory part remained for a time unknown to certain ancient Churches which originally had received their liturgy from Rome; hence the variety of rites. Our native writers describe the Mass as the "celestial and mysterious sacrifice, the offering of the victim of salvation, the sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ"; they tell us that at the consecration "the elements of the bread and wine are, through the ineffable hallowing of the Spirit, made to pass into the mystery of Christ's flesh and blood"; that "the bread and wine are then consecrated into the substance of His body and blood"; "that the holy and precious body and blood of the Lamb, by whom we have been redeemed, are again immolated to God for the benefit of our salvation." (Beda, "Hist."ii. c. 5; iii. c. 2.; iv. cc. 14, 22, 28; "Hist. Abb. Gyrven.," inter Bedæ opera minora, p. 331, ed. Giles, 1843; Thorpe, "Eccles. Instit." ii. p. 22 and p. 376, quoted by Lingard: Beda, "Hom. in Vig. Pasch." p. 31; "Hom. in Epiph." p. 272; Alcuin ad Paulinum, xxxvi.) Numerous canons and rubrics regulated the celebration of Holy Mass. An altar, a paten or dish, and a chalice, all three previously consecrated by a bishop, were required; the offlete, or bread for the consecration, was to be made of the finest flour, without the admixture of any kind of leaven; the wine was to be pure, and to be mixed, according to the practice of every Christian Church, with a small quantity of water. On solemn festivals the clergy in attendance were dressed in their richest apparel; the altar, with its furniture, presented the most gorgeous appearance; the sanctuary was illuminated with a profusion of lamps and wax lights; the air was perfumed with clouds of incense; to the voices of the choir was added the harmony of the organ and of musical instruments. The Italian missionaries would, of course, establish the Roman liturgy in the new Church, but Augustine and his companions had been instructed by St. Gregory not to confine themselves exclusively to the Roman ritual: "Whatever practice you may discover, which in your opinion will be more acceptable to God, establish it in the new Church of the Angles, without considering the place of its origin, whether it be Roman, or Gallican, or any other Church." (Beda, I. c. 27.) How far the missionaries availed themselves of this permission is uncertain. Neither have we means of judging how far the sacrificial service of the Scottish missionaries varied from that of the Romans. One thing, however, is certain: the discrepancy was of no importance, for it never became a subject of controversy between the two parties, like the time of Easter and the form of the tonsure.

2. The "order or course of daily prayer" had in view to supply matter for prayer at the canonical hours, and was therefore more susceptible of variety of form and arrangement than the Mass. Not only in national Churches, but in neighbouring Churches of the same nation, considerable discrepancies existed in the performance of the choral service. In England, however, these discrepancies never led to controversy among the missionaries. In 747, the Council of Cloveshoe, under Archbishop Cuthbert, confirmed the ascendency of the Roman, and effected the abolition of the Scottish forms by the following decree: "The great solemnities of our redemption shall be everywhere celebrated according to the written ritual which we have obtained from Rome, in the administration of Baptism, the celebration of Mass, and in all things thereunto pertaining; moreover, the feasts of the saints through the course of the year shall be kept on the days fixed in the Roman Martyrology, with the chant and psalmody appointed thereto; and nothing shall be permitted to be read or chanted but what is taken from the authority of the Holy Scriptures and allowed by the custom of the Roman Church." After this Council we hear nothing more of the Scottish forms in the Southern province, but in the North they appear to have kept their ground till a much later period. Exact uniformity was never obtained. Discrepancies existed in breviaries of the Churches of Sarum, York, and Hereford until the Reformation; and even at the present day the English Benedictine monks make use of the monastic breviary approved by Paul V., while the English Catholic clergy use the breviary of the Church of Rome.

3. Public Worship.—Among the Anglo-Saxons, both at the celebration of the sacrifice and during the canonical hours, the whole service, with the exception of certain prayers during the Mass, was chanted by the choir. For the instruction of the people, the Epistle and the Gospel were read, and the sermon was delivered in their native tongue, but God was publicly addressed by the minister of religion in the language of Rome (see art. LANGUAGE OF THE CHURCH). On Sundays and festivals the church service was performed with full solemnity. All servile works—hunting and hawking, travelling, trading, the prosecution of family feuds, litigation, the execution of criminals—were prohibited. Transgressors were liable to the punishments prescribed in the doombook. The clergy were ordered by the Council of Cloveshoe to devote Sunday to the worship of God exclusively and employ themselves in teaching their dependents the rules of a holy life. The duties expected from the laity may be gathered from the following injunction: "It is most right and proper that every Christian man, who has it in his power to do so, should come on Saturday to the church [the Sunday was reckoned from sunset on Saturday to sunset on the following day] and bring a light with him, and there hear the vesper song, and after midnight the uht-song (matins) and come with his offering in the morning to the solemn Mass . . . and after the holy service let him return home and regale himself with his friends, and neighbours, and strangers, but, at the same time, be careful that they commit no excess either in eating or drinking." They were expected not to break their fast or to take any meat before the service of High Mass was ended (Thorpe, ii. 440–2).

4. Private Prayer.—The practice of private prayer is thus taught to the Saxon laity: "It is also to be made known to Christian laymen that every one pray, at least, twice in the day—that is, in the morning and in the evening. In this wise shall you teach them to pray: First they shall sing (= recite) the Creed, for it is most likely to open to them the foundation of their true faith; and after he shall have sung the Creed let him say thrice, 'O God that madest me, have mercy upon me,' and thrice, 'O God, have mercy upon me, a sinner.' And this being done, and his Creator alone being worshipped, let him call upon God's saints, that they intercede for him with God; first on St. Mary, and then on all God's saints. And then let him arm his forehead with the sign of the holy rood—that is, let him sign himself, and then, with upraised hands and eyes, let him in his heart thank God for all He has given him, pleasant or unpleasant." (Thorpe, "Eccles. Instit." ii. 418, 420, 424; xxii., xxiii., xxix.)

5. Baptism.—The regular manner of administering this sacrament was by immersion; the time, the two eves of Easter and Pentecost; the place, the baptistery, a small building contiguous to the church, in which had been constructed a convenient bath called a font. All the preparatory ceremonies prescribed by the Roman Ritual at this day were in use in England. In the course of time, convenience or necessity led to several changes in the regulations concerning the administration of Baptism. The missionaries baptised their converts in rivers. As single baptisms continued to increase, a font was placed in the church; the time fixed for the rite was, in Northumbria, nine days after birth, in the South thirty-seven days after birth.

6. Confirmation was administered to the children at a very early age. Venerable Bede tells how children were brought to St. Cuthbert for confirmation on his episcopal visitations, and how he ministered to those who had been recently born again in Christ the grace of the Holy Spirit by the imposition of hands, "placing his hand on the head of each, and anointing them with the chrism which he had blessed." (Inter Bedæ opera minora, p. 277; "Vita S. Cuthb." p. 106.) This and similar passages prove both the grace attributed to this sacrament and the manner in which it was conferred before 700, and are in perfect accordance with the form described in the Pontifical of Archbishop Egbert of York (beginning of 8th century).

7. The Holy Eucharist.—From the arrival of Augustine till the Reformation, the English name for the Eucharist was the housel. To administer the Eucharist was to housel; to receive it was to go to the housel or to be houselled. We find the word housel under the form of hunsle in the Mœso-Gothic version of the Gospels made by Ulphilas about the year 370, twice as translation of θυσία, a sacrifice or victim, and once as rendering of λατρεία, worship of God in general.[1] With Beda the Eucharist is the saving victim of the Lord's body and blood—the victim without an equal—the victim of His blood, the body that was slain and the blood that was shed by the hands of unbelievers. Similar language was used in the Scottish Church. The faithful partook of the housel during Mass, immediately after the communion of the celebrant. The Roman missionaries most probably introduced the custom of weekly communion among their converts; but in the North, the Scottish missionaries had appointed the feasts of Christmas, Epiphany, and Easter for general communion. This arrangement, by directing the devotion of the people to those particular seasons, had led almost to the extinction of frequent communion. The conditions required of the communicant were that he should come fasting, and that, if he had fallen into sin, he should have confessed it, have submitted to the penance enjoined, and have received the permission of his confessor. (Thorpe, ii. 438, 440.)

8. The Sacrament of Penance.—"No man can be baptised twice; but if a man err after his baptism, we believe that he may be saved if he sorrow [behreowsiath] for his sins with tears, and do penance for them as his teacher shall instruct him." (Ælf. "Hom." i. p. 292, "De Fide Catholica.") Penance in the Anglo-Saxon theology comprised four things: sorrow for sin, confession of sin, penitential works, and reconcilement or absolution. Sorrow (behreowsung = a rueing or lamenting) was a real sorrow of heart. Of confession the Saxon homilist says: "We cannot be saved unless we confess sorrowfully what through our negligence we have done unrighteously. All hope of forgiveness is in confession. Confession with true penance [dædbote] is the angelic remedy of our sins." . . . "No man will obtain forgiveness of his sins from God, unless he confess to some of the ministers of God, and do penance according to his judgment. . . . Without confession there is no pardon." (Thorpe, ii. p. 230.) "By confession the venom has been extracted: it now remains for the leech to prescribe the manner of cure" (Alcuin, "De Usu Psalmorum," tom. ii. p. 278), which he did by apportioning the measure of punishment to the degree of guilt of the penitent. The penitential, or doom-book, guided the confessor in the imposition of penitential works. There still remained the prayer of reconciliation or absolution. In lighter and secret cases, it was generally given after confession; but where the offence was more heinous, or called for public example, the absolution was deferred for a considerable time, until a great part or the whole of the penance had been performed. (See SHROVETIDE, PENANCE, PENITENTIAL BOOKS.)

9. The Sacraments of Order, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction were all administered according to the Roman custom as laid down in the Sacramentaries of Gelasius and St. Gregory, whence they were transcribed into the rituals of the Anglo-Saxon Church. The benediction of virgins who entered the cloister, the coronation of kings, the consecration of churches, are all alike drawn from the same source. These rites are in substance and almost in every detail identical with the form prescribed in the "Rituale Romanum" still used throughout the Catholic Church.

10. Prayer for the Dead.—The Anglo-Saxons had inherited from their teachers the practice of praying for the dead—a practice common to every Christian church before the Reformation. They believed that "some souls proceed to rest after their departure—some go to punishment for that which they have done, and are often released by alms-deeds, but chiefly through the Mass if it be offered for them—others are condemned with the devil to hell." ("Sermo ad Pop. in Oct. Pent." apud Whelock, p. 386.) Praying for the relief of the souls in Purgatory was a favourite form of devotion with our ancestors. But they did not only pray for others, they were careful to secure for themselves after their departure the prayers of their friends. This they frequently solicited as a favour or a recompense, and for this they entered into mutual compacts by which the survivor was bound to perform certain works of piety or charity for the deceased. Such covenants were not confined to the clergy or to persons in the higher ranks of life. The numerous gilds, whatever may have been their immediate object, all imposed one common obligation, that of accompanying the bodies of the deceased members to the grave, of paying the soul-scot for them at their interment, and of distributing alms for the repose of their souls. The clerical and monastic bodies offered gildships of a superior description. They admitted honorary associates with a right to the same spiritual benefits after death to which the professed members were entitled. To some the favour was conceded on account of their piety or learning; to others it was due on account of their benefactions. It belonged of right to the founders of churches, to those who had made to them valuable benefactions, or had rendered to them important services or had bequeathed to them a yearly rent-charge for that purpose. Of all these individuals an exact catalogue was kept, the days of their decease were carefully noted, and on their anniversaries a solemn service of Masses and psalmody was yearly performed. For the benefit of the dead money was distributed among the poor, and slaves were set free. The devotions in behalf of the dead consisted in the frequent repetition of the Lord's Prayer, technically called a belt of Pater-nosters (containing probably 50) which was in use with individuals ignorant of the Latin tongue; the chanting of certain psalms followed by the Collect still in use in the Catholic Church; in the sacrifice of the Mass, which was offered as soon as might be after death, again on the third day, and afterwards as often as was required by the friends of the deceased.

11. Veneration and Invocation of the Saints.—This practice the Anglo-Saxons had received with the rudiments of the Christian religion. It formed an integral part of their public and private worship. In public they were frequently called upon to celebrate the anniversaries of individual saints, and yearly to keep the festival of All-hallows as a solemnity of the first rank and importance. In private, at their morning and evening devotions, they were instructed to worship God, and then "to pray, first to St. Mary and the holy Apostles, and the holy martyrs, and all God's saints, that they would intercede for them to God." (Thorpe, ii. p. 426.) A high pre-eminence was allotted to the "most blessed Mother of God, the perpetual Virgin St. Mary." (Beda, "Hom. in Purif." p. 173.) Next in rank was St. Peter, to whom Christ had given the keys of the kingdom of heaven "with the chief exercise of judicial power in the Church, to the end that all the faithful throughout the world might know that whosoever should separate himself from the unity of Peter's faith or of Peter's fellowship, that man could never obtain absolution from the bonds of sin, nor admission through the gates of the heavenly kingdom." (Beda, "Hom." p. 199.) Both laity and clergy were solicitous to secure his patronage. They crowded to the churches and altars dedicated to his memory, pilgrimages were made to his tomb, and presents were annually sent to the church in which were deposited his remains, and to the bishop who sate in his chair. Among the other saints, particular honours were paid to Pope Gregory and to Archbishop Augustine as the friends and patrons of the nation. (This sketch is taken almost word for word from "The History and Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, containing an account of its origin, government, doctrines, worship, revenues, and clerical and monastic institutions," by John Lingard, D.D. In this learned and most conscientious work the reader will find ample confirmations and further developments of the facts here stated.)

ANIMALS, LOWER. The doctrine of St. Thomas on the nature of the brutes stands midway between the extreme doctrine, held in ancient and revived in modern times, that the brutes have rational souls, and the equally extreme doctrine of Descartes, that they are mere machines. St. Thomas admits that the brutes have souls, by which they live and feel, and know and desire the particular objects which are presented to them. They can store up past impressions in their memory; they can recall absent images by imagination. Further they cannot go. They are incapable of forming abstract ideas, and they have no free will. "In the works of brutes," St. Thomas says, "we see certain instances of sagacity, inasmuch as the brutes have a natural inclination to proceed with the most perfect order, and, indeed, their actions are ordered with supreme skill." He explains that this skill comes from God, the supreme artificer, and he continues, "On this account certain animals are called prudent and sagacious, although they themselves have no reason or free will, as is clear from the fact, that all animals of one species go to work in the same way."[1]

From this it follows, as will be plain to anyone who has learned the elements of the Thomist Philosophy, that all the operations of the brute soul are performed through the bodily organs. The imagination and the memory are sensitive powers, no less than sight and hearing: it is only the intellect and the will which deal with immaterial ideas, and which act without material organs; and intellect and will are wanting in brutes. From the operations of the soul in brutes St. Thomas infers its nature, in accordance with the philosophic maxim, "essence and operation correspond to each other."[2] As their souls operate through matter, so they spring from matter and perish with it. They are not created by God, but are derived with their bodies from their parents by natural generation.[3] Without matter, they are utterly incapable of operation, and therefore of existence, for nothing can exist unless it acts in some way or other. Hence, their soul is extinguished with the dissolution of the body.[4]

These philosophical principles determine the morality which regulates the conduct of man to the brutes. As the lower animals have no duties, since they are destitute of free will, without which the performance of duty is impossible, so they have no rights, for right and duty are correlative terms. The brutes are made for man, who has the same right over them which he has over plants or stones. He may, according to the express permission of God, given to Noe, kill them for his food, and if it is lawful to destroy them for food, and this without strict necessity, it must also be lawful to put them to death or to inflict pain on them, for any good or reasonable end, such as the promotion of man's knowledge, health, &c., or even for the purposes of recreation. But a limitation must be introduced here. It is never lawful for a man to take pleasure directly in the pain given to brutes, because, in doing so, man degrades and brutalises his own nature. Hence the touching rules in the Old Testament which prescribe mercy on man's part to the beasts. Moreover, we are bound for our own sakes not to inflict long and keen suffering on the brutes, except some considerable good results. If we accustom ourselves to see animals tortured, we are apt to become callous even to human sufferings, and we do wrong in exposing ourselves to such a danger, unless on the weighty grounds of a higher benevolence. "A man," says Billuart, "who puts brutes to death in a cruel manner, and delights in their torments, sins venially, by abusing his power as master and lord. For by such cruelty a man accustoms himself to be cruel to his fellow-men; whence we read in Prov. xii. 'the just man knoweth [i.e. considers and regards] the souls of his beasts, but the heart of the wicked is cruel.'"[1]

[1] Sum. i. 2, 13, 2. [2] Ibid. i. 75, 3.
[3] Ibid. i. 118, 1. [4] Ibid. i. 75, 3.

ANNATES (Annatæ) or FIRST FRUITS. According to the definition of Ferraris, "Annates are a certain portion of the revenues of vacant benefices which ought, according to the canons and special agreements, to be paid to the Roman Pontiff and the Curia." The portion due in the case of inferior benefices seems to have been, before the Council of Constance, one half of the gross revenues of the first year, and in the case of bishoprics and abbeys, a sum regulated according to "the ancient taxation." At that council a decree was passed after much discussion, of which the general effect was to allow to the Roman Pontiff the first year's income of all dignities and benefices in his gift. The Council of Basle complained of the burden of the "annates," yet when it was a question of maintaining the anti-pope Felix, whom they had set up, they imposed a still heavier burden, in the shape of "first fruits," on the nations adhering to them.

In England the annates were finally transferred from the Pope to the King by a statute passed in 1534. They are still payable to the sovereign in the case of Anglican bishoprics and Crown livings.

Owing to the revolutions which within the last ninety years have so completely altered the face of Europe, annates form, at the present day, a scarcely appreciable portion of the revenues of the Holy See. Their place is supplied more or less imperfectly by the voluntary contributions usually called "Peter's Pence" [see that article].

Zahlwein remarks:—"Annates (1) are paid for the support of the Pope, the Cardinals, and other officials. (2) They are applied to defray the expenses of the legates and apostolic nuncios, whom the Popes find it necessary to send to various nations and the Courts of princes. (3) By means of these annates, aid is extended to bishops who have been expelled from their sees, and to princes unjustly dislodged from their thrones." It was probably by means of this fund that the Popes were enabled to extend a generous hospitality for many years to the son and grandson of our James II.

ANNIVERSARY. An "anniversary" is defined as "that which is done for a deceased person on the expiration of a year from the day of death," and is especially understood of the celebration of Mass for the benefit of his soul. When a testator directs that such an anniversary shall be celebrated, without specifying whether once or oftener, the canon law interprets his intention as being that the foundation shall be in perpetuum. If the anniversary falls on a greater double, the Mass of Requiem may be sung; if on a double of the second class, it must be anticipated or postponed. (Ferraris, Anniversarium.)

ANNUNCIATION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN (Annuntiatio

[1] Billuart, De Justit. Diss. x. a. 1. For the spirit of the O. T. on this matter, see Exod. xx. 10. xxiii. 12, where the beasts, like men, have a day of rest provided for them; Deut. xxv. 4. "thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out thy corn;" xxii. 6, where the Jews are forbidden to take the bird with the brood on which she is sitting.

εὐαγγελισμός, χαριτισμός). The word signifies "declaration," or "announcement"—i.e. of the fact that God the Son was to be born of Mary—but at the very moment in which the fact was announced, it actually took place; so that, in commemorating the "Annunciation," we really commemorate the Incarnation of God the Word.

St. Luke tells us, that the Angel Gabriel was sent by God to Nazareth, where he saluted Mary with the words, "Hail, full of grace." The Evangelist speaks of Mary as "espoused" to Joseph, and Calmet, on this ground, thinks that she was still unmarried. But the great majority of Catholic writers believe that the word "espoused" must not be pressed; that Mary, when the angel came, was already St. Joseph's wife, and was living in his house. St. Ambrose, in his commentary on Luke, lib. ii., remarks that the salutation, "Hail, full of grace," was unknown before. "It was reserved for Mary alone. For rightly is she called full of grace, who alone obtained a grace merited by none, save only her, that she should be filled with the Author of Grace." At first, Mary was disturbed by the salutation, and even when told that she was to be the Mother of our Lord, she replied, "How shall this be, since I know not man?" Catholic divines point out that she did not, like Zacharias, show want of faith. She accepted the fact, and only inquired about the manner of its accomplishment. According to the common explanation, she had made a vow of virginity, which she was anxious to keep, though, as St. Bernard says, she was willing to surrender it at God's bidding. The angel told her the child was to be conceived by the operation of the Holy Ghost. Mary herself was to supply all which an ordinary mother supplies for the formation of her child's body, so that Mary is truly the Mother of God. The rest was done by the operation of the Trinity, though it is attributed specially to the Holy Ghost, because it was a work of grace and love—grace and love being particularly appropriated to the Holy Ghost. This mystery was accomplished when the Blessed Virgin said, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it done unto me according to thy word." Then God the Son was hypostatically united to human nature.

The Annunciation, as a feast, belongs both to Christ and to His Blessed Mother; but Suarez says, that as the gift of Christ to man was not perfectly accomplished till the moment of His birth, therefore the feast of the Annunciation is to be regarded chiefly as a feast of Mary, that of Christmas as a feast of Christ. The feast of the Annunciation is celebrated on March 25. Some authors—e.g. Thomassin and Tillemont—think that this date was chosen simply because it is nine months before Christmas; nine months being the usual period which elapses between conception and birth. Benedict XIV., on the other hand, contends that the 25th of March was known by ancient tradition to have been the actual day. Certainly, St. Augustine, in the fourth book of his work on the Trinity, cap. v., speaks of an ancient tradition to that effect, while the same day is marked for the Annunciation in the Greek Menologies and Menæa, in the Calendars and Martyrologies of the Copts, Syrians, Chaldeans, as well as in the Sacramentary of St. Gregory, and generally in the Missals, &c., of the West. It is true that a Council of Toledo, in the seventh century, ordered the feast to be kept on January 18, but the object of the council was, not to fix the true date, but to provide against the inconvenience of celebrating the Annunciation in Lent.

We do not find any certain and express mention of the feast in early writers, though Martene rightly infers from St. Augustine's words, already alluded to, that the custom of celebrating it is very ancient. We find it mentioned by the Council in Trullo (692), in an ancient Martyrology falsely attributed to St. Jerome, and in homilies which pass under the name of Gregory Thaumaturgus, and which may belong to the beginning of the fifth century. The Bollandists even argue from the general diffusion of the feast, that it may have been of Apostolic institution.

ANOMŒAN. [See ARIANISM.]

ANTEPENDIUM. As mentioned under ALTAR, a "pallium," or frontal, varying in colour according to the season, is to be placed on the altar. The rubric especially requires this when the altar is not entirely of stone. It is commonly called the antependium, from ante, before, and pendere, to hang.

ANTHEM. [See ANTIPHON.]

ANTHONY, ST., ORDER OF. Properly speaking, there is no such Order. For although, as we have seen [ABBOT], Anthony was the patriarch of the monastic family, still he composed no rule; and if certain schismatic convents of Armenians and Copts boast that they possess such a rule, it is always found on examination that it is the rule of St. Basil, or some modification of it.

The Antonines, an order of monks to serve the sick, were founded by Gaston, a gentleman of Dauphiné, towards the end of the eleventh century, when the terrible and mysterious disease called St. Anthony's fire was causing great mortality in the valley of the Rhone. In 1040 Jocelyn, a pilgrim, had brought relics of St. Anthony to the Church of St. Didier la Mothe, near Vienne. Praying before these relics in 1095, Gaston, his son being then dangerously ill, vowed to give his goods to found a hospital if his son got well. The son recovered, and eagerly joined his father in the fulfilment of his vow. They took the monastic habit, and established a hospital for the reception of persons ill of St. Anthony's fire. The order flourished greatly. Benedict VIII. in 1297 ordained that the Antonines should live as canons-regular under the rule of St. Austin. The order subsisted till the Revolution, at which time there were sixty-six Antonines in France: of this number only three became assermentés; the rest preferred persecution, exile, and death.

ANTHROPOMORPHITES. An insignificant sect of the fourth century, called also Audians, after their founder Audius, a native of Mesopotamia. Grounding their heresy on many passages in Scripture, especially in the Old Testament, they maintained that God had a human shape. They died out before the end of the fifth century. When Cassian, towards the year 400, travelled among the monks of Egypt, he found that anthropomorphism, though with a complete absence of heretical intention or perversity, was rife among them; but whether they inherited the tenet from the Audians, or derived it from some other source, is uncertain.

ANTICHRIST. A word which, so far as the New Testament is concerned, only occurs in St. John's Epistles. In itself it might mean—"like Christ," or "instead of Christ," as ἀντίθεος signifies Godlike, or ἀνθύπατος pro-consul, but the Antichrist of St. John is Christ's adversary. "Ye have heard," he says, "that Antichrist[1] is coming, and now there have been many Antichrists. . . . This is the Antichrist who denies the Father and the Son." In the fourth chapter he makes the characteristic of Antichrist (τὸ τοῦ ἀντιχρίστου) consist in not confessing Jesus;[1] and more fully in the seventh verse of the Second Epistle, he places the guilt of Antichrist in his denial that Christ has "come in the flesh." Thus St. John identifies the Antichristian spirit with the Docetic heresy, though he seems also to allude to a single person who is to come in the last days. St. Paul, in the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians is more explicit. He does not, indeed, use the word "Antichrist," but he speaks of a person whom he describes as the "man of sin," "the son of perdition who opposeth and raiseth himself over all that is called God, or is an object of awe, so as to sit in the temple of God, exhibiting himself as God." At present, there is a power which hinders his manifestation. The Thessalonians looked on the "day of the Lord" as already imminent. Not so, St. Paul replies: three things must happen first—an apostasy or defection must occur; the hindrance to the manifestation of Antichrist must be removed, and then Antichrist himself revealed. This "man of sin" is usually called "Antichrist," and to this terminology we shall conform during the rest of the article.

As to this Antichrist, we must distinguish between what is certain and what is doubtful.

It is the constant belief of the whole Church, witnessed by Father after Father from Irenæus downwards, that before our Lord comes again, a great power will arise which will persecute the Church, and lead many into apostasy. All that is "lawless," all that oppose "lawful authority" in Church or State, partake so far of his spirit, who is called, in the words of the Apostle, the "lawless one" by pre-eminence. But this must not lead us to treat Antichrist as a mere personification of evil, or to forget the universal belief of Fathers and theologians that he is a real and individual being who is to appear before the end of the world.

So much for what is certain. When we come to details, the Fathers, Bossuet says, "do but grope in the dark, a sure mark that tradition had left nothing decisive on the subject." All, or nearly all, are agreed in considering that the "mystery of iniquity already worked" in Nero, that the power which hindered the appearance of Antichrist was the Roman Empire, and that he was to appear as the Messias of the Jews, and to possess himself of their temple. Further, from very early times, St. Paul's "man of sin" was identified with one of the two Apocalyptic beasts, in Apoc. xiii., and with the little horn, in Daniel vii., which roots out the other ten horns, or kings, speaks blasphemies and destroys the saints. A time was expected when the Roman power would be divided into ten kingdoms. Antichrist was to destroy three of these, to subdue the rest, till, after a reign of three and a half years, he, in turn, was destroyed by Christ. It was also commonly held that Antichrist was to be a Jew, of the tribe of Dan, because that tribe is described as a serpent by the dying Jacob,[1] and is omitted from the list of tribes in the Apocalypse.[2] Many other features in the picture might be given. Some regarded Antichrist as generated by Satan; others, as actually Satan incarnate. The Arian persecution in Africa, the domination of Islam, were looked upon as likely to usher in the reign of Antichrist. Among other curious beliefs we may mention that of some among the Béguines, who supposed that as Lucifer had come from the highest order of angels, so Antichrist would spring from the most perfect Order, viz. the Franciscan. In contrast with these aberrations of fancy, St. Augustine in the West, and St. John Damascene in the East, preserve a marked moderation of tone in discussing this subject.

At the Protestant Reformation, an entirely new view appeared on the field. Even heretics had not ventured to assert that St. Paul, in the "man of sin," meant to describe the Pope. Wyclif, indeed, had called the Pope "Antichrist," while the name was applied to Pope Silvester by the Waldensians, to John XXII. by the Béguines; but the word was used in that vague sense in which everyone who does or teaches evil is an Antichrist. Indeed, till Luther's time it was generally agreed that Antichrist was to be an individual, and this fact, which the plain sense of St. Paul's words implies, is enough of itself to refute the absurd opinion that Antichrist means the line of Popes. All Protestant writers of respectable attainments have now rejected this monstrous interpretation. Yet it is well not to forget that it was once almost an article of Protestant faith, and it was actually made a charge against Archbishop Laud on his trial that he refused to recognise Antichrist in the Bishop of Rome.

ANTIDICOMARIANITES (literally "opponents of Mary"). A sect of heretics in Arabia, to whom St. Epiphanius directed an epistle and of whom he gives an account in his work on heresies. They held, that, after Christ's birth, Mary had other children by St. Joseph. They are said to have derived this error from disciples of Apollinaris. The Collyridians, a sect of the same time and country, also mentioned by Epiphanius, went to another extreme. Women of this sect offered cakes or rolls (κολλυρίδες) in Mary's honour and afterwards partook of them. This superstition first arose in Thrace and Scythia. Against these heresies St. Epiphanius lays down the Catholic principle, that Mary is to be honoured, but God only to be adored. (See Fleury, xvii. 26. Hefele in Wetzer and Welte.)

ANTIOCH. The city in which the disciples of our Lord were first called Christians. It was the chief centre of the Gentile Church and here the chief apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, and other apostolic men, such as St. Barnabas, laboured. Besides this, Antioch had a title to special pre-eminence in the fact that it was for a time the actual see of St. Peter, who founded the Church and held it, according to St. Jerome, for seven years. He was succeeded by St. Evodius and St. Ignatius. Moreover, the civil greatness of the city combined with its traditional glory, as St. Peter's see, to give it a high rank among the Churches of the world. It is no wonder, then, that Antioch should have been regarded in early times as the third among the episcopal cities of the Catholic world. The difficulty rather lies in the fact that the third, instead of the second, place was assigned to it, and that it ranked after Alexandria, the see of St. Mark. This apparent anomaly may be explained by the civil superiority of Alexandria, and this is the solution actually given by Baronius; or, again, it may be said that St. Peter only fixed his see at Antioch for a time, whereas he placed his representative St. Mark as the permanent bishop of Alexandria.

However, the bishops of Antioch did not even maintain their rank as third among Christian bishops, though it was theirs by ancient privilege. At the Second and Fourth Councils, they permitted the bishop of Constantinople to assume the next place after the Roman bishop, so that Antioch became the fourth among the patriarchates. Shortly after the Fourth General Council, Antioch fell lower still. Anatolius, bishop of Constantinople in St. Leo's time, ordained a patriarch of Antioch, and this infringement of the independence which belonged to Antioch as a patriarchate came to be regarded as a settled custom.

The patriarchate of Antioch embraced the following provinces: Phœnicia prima et secunda, Cilicia, Arabia, Mesopotamia, Osroene, Euphratesia, Syria secunda, Isauria and Palestine It is doubtful whether Persia was subject to it. Antioch claimed jurisdiction over Cyprus, but the latter asserted its independence at the Council of Ephesus, and at a later date Anthimus, metropolitan of Cyprus, resisted Peter the Fuller, who claimed authority as patriarch of Antioch. Anthimus professed to have found the body of St. Barnabas in the island and so to have proved the apostolic foundation of his Church. The territory of Antioch was abridged further by the rise of the patriarchate of Jerusalem. At Chalcedon, Juvenal of Jerusalem secured the three Palestines as his own patriarchate. This he did by an agreement with Maximus of Antioch, which was ratified by the council and the Papal legates.

The bishop of Tyre held the first place among the metropolitans subject to Antioch; he was called πρωτόθρονος, and he had the right of consecrating the new patriarch, though in the middle of the fifth century, as we have seen, this privilege was usurped by Constantinople. The patriarch consecrated the metropolitans; they consecrated the bishops, though Pope Leo wished that even bishops should not be consecrated without the patriarch's approval.

Under the Emperors Zeno and Anastasius at the end of the fifth century, Monophysite patriarchs were placed at Antioch, and this Monophysite patriarchate lasts to the present day, though the patriarch's residence was removed to Tagrit and later to Diarbekir. There was a Greek orthodox patriarch, who generally resided at Constantinople, but he too fell away in the general defection of the Greeks from Catholic unity. This schismatic patriarchate of the orthodox Greeks still continues. At the end of the eleventh century, the conquests of the crusaders led to the establishment of a Latin patriarchate.

At present, besides the Syro-Monophysite or Jacobite, and the Greek schismatic patriarch, there are—the Latin Catholic patriarch, who, at present, does not really govern any Church in the East; the Greek Melchite patriarch, for the united Greeks; the Syrian patriarch, for those of the Syrian rite who returned in the seventeenth century from Monophysite error to the Church; the Maronite patriarch, who has authority over all Maronite settlements. (From Le Quien, "Oriens Christianus," tom. ii. De Patriarchatu Antiocheno; except the last paragraph, which is from Moroni, "Dizionario," sub voc.)

Among the many councils assembled at Antioch, special importance belongs (1) to three councils held between 264 and 269 against Paul of Samosata. At the third council, in 269, Paul was deposed and his formula that the Son was of one substance (ὁμοούσιος) with the Father condemned, probably because Paul meant by it, that the Son pre-existed only as an attribute of the Father, not as a distinct Person, just as reason in man is a mere faculty, not a distinct person. The fathers of the council addressed an encyclical letter to Dionysius of Rome, Maximus of Alexandria, and to the other bishops. Dionysius died that same year, but his successor, Felix I., published a decisive statement of the Catholic faith against the errors of the heresiarch. Paul, however, maintained possession of the episcopal house; whereupon the orthodox applied to the emperor Aurelian, who decreed that the bishop's house was to belong to him "with whom the Italian bishops and the Roman see were in communion."

(2) To the Synod in encœniis, held in 341. It consisted of 97 bishops, met to consecrate the "Golden Church" begun by Constantine the Great; whence the name ἐν ἐγκαινίοις. The majority of the fathers held the Catholic faith, and had no thought of betraying it; and hence their 25 canons relating to matters of discipline attained to great authority throughout the Church. But they were deceived by the Eusebian party [see ARIANISM], renewed the sentence of deposition against Athanasius, and put forth four Creeds, which though they approach the Nicene confession, still fall short of it by omitting the decisive word "consubstantial."

Apart from its influence as a patriarchate and as the meeting-place of councils, Antioch also wielded great powers over the Church as a school of theology and of Scriptural exegesis. This school already existed in the fourth century, when Dorotheus and Lucian—who died, as a martyr, in 311—were its chief ornaments. The Antiochenes were learned and logical, the enemies of allegorical inpretation and of mysticism, but their love of reasoning and their common sense degenerated at times into a rationalistic tendency, so much so that Theodore of Mopsuestia has ever been regarded as the forerunner of Nestorius. But undoubtedly, Antioch rendered great services in the literal interpretation of Scripture. Unlike the Alexandrians, the great scholars of Antioch turned aside from allegorical interpretations, and were distinguished for their critical spirit and grammatical precision. Among their foremost commentators were—Diodorus, bishop of Tarsus (+ about 394), formerly priest of Antioch, whose writings, though vehemently denounced for their Nestorian tendency, and no longer extant, once enjoyed a vast reputation; John Chrysostom, the greatest of all literal expositors; Theodore of Mopsuestia (+ 429), like Diodorus, inclining to Nestorianism, but gifted with talents which can still be discovered even in the fragments and Latin translations of his commentaries which survive, and known among the Nestorians as "the commentator" par excellence; Theodoret (+ about 458), whose commentaries on St. Paul are "perhaps unsurpassed" for "appreciation, terseness of expression and good sense."[1]

ANTIPHON. The word signifies "alternate utterance." St. Ignatius, one of the Apostolic Fathers, is believed to have first instituted the method of alternate chanting by two choirs, at Antioch. In the time of Constantine, according to Sozomen, the monks Flavian and Diodorus introduced it among the Greeks. In the Latin Church it was first employed by St. Ambrose at Milan in the fourth century, and soon became general. But in process of time the word came to have a more restricted sense; according to which it signifies a selection of words or verses prefixed to and following a psalm or psalms, to express in brief the mystery which the Church is contemplating in that part of her office.

In the Mass, the Introit (introduced by Pope Celestine I. in the fifth century), the Offertory, and the Communion, are regarded as Antiphons. But it is in the canonical hours that the use of the Antiphon receives its greatest extension. At vespers, matins, and lauds, when the office is a double [see FEASTS], the Antiphons are doubled—that is, the whole Antiphon is said both before and after the psalm or canticle. On minor feasts, the Antiphons are not doubled; then the first words only are said before the psalm, and the whole at the end of it. Liturgical writers say that the Antiphon means charity; and that when it is not doubled, the meaning is that charity, begun in this life, is perfected in the life to come; when it is doubled, it is because on the greater feasts we desire to show a more ardent charity. Except the Alleluias, few Antiphons are sung in Paschal time, for the joy of the season inflames of itself, and without extraneous suggestion, the charity of the clergy. On most Sundays the Antiphons at vespers are taken from both Testaments, but in Paschal time only from the New. On the greater Antiphons, see the article ADVENT.

The Antiphons of the B. V. M. formed no part of the original Church office; they came into the breviary later. They are four in number, one for each season of the year. The first, "Alma Redemptoris," sung from Advent to Candlemas, was written by Hermannus Contractus, who died in 1054. Chaucer's beautiful use of this in the Prioresses Tale shows how popular a canticle it must have been with our forefathers. The second, "Ave Regina," sung from Candlemas to Maundy Thursday, was written about the same time, but the author is unknown. The third, "Regina Cœli, lætare," is used in Paschal time; and the fourth, "Salve Regina" (to which, as is well known, St. Bernard added the words "O clemens," &c.), written either by Pedro of Compostella or Hermannus Contractus, is sung from Trinity to Advent.

ANTIPHONARY. The book in which the antiphons of the breviary, with the musical notes belonging to them, are contained.

ANTIPOPES. In the first twelve centuries of her existence the Church was disturbed some twenty-five times by rival claimants of the Papacy. The strife thus originated was always an occasion of scandal, sometimes of violence and bloodshed, but in most cases it was easy for men of honest will to distinguish between the true Pope and the Antipope or false claimant. It was very different in the great schism of the fourteenth century. For forty years two and even three pretenders to the Papacy claimed the allegiance of Catholics: whole countries, learned men and canonised saints, ranged themselves on different sides, and even now it is not perhaps absolutely certain who was Pope and who Antipope.

It is usually said that Novatian, who became the leader of a schismatical party at Rome in 251, was the first Antipope, but Döllinger ("Hippolytus and Callistus," Engl. Tr. p. 91 seq.) argues with weighty reasons that he was anticipated thirty years before by Hippolytus, the supposed author of the "Philosophumena." In the election of Felix II. (A.D. 355–6) a new element appears which was often to manifest itself again—viz. the influence of the Court. The Arian Emperor Constantius, after removing Pope Liberius from Rome, compelled three disreputable bishops (κατασκόπους· οὐ γὰρ ἂν τις εἴποι ἐπισκόπους) "to establish as bishop in the palace a certain Felix, who was worthy of them." So Athanasius writes ("Ad Monach. et Hist. Arian." 75) only three years after the event, and we can scarcely doubt that his account is accurate in the main. It is accepted, e.g., by Natalis Alexander (Diss. xxxii. a. 3 in Sæc. iv.), Hefele ("Concil." i. p. 661), and many other Catholic authorities. But Felix is commemorated as a saint in the Latin Church on July 29, and Pagi ("In Annal. Baron." ad ann. 357, n. 3, ad 357, n. 16 seq.) tries to show that he was no Arian intruder, but succeeded Liberius upon his resignation. After Felix, we meet with no more heretical Antipopes, although Laurentius (498) was supported by the Byzantine Court in the belief that he would approve the Henoticon of the Emperor Zeno.

Indeed, for many centuries Antipopes were upheld simply by factions among the clergy and people, who had the power of election. Thus Eulalius (418–19) was supported by a minority of clergy and people, and by the Prefect Symmachus; he was finally expelled by the Emperor Honorius (Fleury, "H. E." xxiv. 7 seq.). Laurentius (498) had a party of the people and Festus the patrician on his side; the case was decided against him by the Arian king Theodoric (ib. xxx. 48). Dioscorus (530) was raised by popular faction and died a month afterwards (ib. xxxii. 21). Pascal (687–692) gained a party among the people and the favour of John, Exarch of Ravenna, by bribery (ib. xl. 39). The tumultuous mob which chose John (844) abandoned him almost immediately (ib. xlviii. 15). The deputies of the Emperor Lothair and the arms of the Frankish soldiers enabled the usurper Anastasius to defy the true Pope Benedict III. for a brief space in 855[1] (ib. xlix. 26). A new complication occurred in 964. Benedict V. does not deserve to be called Antipope. He was duly elected by the Roman people. But the Romans had sworn in the previous year that they would not proceed to elect a Pope except with the Emperor's consent and according to his wishes. Benedict was degraded and humbly confessed his sin (Hefele, "Concil." p. 619 seq.) In the two following centuries we find a number of Antipopes raised to this bad eminence by the violence of popular and baronial factions in the darkest age of the Church's history. Such were Franco, a deacon of the Roman Church, who took the title of Boniface VII. and usurped the Roman bishopric in 975 and again in 984 (Fleury, lvi. 36, lvii. 12); John XVI. (Philogathus), who won his place by bribery in 997 (ib. lvii. 49); a certain Gregory who headed a party after a contested election in 1012 (ib. lviii. 35). It was believed till quite lately that the Church in the middle of the eleventh century was distracted for the first time by the claims of three rival Popes. The recent investigations of Steindorff have shown this supposition to be inaccurate, and his conclusions are accepted by Hefele in his second edition. The following seem to be the facts of the case. In 1033 the Count of Tusculum raised his son, a boy of twelve, to the Papal throne. He called himself Bene-

[1] At this time the fabulous Pope Joan is said to have reigned. The story first appeared in a book by the French Dominican Stephen de Bourbon (d. 1261); then in early MSS. of the history of Martinus Polonus, also a Dominican (d. 1279). The work of Polonus was the popular history of the middle ages, and obtained universal belief for the legend. It found a place in the Mirabilia Urbis Romæ, a sort of handbook for strangers visiting Rome. Nay, acquiescence in the fable induced John XX. to style himself "John XXI." It was not till the fifteenth century that doubts arose, and the Calvinist Blondel (Joanna Papissa, Amstelodam. 1657) first demonstrated the unhistorical character of the legend. He was followed by Leibnitz (Flores Sparsi in tumulum Papissæ, Goetting. 1758), and by nearly all historians since. (Döllinger, Papstfabeln, 1 seq.)

dict IX. In 1044 this "devil on the chair of Peter" was overthrown in a popular uproar, and Silvester III., not without simony, succeeded to his place. He in turn, after the lapse of a year, resigned in favour of Gregory VI., an excellent man, though apparently he bribed Benedict to resign. Although therefore there were not three rival Popes, still there were three parties in the Roman Church and some reason to fear that a triple schism might arise. It was this fear which induced the German King Henry III. to interfere. A council of Sutri deposed Gregory and Silvester, Benedict was deposed the same year in a synod of Rome, and Suidger of Bamberg, at the recommendation of the king, was canonically elected. He took the title of Clement II. (Hefele, "Concil." iv. p. 706 seq.)

The election of the Antipope Cadalaus (the name is spelt in many ways), known as Honorius II., has greater and wider interest, connected as it is with the general history of the Church. The party of reform chose Alexander II. Beatrice of Canossa was zealous in his cause, and he was acknowledged as true Pope in 1062 at a synod of Augsburg. But many feared the strong measures a good Pope might take against the simony and concubinage prevalent among the clergy. The Lombard bishops were determined to have a Pope who came from the Paradise of Italy (i.e. Lombardy), and who would have patience with human weakness. A powerful party at Rome was at one with them, at least on the latter point. Thus it came to pass that Cadalaus, bishop of Parma, a man of licentious life, was chosen Pope at a council of Basle by the Lombard prelates and Roman deputies in 1061, took the title of Honorius II., and was invested by the young King Henry IV. with the insignia of the Papacy just twenty-eight days after the cardinal bishops had elected Alexander II. The schism was a formidable one. The German Court abandoned the cause of Cadalaus at the synod of Augsburg, but he found favour even after that with the Empress Agnes and with the king, and he had money and arms at his command. He died in 1072. (Hefele, "Concil." iv. p. 870 seq.)

Next comes a series of Antipopes in the long strife between the Empire and the Papacy. Guibert of Ravenna, the favourite of Henry IV., was recognised by the Ghibelline party as Clement III.; he was followed by the Antipopes Theodoric and Albert. In like manner Burdinus of Braga, under the Emperor Henry V., became the Antipope Gregory VIII. (Hergenröther, "Kirchengeschichte," i. p. 767). Anacletus II., a son of Peter Leone and of Jewish family, was chosen by a party among the cardinals in 1130, but by means of simony. His opponent, Innocent II., won the allegiance of the Catholic world as a whole, but Anacletus was upheld by the Normans in Calabria, by the Duke of Aquitaine, and others. After his death in 1138, his party transferred their homage to another Antipope, Victor IV. (ib. 771–3). Once more under Frederic I., the war between the Imperial and Papal parties called new Antipopes into existence. The first of these, also called Victor IV., had won the votes of the Ghibelline majority among the cardinals. He was acknowledged by a synod of Pavia in 1160, and the true Pope, Alexander III., took refuge in France. Another Antipope, Paschal III. (Guido Clemens), followed in 1164, and another Calixtus III. (John de Struma), in 1168. Frederic ceased to maintain the schism after the peace of Venice in 1177, and the Antipope himself submitted to Alexander III. Some of the Barons tried to continue the schism by declaring Lando Siterio Pope, but the attempt failed utterly and at once, and Pope Alexander, who died in 1181, had seen the fall of no less than four pretenders to the Papacy.

For about two centuries no Antipope disturbed the Church's peace, but in 1378 the election of Urban VI. occasioned a schism rightly called the great, since it was the most grievous ever known. Gregory XI. had just brought the "Babylonish captivity" of Avignon to an end. It is said that, as he received the sacraments of the dying, he warned others against certain persons who advanced ideas of their own as divine inspirations, lamented the step they had induced him to take, and expressed his dread of the consequences to the Church. There were sixteen cardinals present at Rome, of whom eleven were Frenchmen, four Italians, and one, Peter de Luna, a Spaniard. Gregory, a few days before his death, had empowered them to hold a conclave at any place and without waiting for their colleagues (Raynald. ad. ann. 1378, n. 2). On April 7, 1378, they assembled in the Vatican. Their task was far from easy. It would have been natural for them to elect a Frenchman, but on the other hand, the Romans earnestly demanded a Roman or at least an Italian Pope. An April 8, Bartholomew of Prignano, archbishop of Bari, was elected, and he was crowned on Easter Sunday under the title of Urban VI. French contemporary writers with scarcely an exception represent the cardinals as constrained by violence. They were told by the populace that they must elect an Italian or die; nor were signs wanting that the Roman mob meant to keep their word. There are, however, very strong reasons for refusing belief to these French accounts. Dietrich of Niem, a German and an official in the Papal Court at the time, assures us that the election was perfectly free, that the people did indeed beg the cardinals to promote an Italian, but used no force or threats, and that the tumult did not occur till the election was over. Dietrich must have known the truth, and there is every ground to think he told it, for he was by no means an enthusiastic admirer of Pope Urban. The testimony of St. Catherine of Sweden, given at length by Raynaldus (ad ann. 1379, n. 20) is to the same effect. She was present in Rome at the time, and talked over the matter with many of the cardinals. But the most conclusive document is the letter also given in full by Raynaldus (ad ann. 1378, n. 19), which the sixteen electors addressed on April 19 to their brother-cardinals at Avignon. They declare that they had chosen Urban freely and unanimously, and we know that they acknowledged him for several months without a protest.

However, Urban's harshness and imprudence alienated the Sacred College, and in August of that same year the French cardinals declared that the election had been constrained, and renounced all allegiance to Urban, whom they called "an apostate" and "an accursed Antichrist" (Raynald. ad ann. 1378, n. 48 seq.) They persuaded three out of the four Italian cardinals to join them at Fondi, where, on September 20, the Cardinal of Geneva was elected, and became Clement VII. Urban found himself deserted by every cardinal, for the fourth Italian member of the college (Tebaldeschi) was dead. All the cardinals at Avignon accepted Clement, who soon after established himself, and was acknowledged Pope in France, Lorraine, Savoy, Scotland, Naples, and Spain. The rest of the Catholic world belonged to the obedience of Urban. St. Catherine of Siena was eager in the cause of Urban; St. Vincent Ferrar equally so for the Popes of the other line. Urban was followed by Boniface IX. (1389–1404); Innocent VII. (1404–6); Gregory XII. 1407–9. On Clement's death in 1394, he was replaced by the famous Peter de Luna, Benedict XIII.

The Council of Pisa in 1409 tried to remove the scandal of a double line of Popes anathematising each other and dividing the allegiance of Christendom. In Session XV. both Popes were deposed, and in the nineteenth, Alexander V. was elected. For a time this made matters worse, for neither Gregory nor Benedict admitted the validity of the sentence, so that there were now three claimants of the Papacy—viz. Gregory XII., Benedict XIII. and Alexander V. Still, Alexander's successor, John XXIII. was accepted by the Emperor Sigismund, and by the greater part of the Church.

Another attempt at peace was made by the Council of Constance. It annulled the pretensions of all three Popes. Of these, Gregory resigned willingly. John was deposed in session xii., May 1415, and Benedict XIII. in session xxvii., two years later. Martin V. was then chosen Pope by the twenty-three cardinals and six deputies from each of the four nations into which the council was divided.

Here the schism virtually ended, and Martin V. ruled over all Catholics. Nevertheless, Benedict XIII. held out at the Castle of Peniscola, on the Catalonian coast. He had received the deputies who brought him the sentence of deposition with solemn protest; he maintained to the last that the little church of his obedience was the ark of salvation, and that he himself was the centre of unity. With his last breath in 1423 he bade his cardinals provide for the election of a successor, which they did by promoting the Canon Muñoz[1] as Clement VII. He, however, resigned the tiara in 1429, and allowed his cardinals to elect "Otto Colonna, known in his obedience as Martin V." Muñoz became Bishop of the Balearic Isles.

Amadeus, Count and afterwards first

[1] There were only four "cardinals" in Benedict's obedience. Three chose Muñoz; a fourth elected himself, and took the title "Benedict XIV." He was defended by the Count of Armagnac.

Duke of Savoy and Count of Geneva, was the last of the Antipopes. He was chosen by the Council of Basle, then schismatical, in 1439, and crowned at Basle in the following year. He submitted in 1449 to Pope Nicolas V., who made him cardinal and perpetual vicar of the Holy See in the territories of Savoy, Basle, Strasburg, &c. He died at Ripaille in 1451.

ANTISTES. A title frequently applied in ecclesiastical history, and in the prayers of the Church, to a prelate or bishop.

APOCRISIARIUS (ἀποκρίνεσθαι, to answer). Ecclesiastical, but chiefly Papal, emissaries to the Court of the Emperor were designated by this name from the fourth to the ninth century. So long as the civil power persecuted the Church, there was no place for such officials; but after the conversion of Constantine, the recognition by the Roman emperors of the divinity of Christianity and the claims of the hierarchy gave rise to numberless questions, within the borderland of the civil and the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, which it was important for the Popes to press on the notice of the emperors, and obtain definite answers upon, so that a practical adjustment might become possible. The Apocrisiarius, therefore, corresponded to the Nuncio or Legate a latere of later times, and was usually a deacon of the Roman Church. Gregory the Great resided in this character for three years at Constantinople in the reign of the Emperor Mauricius. After the middle of the eighth century we hear no more of such an emissary, because the adoption of the extravagances of the Iconoclasts by the imperial Court led to a breach with Rome. But when Charlemagne revived the Empire of the West, similar diplomatic relations arose between him and the Holy See, which again required the appointment of Apocrisiarii. It appears that under the first Frankish emperors the imperial archchaplain was at the same time Papal Apocrisiarius. Subsequently the name was given to officials of Court nomination, who held no commission from Rome; and in this way the title in its old sense came to be disused, and was replaced by Legatus [q. v.] or Nuntius.

APOCRYPHA (from ἀπόκρυφος, hidden). It corresponds to the Jewish word נגנז, which the Jews applied to books withdrawn from public use in the synagogue, on account of their unfitness for public reading.[1] But the later Jews had also the notion that some books should be withdrawn from general circulation because of the mysterious truths they contained.[2]

The early Fathers used "apocryphal" to denote the forged books of heretics, borrowing, perhaps, the name from the heretics themselves, who vaunted the "apocryphal"[3] or "hidden" wisdom of these writings. Later—e.g. in the "Prologus galeatus" of Jerome—apocryphal is used in a milder sense to mark simply that a book is not in the recognised canon of Scripture; and Pope Gelasius,[4] in a decree of 494, uses the term apocryphal in a very wide manner, (1) of heretical forgeries; (2) of books like the "Shepherd of Hermas," revered by the ancients, but not a part of Scripture; (3) works by early Christian writers (Arnobius, Cassian, &c.) who had erred on some points of doctrine. We need scarcely add that the Protestant custom of calling Wisdom, Machabees, &c., "Apocrypha," is contrary to the faith and tradition of the Church. [See CANON OF THE SCRIPTURE.]

The name is now usually reserved by Catholics for books, laying claim to an origin which might entitle them to a place in the canon, or which have been supposed to be Scripture, but which have been finally rejected by the Church. In the Old Testament the most important apocryphal books are—3 and 4 Esdras, both of which are cited by early writers as Scripture, the latter being also used in the Missal and Breviary; 3 and 4 Machabees; the prayer of Manasses, which is found in Greek MSS. of the Old Testament, and is often printed, in a Latin version, in the appendix to the Vulgate; the book of Enoch (cf. Jude 14), which Tertullian regarded as authentic (it only exists at present in an Ethiopic version); a 151st Psalm attributed to David, which is found in Greek MSS., and in the Syriac, Ethiopic, and Arabic versions of the Psalms; eighteen psalms attributed to Solomon, written originally, according to some scholars, in Hebrew, according to others, in Greek.[5]

There is a great mass of New Testament apocryphal literature. Some books, such as the "Epistle of Barnabas," the two "Epistles of Clement," the "Shepherd of Hermas," may in a certain sense be called apocryphal, because, though not really belonging to Scripture, they were quoted as such by ancient writers, or were inserted in MSS. of the New Testament. Some other books mentioned by Eusebius —viz. the "Acts of Paul," the "Apocalypse of Peter," the "Teachings of the Apostles" (διδαχαὶ τῶν Ἀποστόλων), seem to have belonged to this better class of apocryphal literature. Besides these, Eusebius mentions apocryphal books in circulation among heretics—viz. the "Gospels" of Peter, Thomas, Matthias; the "Acts" of Andrew, John, and the rest of the Apostles.[1] Fragments remain of the ancient Gospels "according to the Hebrews," "of the Nazarenes," "according to the Egyptians," of the preaching and Apocalypse of Peter, &c., and have been repeatedly edited.[2]

Later times were no less fruitful in apocryphal literature, and we still possess a great number of these later forgeries, entire and complete. They have been edited by Fabricius in the work already named; by Thilo, "Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti," 1831, of which work only the first volume, containing the apocryphal Gospels, appeared; by Tischendorf ("Evangelia Apocrypha," 1876, second edition enlarged; "Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha," 1851; "Apocryphal Apocalypses," 1866), and by other scholars. This is not the place to attempt an enumeration of these apocryphal books, but we may mention some which enjoyed a special popularity in the Church, and exercised a marked influence on Catholic literature. A number of apocryphal Gospels treat of the infancy and youth of our Lord, and of the history of his blessed Mother and foster-father. Among these the "Protevangelium of James" holds the first place. It describes the early history of Mary, our Lord's birth at Bethlehem, and the history of the wise men from the East. This gospel was much used by the Greek Fathers; portions of it were read publicly in the Eastern Church, and it was translated into Arabic and Coptic. It was prohibited for a time among the Latins, but even in the West it was much used during the middle ages. Other Gospels, such as the Arabic "Evangelium Infantiæ Salvatoris," contain legendary miracles of our Lord's infancy. We have a second class of apocryphal Gospels which treat of the Passion and Resurrection of Christ. Of this class is the "Gospel of Nicodemus." It is probably of very late origin, but it was a favourite book in the middle ages. The Greek text still exists, but it was also circulated, before the invention of printing, in Latin, Anglo-Saxon, German, and French. Closely connected with this Gospel are a number of documents which have sprung from very ancient but spurious "Acts of Pilate." These ancient Acts which were known to Justin and Tertullian, have perished, but they called forth several imitations which still survive. The one which is best known is a letter of Lentulus to the Roman senate describing the personal appearance of our Lord. It is a forgery of the middle ages.

Further, apocryphal literature is rich in "Acts of the Apostles," and here, as in the apocryphal Gospels, we find early but spurious Acts, revised and enlarged, and so originating fresh forgeries. Thus the "Acts of Paul and Thecla," in their existing form, are the recension of a very early work—forged as early at least as Tertullian's time. The fullest of all these "Acts" is the "Historia Certaminis Apostolorum." It can scarcely be older than the ninth century, but it is of considerable value, because the author has made diligent use of earlier Acts, some of which have perished.

Of apocryphal Epistles we have, among others, a letter of St. Paul to the Laodiceans (only existing in Latin), which, though rejected by Jerome, was accepted as canonical by many great Latin theologians of a later day, won a place in many copies of the Latin Bible, and for more than nine centuries "hovered about the doors of the sacred canon."[1] We may also mention a letter of St. Paul to the Corinthians, and another of the Corinthians to St. Paul (both only in Armenian); letters supposed to have passed between St. Paul and Seneca (known to Jerome and Augustine); spurious letters of the Blessed Virgin, to St. Ignatius, to the inhabitants of Messina, &c. &c.

Lastly, we have apocryphal Apocalypses of Paul (called also ἀναβατικόν; see 2 Cor. xii. 1), Thomas, Stephen—nay, even of St. John himself.

APOLLINARIANISM. Apollinaris was the son of a grammarian, also called Apollinaris, who migrated from Alexandria to Laodicea, where the younger Apollinaris was born, and of which city he afterwards became bishop. He was distinguished, not only for his great literary knowledge and skill, but also for his austerity of life. He was a voluminous author. He wrote in defence of the Christian religion against Porphyry, and showed like zeal against the Arians, who in revenge inflicted a cruel wrong upon him. He was dear in his youth to St. Athanasius, and he was in friendly relations with SS. Epiphanius, Basil, Gregory of Nazianzus. Hence, for a long time the Catholics were unwilling to believe that the errors attributed to him were really his. Athanasius wrote against his heresy without mentioning his name, and at the Alexandrian Council of 362, the Apollinarians seem either to have retracted their errors for the moment, or else to have deceived the Catholic bishops.[1] But "towards 375 or 376," says Fleury, "their errors manifested themselves so plainly as to make further toleration impossible. The Egyptian bishops exiled in Palestine for the faith opposed [Apollinaris] vigorously,"[2] and St. Basil wrote against the heresiarch. Apollinaris was condemned in a Roman synod under Pope Damasus in 374. Two years later, the same Pope, in another Roman synod, anathematised the heresy and deposed Apollinaris with his two disciples Timothy and Vitalis, Apollinarist bishops at Alexandria and Antioch.[3] They were condemned again in the first canon of the Second General Council and their assemblies were forbidden by Theodosius.

Apollinaris was not always consistent with himself, and it is not easy to distinguish his doctrine from later accretions, which it may have received through his followers. A full account of his doctrine so far as it can be ascertained will be found in Petavius,[4] from whom we have taken the following summary:—

First, Apollinaris, like the Arians, denied that our Lord had a human intelligence. He admitted that Christ had a soul by which He lived and felt, but he said that the place of the intellect and spirit were supplied by the eternal Word. A human intelligence, he argued, would have been useless to our Lord, and inconsistent with His sinlessness, because a created intelligence must needs be peccable. Here Apollinaris virtually denied that Christ is perfect man, and destroyed all real belief in the Incarnation.

Next, he, or at least his followers, held that our Lord's flesh was of one substance with His divinity, so that the divinity actually suffered and died. They denied that He took flesh from the Blessed Virgin, asserting that Christ brought His body with Him from heaven, and that this body existed "before the ages." On this point, the Apollinarians repeated an old Gnostic error, and were the forerunners of the Monophysites. They objected to the Catholic doctrine, according to which Christ is true man, because they thought it introduced a fourth person over and above the three Persons of the Trinity. As Apollinaris denied the humanity of Christ by depriving Him of an intelligent soul, so he did in reality deny His divinity, for a Godhead which can die or suffer is no Godhead at all. (See Petav. loc. cit.; Fleury: Newman, "Tracts Theological and Ecclesiastical," 257 seq.)

APOLOGIST. The word is used generally to denote writers who defend Christianity and the Church from attack. It is also applied in a special sense to those Christian writers of the first four centuries, who vindicated the faith and discipline of Christ from the torrent of obloquy to which they were exposed in Pagan society. Such were Justin Martyr, Minucius Felix, Tertullian, Theophilus, Clement of Alexandria, Lactantius, &c., besides others, such as Quadratus, Aristides, and Melito, whose works have not come down to us.

APOSTASY. It is of three kinds: that from the Christian faith; that from ecclesiastical obedience; and that from a religious profession, or from holy orders. An apostate from the faith is one who wholly abandons the faith of Christ, and joins himself to some other law, such as Judaism, Islam, Paganism, &c. It is a mistake, therefore, to brand as apostasy any kind of heresy or schism, however criminal or absurd, which still assumes to itself the Christian name. While the Turks were in the heyday of their power, and had great command over the Mediterranean, the captivity of Christians among them, and apostasy resulting from such captivity, were matters of everyday occurrence; hence a great number of decisions and opinions respecting the treatment of apostates, on their wishing to return to Christianity, may be found in the writings of canonists. The second kind of apostasy, that from ecclesiastical obedience, is when a Catholic wilfully and contumaciously sets at nought the authority of the Church. Such apostasy, if persisted in, becomes Schism [q.v.]. The third kind is that of those who abandon without permission the religious order in which they are professed: as when Luther abandoned his profession as an Augustinian, and married Catherine Bora. He is also an apostate who, after having received major orders, renounces his clerical profession, and returns to the dress and customs of the world, "an act which entails ecclesiastical infamy, and, if there is marriage, excommunication." (Ferraris, Apostasia; Mack's article in Wetzer and Welte.)

APOSTLE (from ἀπόστολος, one who is sent). The word is not much used in classical Greek except to denote "a naval expedition." In the LXX it occurs only once, 3 Kings xiv. 6, where Ahias says to the wife of Jeroboam, "I am a hard messenger (ἀπόστολος) to thee." It was, however, in common use among the later Jews, who applied it to the emissaries sent by the rulers of the race on any foreign mission. These "apostles" formed a council round the Jewish patriarch, and executed his orders abroad. Probably our Lord adopted the word from the current language of his time.[1]

The name is given in the New Testament first of all to the twelve whom our Lord chose. "The names of the twelve apostles," St. Matthew says, "are these: the first, Simon," &c. But it is by no means restricted to them: Matthias and Paul were of course Apostles, though not of the twelve; so was Barnabas.[2] Moreover, St. Paul seems to bestow the name on the seventy disciples and also upon Andronicus and Junias.[3] Certainly, in the writings of the Fathers and in the office of the Church the word is used of persons like Silas, Timothy, Luke, and others who were associated with Paul in his work.[4] Finally, the word Apostle in the New Testament still retains its wide and original meaning of messenger.[5]

It is plain, however, from Scripture and tradition, and from the very fact that the Church was an organised body, that the office of Apostle was something definite and distinct. It has been argued that an Apostle, in the strict sense, had to be taken from those who had seen our Lord, and that the office of the Apostolate was always accompanied with the power of working miracles. Neither of these points can be proved. No doubt, it was providentially arranged that the twelve should be able to give personal witness to the resurrection, and St. Paul himself appeals to his having seen our Lord as proof of his equality with the older Apostles. No doubt, God did confirm the teaching of the Apostles by giving extraordinary efficacy to their words, and setting his seal to it by miracles. But this is no proof that the essential character of the Apostolate depended either on the gift of miracles or on having seen our Lord. There are, however, three marks of the Apostolic office which necessarily belong to it, and which, taken together, separate it from all other ecclesiastical dignities. First, the Apostles were bishops, and so had the sacrament of order in all its fullness; they were able to consecrate and ordain, to confirm, &c. Next, either mediately, through the ministry of man, or immediately from God Himself, they had received a commission to preach the Gospel throughout the world. They were to be witnesses to Christ "even to the end of the earth." Thirdly, they received full and perfect power of binding and loosing, of founding Churches, of ordaining bishops and other ecclesiastics, throughout the world. This universal jurisdiction, however, they were obliged to exercise in union with St. Peter, who was the centre of unity and head of the Church, and in subordination to him. Further, this universal jurisdiction was peculiar to themselves; they could not—except in a certain modified sense, which will be explained presently—transmit it to their successors. It is Peter only, who had any individual successor in his primacy and his universal jurisdiction. Accordingly, if we are asked how far the Apostolic office continues in the Church, we may answer briefly as follows:—In episcopal order and in universal jurisdiction (i.e. in two out of the three notes of an Apostle) the bishops of Rome are the successors of St. Peter. Other bishops succeed the Apostles in order only, not in universal jurisdiction. But the episcopate conjointly have universal jurisdiction, and so together represent the Apostolic college. This jurisdiction they exercise in subordination to the Pope, as the Apostles exercised theirs in subjection to St. Peter. (See Petav. "De Hierarch." i. 5 and 6.)

APOSTLES' CREED. [See CREED.]

APOSTLES, FEASTS OF. Before the fifth century the Roman calendar contained no festivals proper to any of the Apostles except that of SS. Peter and Paul, on June 29. Low Sunday—the Gospel of which recalls the grant of spiritual powers by the risen Christ to the assembled Apostles—was often called in antiquity "the Sunday of the Apostles"; it was one of the chief feasts in the Ethiopian calendar. In the Sacramentary of Pope Leo all the Apostles are commemorated on June 29; for in the Mass for that day there is a collect which runs, "Omnipotens sempiterne Deus, qui nos omnium apostolorum merita sub una tribuisti celebritate venerari." Hence the "Festival of the Twelve Apostles," (Σύναξις τῶν δώδεκα Ἀποστόλων) came to be, and is still, observed in the Greek Church on June 30. St. Jerome gives as a reason for having but one festival for the Apostles, "ut dies varii non videantur dividere quos una dignitas apostolica in cœlesti gloria fecit esse sublimes." The feast of the "Division of the Apostles," referring to their final dispersion from Jerusalem thirteen years after the Ascension, occurs in the Roman calendar on the 15th of July. The feast of SS. Philip and James was fixed on the 1st of May, after the translation of their relics into the "Basilica omnium Apostolorum" at Rome in the sixth century; November 30th was fixed as the feast of St. Andrew by a bull of Boniface VIII. in 1295.

APOSTOLIC CANONS. A tradition (accepted because unexamined) long prevailed that these Canons were dictated by the Apostles themselves to St. Clement of Rome, who committed them to writing. Accurate research has dispelled this notion. Yet although all are agreed that they do not come to us with the weight of Apostolic sanction, their real value and the antiquity that should be assigned to them are still much disputed, and they have been, and still are, appealed to as an important witness in many modern controversies. Daillé the Calvinist, astounded at the important, or rather, essential, place which they assign to bishops in the Christian economy, strove to prove that they were a work of no earlier date than the fifth century. The Anglican divines Beveridge and Pearson, especially the former, having as they conceived a deep interest in proving the acceptance by the primitive Church of high views of episcopal power, examined with great learning and power the question of the origin of these Canons, and endeavoured to prove that they must have been compiled not later than the end of the second or beginning of the third century. The latest German researches (see Kraus' "Real Encykl.") tend to the conclusion that, as collections, that of the first fifty Canons [see below] cannot be dated earlier than the middle of the fourth, while the remainder must be assigned to the sixth century. Bunsen, in his work on "Hippolytus and his Age," printed a translation of the Canons and also of several versions of the Constitutions, with a voluminous commentary, the intent of which is to show that these ancient documents "know of no sacrifice of the Mass, acknowledge no definition of the Catholic Church," and, generally, are in "flagrant contradiction" with the later canon law. That one of the authors of that strange hybrid the "Evangelical Church of Prussia" could have persuaded himself that the spirit which breathes from the Canons resembles in any way that which dictated the ecclesiastical legislation of the Prussian Government, is surely a singular instance of self-deception! The temperate statement of Soglia seems to come much nearer the truth. From these Canons, he says, it may be clearly seen and proved, "that the ordinations of bishops, presbyters, and other clerics are no growth of a later discipline, that the dogma of the oblation and sacrifice of the Mass is not new, nor the distinction between clergy and laity, nor the power of a bishop over his clergy, nor excommunication, nor many other similar institutes, which have been assailed by heretics on the score of novelty."

After briefly describing what the Canons are, we shall reproduce the judgment which competent theologians have formed of their contents.

The Apostolic Canons are usually found in MSS. appended to the last or eighth book of the Apostolical Constitutions. In some copies they are but fifty in number, in others eighty-five. The collection of fifty exists in a Latin form, having been translated by Dionysius Exiguus from the original Greek towards the end of the fifth century. These fifty were always regarded in the West as authoritative in a sense in which the remaining Canons were not; in the East no such distinction was made between them and the other thirty-five. From the analysis made by Drey ("Neue Untersuchungen," &c.) it would appear that twenty-two out of the whole number substantially embody injunctions and rules contained in the extant apostolic epistles; ten are closely connected, both in time and import, with these; twenty date from the age of the great persecutions; and the remainder are assignable to the Nicene and post-Nicene periods. With regard to their contents, "the greater number, 76 out of 85, relate to the clergy, their ordination, the conditions of consecration, their official ministrations, orthodoxy, morality, and subordination, also to their temporalities, and to the relation of the diocese to the province; so that it is clear that the regulation of the discipline affecting ecclesiastical persons was the main object of the collection."

With regard to the authority that should be assigned to them, while on the one hand the Emperors Constantine, Theodosius, and Justinian, the Council of Ephesus, and especially St. John Damascene, who ranks them with the Canon of the New Testament, are all in their favour, the consensus of opinion against them, since the sixteenth century, when they were first critically examined, is very strong. It is urged that Eusebius and St. Jerome are silent, though if such a collection of Canons had come down from the Apostles, they must have known of them; also that in the controversy (third century) between Pope Victor and St. Cyprian, neither party appealed to them, though, had they been generally known, and believed to be genuine, they would at once have decided the point in dispute. Again, it is plain that many things mentioned in them—e.g. metropolitans, division of dioceses, distinction of Church from episcopal property, &c.—are of post-Apostolic age. Thirdly, they teach in many places a doctrine which it is impossible to ascribe to the Apostles, as when (No. 17) they forbid only that a man who has been twice married after his baptism should be admitted into the ranks of the clergy, whereas the letter of Innocent I. (404) to Victricius, bishop of Rouen, proves that a second marriage disqualified from ordination, even when the first had been contracted before baptism; or (No. 66) when they lay down an unwise rule on fasting; or (Nos. 46, 47) enjoin as to the re-baptism of heretics the contrary of that which Victor, following the true apostolic tradition, maintained in the dispute with Cyprian. Either therefore it must be said that the Church teaches a doctrine and discipline repugnant to what the Apostles taught—an assertion which would be impious—or it must be allowed that these Canons, in their entirety at least, cannot be ascribed to the Apostles.

That Bunsen should have thought that these Canons breathed a spirit alien from that of the Roman Church is extraordinary. In them we view the Catholic Church as one body, attaching great importance to unity, knowing its own mind, imposing a strict discipline on all its members lay and clerical, just as we see the Church in communion with Rome doing at this day. The thirty-fifth Canon, enjoining on bishops obedience to their metropolitans in the interest of that "unanimity" by which God is glorified, foreshadows—one might almost say, suggests—the language of the Leos and the Gregories concerning the chair of Peter, for what could prevent dissension among the metropolitans, unless they, too, had some one to look up to and obey?

APOSTOLIC FATHERS. A name given to Christian authors who wrote in the age succeeding that of the Apostles. Hefele's edition of the Apostolic Fathers (4th ed. Tübingen, 1855) contains:—(1) An epistle, falsely ascribed to St. Barnabas. Hefele places it between 107–120. (2) Two letters (so-called) of Clement, Bishop of Rome. The former of the two (genuine), is assigned to the close of the first century. The second (spurious), is not a letter, but a homily of uncertain date. (3) The letters of St. Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch. Seven letters in the shorter Greek recension are genuine; they belong to the early part of the second century. (4) A letter of Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, and disciple of St. John. (5) An anonymous epistle to Diognetus. Hefele and many others suppose, that the author lived shortly after the Apostles. (6) The "Shepherd of Hermas," an apocalyptic book, dating probably from the middle of the second century. (7) An account of the martyrdom of St. Polycarp, given by the contemporary Church of Smyrna. (8) Early Acts of the Martyrdom of St. Ignatius. The great edition of Cotelerius, appeared at Paris, 1662. It does not give the epistle to Diognetus, and on the other hand contains the Pseudo-Clementine writings, with the Apostolic Canons and Constitutions. An elaborate account of the whole literature of the subject will be found in the new edition by Gebhardt, Harnack and Zahn (Leipsic, 1876 seq).

APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS (διατάξεις or διαταγαί). Eight books, devoted to the discussion of ecclesiastical affairs. They profess to contain the words of the Apostles written down by St. Clement of Rome. The first Greek printed text was edited by Turrianus, and published in 1563.

The spurious character of the book was soon evident to Catholic scholars, such as Baronius, Bellarmine, and Petavius, who were at one, at least on the main point, with Protestants like Daillé and Blondel. But it is more difficult to say when the foundation of the book was laid, and when it took its present form. Eusebius mentions the "so-called teachings of the Apostles" (τῶν ἀποστόλων αἱ λεγόμεναι διδαχαί), and similarly Athanasius speaks of the "teaching of the Apostles," but it is doubtful whether they refer to some work of which the present "Constitutions" are a later recension. Epiphanius quotes the "Constitution of the Apostles" (διάταξις), but his quotations never exactly correspond to, while one of them differs widely from, our present text.

Pearson assigns the work, as it stands, to the middle of the fifth century. Lagarde, one of the leading modern authorities on the subject, says it is now the general opinion of the learned, that the book "grew up secretly" in the third century, and that, the last two books, (7th and 8th) were added afterwards. There is an excellent edition by De Lagarde, 1862.

APOSTOLICI. A sect of Gnostics described by St. Epiphanius in his work on heresies; they called themselves by this name because they pretended to imitate the Apostles in absolutely renouncing the world. They held matter to be altogether corrupt and impure, and consequently rejected marriage, though they appear not to have been averse to irregular connections. They were at no time numerous, and were dying out when Epiphanius wrote. In the twelfth century a sect appeared in Rhineland, and also in France, which took the same name, and held to a great extent the same doctrines; but these Apostolics allowed of marriage. St. Bernard preached two sermons against them. They were always reviling the hierarchy, the corruption of which they declared to be so great as to have vitiated all the sacraments of the Church except that of Baptism. A similar sect, calling themselves "Apostolic Brethren," appeared in North Italy towards the end of the thirteenth century; their leaders, Segarelli and Dulcino, both suffered at the stake. For an account of their wild fanatical tenets, see Milman's "Latin Christianity," vii. 360.

APOSTOLICUS. The word was applied to bishops generally in the ancient Church, rather, however, as an epithet than as a title. Then it was restricted to metropolitans or primates; thus Pope Siricius writes (about A.D. 390), "ut extra conscientiam sedis apostolicæ, id est, primatis, nemo audeat ordinare." Even Alcuin, writing at the beginning of the ninth century, uses the word in this sense. Yet long before this the use of the term "sedes apostolica" κατ' ἐξοχήν, for the see of Rome (comp. Beda's "Hist. Eccl." passim), had laid a foundation for the restriction of the term Apostolicus to the Roman Pontiff. From the ninth century onwards we find it applied only to the Popes, and in course of time it came to be used of them as a title and official designation. The Council of Rheims (1049) recognised the right of the Pope to this title, "quod solus Romanæ sedis pontifex universalis ecclesiæ primas esset et Apostolicus," and excommunicated an archbishop of Compostella for assuming to himself "culmen Apostolici nominis," the eminence of the Apostolic name. In the middle ages, Apostolicus (in Norman French apostoile) became the current name for the reigning Pope. (Kraus' "Real Encykl.;" Smith and Cheetham.)

APPEAL. He who appeals has recourse to the justice of a superior judge from what he conceives to be the unjust sentence of an inferior judge.

Appeals may be either judicial or extra-judicial. A judicial appeal is from the sentence of a judge acting as a judge. An extra-judicial appeal is from the injurious action of any superior, whereby the appellant thinks his rights are infringed—e.g. in a case of disputed patronage, or abusive exercise of power. In these cases, as the extra-judicial appeal is not in the cause, but begins or lays the foundation for the cause, it is not, properly speaking, an appeal at all. But there is one kind of extra-judicial appeal which is really such; it is when the appeal is made from a judge who has not decided judicially—e.g. who has given sentence without hearing the arguments of counsel or the evidence of witnesses when these were required or allowed by the law. In this case the appeal is extra-judicial (for it is made against an arbitrary act, rather than a motived judgment), yet it is a true appeal, for it is made from a judge to a judge.

The object of appeals is the redress of injustice, whether knowingly or ignorantly committed. An appeal need not imply that the original sentence was unjust, for the production of new evidence in the superior court may change the aspect of a case, and cause a decision which was just on the assumption of one set of facts to be justly set aside on the discovery of further facts.

Appeal can be made from any judge recognising a superior; thus no appeal is possible, in secular matters, from the decision of the sovereign power, or the highest secular tribunal, in any country, for these, in such matters, recognise no superior. Again, there can be no appeal from the Pope; "for he, as the vicar of Christ, recognises no superior on earth, and it is of the essence of an appeal that it be made from a lower to a higher judge, by whom the sentence of the first may be corrected."[1] Those who appeal from the judgment of the Pope to a future general council, of whatever rank or condition they may be, are formally excommunicated in the bull "In Cœna Domini." Nor can appeal be made from a general council legitimately convened and approved, "because it, being in union with the Roman Pontiff who approved it, represents the whole Church, from the sentence of which there can be no appeal."[2]

As a rule, appeals should proceed regularly, through all the intermediate jurisdictions, to the supreme tribunal; but canon law admits of many exceptions to this. "In the first place, all persons are at liberty to appeal to the Pope immediately, passing over all intermediate judges, in ecclesiastical and spiritual causes; and those subject to his temporal rule can do so in temporal causes also."[3] The reason is, that the Pope is "the ordinary judge of all Christians, having concurrent power with all ordinaries." Many other cases are specified in the canon law, in which appellants are authorised to appeal to a higher court at once, passing over the intermediate jurisdictions.

[1] Ferraris, Appellatio, art. iii.
[2] Ibid. [3] Ibid. § 10.

At the same time there are numerous causes in which no appeal is permitted; these are summed up in the following lines, which are a sort of memoria technica:—

Sublimis judex, scelus, exsecutio, pactum,
Contemptus, et res minimæ, dilatio nulla,
Clausula quæ removet, res quæ notoria constat,
Et textus juris clarus, possessio, fatum.

There can be no appeal from a "sublimis judex," such as the Pope, or the sovereign authority in a state. "Scelus:" that is, those convicted of criminal offences and who have confessed their guilt have no appeal. "Exsecutio:" that is, when the cause has become a "res judicata," the execution of the sentence cannot be stayed by appeal; this seems to be a particular case of "fatum." "Pactum:" if the parties have consented to a compromise during the progress of the suit, there can be no appeal. Contempt of court by a contumacious refusal to appear to the judge's citation is another cause which deprives a litigant of the right to appeal; as is (in civil causes) the utterly insignificant nature of the point raised, according to the maxim, de minimis non curat lex. "Dilatio nulla:" that is, in things which do not admit of delay, there can be no appeal—at any rate, no such appeal as would have the effect of suspending the execution of the sentence; as in a case about opening a will, or issuing supplies of food to soldiers, and the like. "Clausula quæ removet:" that is, when the original suit was conducted by delegation from the supreme tribunal under the clause "appellatione remota," the ordinary right of appeal is annulled. The next two cases explain themselves; by "possessio" is meant that brief enjoyment of the subject of litigation which does not prejudice in an appreciable degree the right of the other party; and by "fatum" those prescribed terms and dates which are otherwise named "fatalia," and the exact observance of which is necessary in order that an appeal may proceed. For instance, unless an appeal against a sentence be lodged within ten days from its delivery, it cannot be made at all.

Finally, no appeal having suspensive effect lies from a sentence of excommunication, nor from legitimate disciplinary correction of a superior paternally administered without legal process. (Ferraris, Appellatio.)

APPELLANTS. This was the name given to the party among the French clergy, headed by the Cardinal de Noailles, archbishop of Paris, and four bishops, who appealed to a future general council against the constitution Unigenitus (1713), by which the Holy See had condemned a hundred and one propositions of a more or less Jansenistic character, extracted from the writings of the Père Quesnel. [JANSENISM.]

APPROBATION. The formal judgment of a prelate, that a priest is fit to hear confessions. It does not involve jurisdiction—i.e. a bishop does not necessarily give a priest power to hear confessions in his diocese, because he pronounces him fit to do so, though in fact a bishop always or almost always gives a secular priest jurisdiction at the time he approves him. This approbation by the bishop, or one who has quasi-episcopal jurisdiction, is needed for the validity of absolution given by a secular priest, unless the said priest has a parochial benefice.[1] The bishop who approves must be the bishop of the place in which the confession is heard and this approbation may be limited as to time, place, and circumstances.

Regulars, in order to confess members of their own order, require the approval of their superiors; to confess seculars, that of the bishop of the diocese.

APSE (Greek, ἁψίς, a wheel or arch). Nothing is known of the shape of the Christian churches which were built before the time of Constantine. Assuming, therefore, that ecclesiastical architecture dates from the fourth century, the apse may be considered as one of its primitive features, for it already existed in many of the basilicas or halls of justice or commerce, which, when Christianity rose into the ascendant, were freely placed at the disposal of the bishops by the civil power. It was the semicircular termination of the basilica, in which sat the judges; the same construction may often be seen in French courts of justice at this day. When utilised for Christian worship, its extreme end was occupied by the bishop's chair; the seats of the clergy, following the semicircle, were on his right and left; the altar was in the middle of the apse, or just in front of it; and beyond the altar was the choir. In the Byzantine style, which arose in the East after Constantine had transferred the seat of empire to his new city on the Bosphorus, the apse was retained; a notable instance of this may be seen in the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, built in the sixth century. It appears also in the old Byzantine churches at Ravenna, and also in several churches on the Rhine, of later date but in the same style. In France and England the Byzantine architecture received that splendid development which is called Norman; but the apse, in all large churches at least, still held its ground, though it occasionally took a triangular or a polygonal form. Norwich Cathedral is perhaps the finest example of the round apse that we have in England. The cathedral of Durham, of which the nave and choir were finished, much as we now see them, about the beginning of the twelfth century, had originally an apse, but on account of a failure in the masonry, this was taken down and the present magnificent chapel of the Nine Altars substituted in the thirteenth century. In the later styles which followed the Norman, the French builders as a rule retained the apse, while the English generally abandoned it for the rectangular form. (Oudin, "Manuel d'Archéologie.")

ARCHANGEL. [See ANGEL.]

ARCHBISHOP (Gr. ἀρχιεπίσκοπος). The word first occurs in the fourth century; St. Athanasius speaks of himself and also of Alexander, his predecessor in the see of Alexandria, under this name. In earlier times those bishops who had suffragan bishops depending on them, and exercised spiritual jurisdiction within a certain geographical area which was their province, were called metropolitans. As Christianity extended itself, the bishops of the more important cities under the metropolitans came themselves to have suffragan bishops under them, to whom they were metropolitans. It became necessary, therefore, to find some new title for the old metropolitans, and the terms primate, exarch [see those articles] and archbishop came into use. In the West the name "archbishop" was scarcely heard before the ninth century. For a time the words patriarch and archbishop appear to have been used interchangeably. At present the terms "archbishop" and "metropolitan" have the same meaning, except that the latter implies the existence of suffragans, whereas there may be archbishops without suffragans, as in the case of Glasgow.

In the middle ages the archbishops possessed an ample jurisdiction: they had the right of summoning provincial councils; they could judge their suffragans as a tribunal of first instance, and hear on appeal causes referred to them from the episcopal courts within the province. The jurisdiction of a metropolitan over his suffragans in criminal causes was transferred by the Council of Trent (sess. xiii. De Ref. c. 8) to the Holy See; in civil causes it remains intact. Provincial councils, owing to the difficulties of the times, have been less frequent in recent times than formerly; but, by the Council of Trent (sess. xxiv. 2, De Ref.), metropolitans are bound to convene them every three years. An archbishop can receive appeals from his suffragans in marriage cases, and (with the authority of the provincial council) visit any suffragan's diocese. The right also devolves upon him of appointing a vicar capitular on the decease of a suffragan bishop, if the chapter fail to appoint one within eight days. Two venerable insignia still mark his superior dignity—the pallium with which he is invested by the Holy See, and the double cross borne on his "stemma" over his arms. An archbishop has the right of carrying his cross throughout his province, except in the presence of the Pope or a Cardinal Legate. Until the archbishop has received the pallium he can only style himself A. electus; and, although confirmed and consecrated, he cannot convoke a council, consecrate chrism, or exercise any other acts of higher jurisdiction and order.

Gregory the Great, while giving to St. Augustine personally jurisdiction over all English and British sees, designed to make London and York metropolitan sees, with twelve suffragans under each (Bed. "Hist. Eccl." i. 29). But the priority of Kent in receiving the Gospel led to the primatial see being fixed at Canterbury, not at London; and the troubled state of the North long deferred the arrangement proposed for York, and never even in the end suffered it to attain the dimensions contemplated by Pope Gregory. For a short time in the eighth century, while Mercia was a powerful kingdom, Lichfield was raised by the Holy See to metropolitan rank. Similarly the see of St. David's in Wales received the pall for a brief period in the twelfth century. At that time there were two archbishops, at Canterbury and York, with thirteen and two suffragans respectively. (Henr. Hunt. "Hist. Ang." i. 5.) After the change of religion the archiepiscopal dignity remained in abeyance in England, till revived in our days in the person of Nicholas Wiseman, who was created the first archbishop of Westminster, in 1850.

ARCHDEACON (Gr. ἀρχιδιάκονος). At a very early period it was the practice for a bishop to select one of the deacons of his church to assist him both in the divine worship and in the administration of the diocese. As was natural, his choice fell, not necessarily upon the senior deacon, but upon him in whose ability and firmness he could most confide. Thus we read of Eleutherus as the deacon of Pope Anicetus, in the second century; of St. Lawrence the deacon of Sextus II. in the third; and of St. Athanasius, who as the deacon of Alexander, the bishop of Alexandria, attended him at the Council of Nicæa. The name "Archdeacon" first occurs in the writings of St. Optatus of Milevis (about 370). The importance of the office continually grew, and we learn from St. Jerome that in his time it was considered a degradation for an archdeacon to be ordained priest. It was the duty of the archdeacon, under the bishop's direction, to manage the Church property; provide for the support of the clergy, the poor, widows, orphans, pilgrims, and prisoners; to keep the list of the clergy, &c. An able archdeacon, as was to be expected, often succeeded to the see on the death of the bishop who had appointed him. At first there was but one archdeacon, but in the immense dioceses which the conversion of the Western nations caused to arise, the episcopal duties could not be effectually performed—so far as the temporal side of them was concerned—without the appointment of several archdeacons as the bishop's delegates. That they should gradually be invested with the jurisdiction possessed by the bishop, and ultimately even receive independent powers, was a natural consequence of this state of things. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries their power rose to its height. About 1100 Remigius, upon transferring his episcopal throne from Dorchester to Lincoln, divided his vast diocese into seven archdeaconries, in each of which the archdeacon resided in the chief town of his province with quasi-episcopal state, and exercised a jurisdiction which was often formidable even to laymen. Armed with such high privileges, the archdeacons began to encroach on the authority of the bishops, and this led to their downfall. Long before this the Church had ordered that archdeacons on their appointment must receive priestly consecration; now a series of councils in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries occupied themselves with limiting their powers and bringing them back into a due subordination to the bishops; finally, the Council of Trent confirmed and extended these restrictions, taking from the archdeacons and giving back to the bishops that jurisdiction in matrimonial and criminal causes which had been the chief source of their influence. Amongst ourselves the office of archdeacon was not revived on the restoration of the hierarchy in 1850; the functionary who now most nearly corresponds to the archdeacon of the primitive Church is the bishop's vicar-general [see that article].

ARCHES, COURT OF. An ancient court, in which the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury is still exercised by a judge known as the Dean of Arches. It received its name from Bow Church in Cheapside (S. Maria de Arcubus), in which its sittings were wont to be held. (See Hook's "Church Dictionary.") By a clause in the Public Worship Act (1877) the office of Dean of Arches is merged in that of the judge appointed under that Act. There is an appeal from the sentence of this court to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which now represents the old Court of Delegates, and practically, as representing the Crown, upholds the doctrine of the royal supremacy by deciding without appeal all spiritual causes that may be brought before it.

ARCHIMANDRITE. [See ABBOT.]

ARCHIVES, ARCHIVIST (Greek ἀρχεῖα). The utility of the preservation of public records was fully understood by the ancients; the record office at Rome, which Virgil alludes to ("populi tabularia vidit"), was an enormous building. Episcopal archives have probably been kept from the very beginning of the Church. The archivist or Proto-scrinarius of Rome was an important personage: besides having charge of a large portion of the records, he was the head of all the secretaries and notaries of the Roman Court. A decree of the Congregation of the Council of Trent (1626) specifies what ought to be preserved in an episcopal archive—namely, the processes and proceedings in all causes tried in the bishop's court; episcopal sentences, precepts, decrees, mandates, &c.; reports and registers of all kinds relating to ecclesiastical affairs within the diocese; and complete inventories of Church property, movable and immovable. (Ferraris, Archivium.)

ARCHPRIEST (Gr. ἀρχιπρεσβύτερος). The chief of the presbyters, as the archdeacon was the chief of the deacons. The name dates from the fourth century. The archpriest was usually the oldest of the priests attached to the cathedral; yet instances are not wanting of their being chosen by the bishops for special qualifications, without regard to seniority. The principal function of the archpriest was, during the illness or absence of the bishop, to replace him in the Church offices. He occupied the place of the bishop in the ceremonies of public worship, as the archdeacon did in the administration of the diocese. As population increased, a rural archpriest was placed in each of the larger towns, who was to the local clergy what the archpriest of the cathedral was to the cathedral clergy. In course of time the latter came to be called the dean, the former rural deans. The privileges of archpriests, like those of archdeacons, were often usurped by laymen in the ages after Charlemagne. Great divergences grew up in different countries, with regard to the duties, rank, and privileges assigned to them. In later times they appear to have been superseded to a great extent by vicars forane (q.v.).

Towards the end of the reign of Elizabeth, the Holy See, finding that the Catholic clergy in England were much in need of a recognised head, yet unwilling to send a bishop, lest the government should take it as an excuse for fresh cruelties against the Catholics generally, appointed George Blackwell superior of the English mission, with the title and authority of "Archpriest." A consultative body of twelve assistant priests was nominated at the same time. This was in 1598. After some years Blackwell took a course about the new oath of allegiance which displeased the Holy See, and he was superseded (1608) by Birkhead. Towards the end of the reign of James, and after Birkhead had been succeeded by a third archpriest, Harrison, the violence of the persecution being now much abated, Gregory XV. decided that the time was come to send a bishop to England. The first vicar-apostolic was accordingly appointed, in 1623.

ARISTOTLE. [See PHILOSOPHY.]

ARIUS AND ARIANISM. The heresy of Arius consisted in the denial of the Son's consubstantiality with the Father, and so virtually of Christ's true and eternal Godhead. In opposition to this error, the first Nicene Council defined that the Son is "only-begotten, born of the Father, i.e. of the Father's substance;" that He is "not made," as creatures are, but that He is "consubstantial" with the First Person of the Blessed Trinity. The council added a condemnation under anathema of certain Arian propositions, in which this heresy was summed up. To understand them, we must know something of the way in which Arianism arose and spread; and this, again, we cannot do till we have acquainted ourselves with the teaching on the mystery of the Trinity which prevailed in the early Church. We shall take the points in order, reserving for the close of the article an account of Arianism in its later developments.

1. It might seem as if there could be little need of dwelling on the doctrine of the Trinity, as held by the Ante-Nicene Fathers. Every Christian is bound to know and believe the doctrine of the Trinity, and it cannot be supposed, that the early Fathers and Martyrs of the Church were ignorant of a fundamental doctrine of the faith. Scripture, too, sets the matter at rest. Our Lord proclaims the unity of His nature with that of the Father. "I and the Father are one." "The Father is in me and I in the Father." "The Word was with God," St. John says, "and the Word was God." Now, in one sense it is true that Arius could find no support for his heresy in the Ante-Nicene age. Scripture declared and the Church taught from the beginning three propositions from which the whole of the Nicene definition follows by logical consequence: viz. first, that the Son is distinct from the Father; next, that the Son is God; and, thirdly, that there is but one God. All this is certain, but it is also true that the Ante-Nicene Fathers often used inaccurate language on this subject; that we do not find in them the full and developed doctrine of the Trinity, as the Nicene Council defined it; and that this explains to a certain extent the success of Arianism and the calamities it brought upon the Church. Nor need we wonder at these defects in the teaching of the early Fathers. They were not and could not be content with the simple enunciations of the propositions enumerated above: they endeavoured (and how could they do otherwise?) to reconcile the apparent contradictions which they involve, and to recommend them as reasonable to those outside the Church. And in this part of their work they were not secure from error. One or two leading instances will be given of the errors into which many of them fell when, instead of merely delivering the tradition which they had received, they began to speculate and reason about it. A difficulty met them the moment they began to consider the eternity of the Son. A son is generated, and generation postulates a beginning: how, then, could the Son be eternal? They did not cut the knot, as Arius did, by denying the eternity of the Son, because the Catholic faith saved them from such an error; but still many of them did introduce a theory inconsistent with the unchangeable simplicity of God. The Word, they admitted, was eternal, but many of them —all, indeed, except St. Irenaeus and the Fathers of the Alexandrian school— denied that He had always been Son. With us, the word is conceived first of all in the mind and then comes forth as articulate sound. So, they maintained, the Word had always been in the bosom of the Father (λόγος ἐνδιάθετος); afterwards He issued forth as the first-begotten of all creation (λόγος προφορικός), and by this procession or generation became the Son. They were led into similar error in considering the relation of the Word to creatures. Down to St. Augustine's time the Fathers generally attributed the divine apparitions in the Old Testament to God the Son, and this interpretation led some into erroneous ideas on the subordination of the Son to the Father. Thus Justin speaks of a "God under the maker of the universe," and argues that the "maker and Father of all" could not "have left the region above the sky and appeared in a little corner of the earth."[2] Tertullian speaks of a "son visible according to the measure of his derivation,"[1] while language of the same import was used by Origen and Novatian.[3] Another source of erroneous language arose in the third century. The Sabellians denied a real distinction between Father and Son, and in his anxiety to establish the distinction between these divine Persons, Dionysius of Alexandria, in the year 260, compared the relation of the Father and the Son to that between a vine-dresser and the vine, asserted that the Son was "made by God" (ποίημα τοῦ θεοῦ) that he was "foreign to the essence of the Father (ξένον κατ' οὐσίαν), and "did not exist till he was made." In the same year, another Dionysius, bishop of Rome, on account of charges brought by certain orthodox prelates against his namesake of Alexandria, summoned a synod at Rome, and issued a memorable document to the bishops of Egypt and Libya. "Had the Son," the Pope argues, "been created, there would have been a time when He was not; but the Son always was." Thereupon, the Alexandrian bishop, in two letters which he sent to Rome, explained away his former inaccurate language, showed that his adversaries had taken a one-sided view of his teaching, and distinctly confessed the Son's eternity. This case is instructive in several ways. It shows that early Fathers, who used words which sound like Arianism, were very far from the Arian belief; and it is evidence of the vigilance with which the successor of St. Peter watched, as his supreme office required him to watch, over the deposit of the faith.[1]

2. The orthodox doctrine had been maintained in Alexandria by subsequent bishops, when, about the year 318 or 320, Arius began to put forward a heresy which engaged all the energies of the Church for more than half a century. He is said to have been a Libyan by birth; he had twice joined the Meletian schism, but had been reconciled to the Church, and was exercising the office of a priest in Alexandria. The bishop Alexander, Socrates tells us, was discoursing to his clergy on the Trinity in Unity. Arius, who was distinguished for his learning and logical skill, contradicted the bishop, urged that the Son, because begotten, must have had "a beginning of existence;" that there was a time when he did not exist (ἦν ὅτε οὐκ ἦν); and that he was made, like other creatures, out of nothing (ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων ἔχει τὴν ὑπόστασιν). If we add to this that, according to Arius, the Son was liable to sin in his own nature, and that his intelligence was limited, we have a complete statement of the Arian doctrine. He not only held that the Father was separated from the Son by a priority of time—or rather like time, since time in the proper sense began with the Son—but he denied that the Son was from the Father's substance. He did not merely reject the word ὁμοούσιος or consubstantial, as an orthdox synod at Antioch had done in 269,[1] but also the other language in which early Fathers had expressed the same idea.

Arius won many to his side: in particular he was supported by the famous Eusebius of Nicomedia, who had great influence on Constantine. He had friends among the other bishops of Asia, and even among the bishops, priests, and nuns of the Alexandrian province. Meanwhile, he was condemned in two Alexandrian synods and obliged to leave the city. He took refuge first in Palestine, afterwards in Nicomedia; he gained the favour of Constantia, the emperor's sister, and he disseminated his doctrine among the populace by means of the notorious book which he called θάλεια, or "entertainment," and by songs adapted for sailors, millers, and travellers. At first Constantine looked on the whole affair as a strife of words, and sent Hosius of Cordova to Alexandria, that he might restore peace between Arius and his bishop. This attempt failed, and the First General Council met at Nicæa. It anathematised Arius, with all who affirmed "that there was a time when the Son of God was not; that he was made out of nothing; that he was of another substance or essence [than the Father]; that he was created, or alterable or changeable." This symbol was adopted after many disputes, in which the deacon Athanasius, then only twenty-five years old, was the great champion of the faith. Arius and those who refused to anathematise him were banished.

However, when the cause of Arianism seemed desperate, it suddenly revived. Constantia pleaded this cause with her brother on her death-bed. Constantine asked Athanasius (bishop of Alexandria since 328) to restore Arius to Church communion. This great confessor firmly refused, and, though the Emperor did not insist, Athanasius was grievously calumniated, and exiled to Treves. Other opponents of the heresy met with like treatment. Eustathius of Antioch and Marcellus of Ancyra were deposed. The Emperor called Arius to Constantinople, with the view of restoring him to the communion of the Church. It is right to add, that Arius had assured the Emperor on oath, that the doctrine for which he had been excommunicated was not really his. Before, however, he had attained his end, a sudden death struck him down as he walked through Constantinople escorted by his followers. He died in the year 336, the eightieth of his age.

Arius was dead, but his heresy still prospered. Constantius, who came to the throne in 337, recalled Athanasius next year to Alexandria. Soon, however, a charge of Sabellianism was brought against the saint; he fled for his life from his episcopal city, and took refuge in Rome, when Pope Julius in a synod solemnly acquitted him. But a council at Antioch confirmed his deposition, and drew up four confessions of faith, in which the word "consubstantial" was studiously omitted. Through favour of Constans, who ruled the West, a council met at Sardica in 343 or 344, declared their adherence to the Nicene Creed, and restored Athanasius, with Marcellus and others, to their sees. In spite of the fact that the Arian or Eusebian bishops held a counter-council at Philippopolis, the Sardican decrees enjoyed an almost œcumenical authority, and Constantius permitted the return of Athanasius to Alexandria. However, after the death of his brother Constans, Constantius renewed his persecution of the Catholics. At Arles and Milan synods condemned Athanasius, while Pope Liberius and other bishops who would not subscribe the condemnation were exiled. Again an intruder seized the episcopal throne of Alexandria, and Athanasius, in 356, sought an asylum with the Egyptian monks.

This temporary triumph of Arianism proved its ruin. The heretics presented an appearance of unity so long as they were engaged in a struggle for life or death with the orthodox. No sooner did they feel themselves secure than they began an internecine conflict with each other. The strict Arians, led by Aetius, a deacon and a bishop Eunomius, taught that the Father and Son were unlike, and that the latter was made out of nothing. They were also known as Eunomians, Anomœans (from ἀνόμοιος, unlike), or Exucontians, because they said the Son sprang from nothing (ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων). Another party, known as Semiarians, a name they received about 358, when they held a famous synod at Ancyra, confessed that the Son was "like in substance to the Father (ὅμοιος κατ' οὐσίαν). Basil of Ancyra, Eustathius of Sebaste, Macedonius, and Auxentius of Milan, were the most noted among them. A third party, led by Ursacius, Valens and Acacius (from whom they are sometimes called Acacians), rejected the phrase "like in substance or essence," and contented themselves with the vague statement that the Son was "like" the Father. The Council of Ancyra, as we have seen, was Semiarian. The second Sirmian synod, in 357, condemned the Semiarian as well as the orthodox formula, while Semiarianism secured a fresh victory in the third council held at the same place. Pope Liberius, under fear of death, is believed by many to have subscribed this third Sirmian formula, while at the same time he anathematised those who denied that "the Son is in essence and in all things like to the Father." [See LIBERIUS.] In 359 the Emperor did his utmost to establish Semiarianism, but his efforts were in vain. The Eastern bishops, 160 in number, met at Seleucia; 400 Western bishops at Rimini. The latter stood firm at first to the faith defined at Nicæa, but they were overcome by threats and by bodily suffering. At last both the Eastern and Western council subscribed a formula, in which the word "essence" was rejected altogether as unscriptural, and the Son was defined to be "like the Father in all things."

This defeat of the Semiarians by Arians inclined the former to accept the Nicene faith, and at a council held at Alexandria in 362 Athanasius, who had returned to his see on the accession of Julian the Apostate, received many of them into communion. The Acacians, on the other hand, allied themselves with the strict Arians. Arianism found a powerful supporter in the Emperor Valens (364–378), who expelled Athanasius from his see. This was his fifth exile. But the palmy days of the heresy were over. His people insisted on the recall of Athanasius to his see, in which he remained till his death, in 373. Ambrose in the West, and in the East the three Cappadocian Fathers, Basil the Great, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Gregory of Nyssa, fought the battle of the faith. The orthodox Emperor Theodosius secured the peace of the Church, and the Nicene decrees were enforced again by the General Council of Constantinople (381).

So much for the history of Arianism among the subjects of the Roman Empire.

It had still a great part to play among the Barbarians. The West Goths received Christianity in the Arian form through their great missionary Ulfila (consecrated bishop by Eusebius of Nicomedia in 341), and Valens allowed a part of their nation to settle in Thrace on the condition that they became Arians. Soon after, the East Goths in Italy, the Vandals in Africa, the Suevi in Spain, the Burgundians in Gaul, the Lombardians who emigrated to upper Italy, became Arians. The Vandal persecution of the Catholics, which rivalled that of Diocletian in severity, began under Genseric in 427 and lasted till 533, when the Byzantine general Belisarius conquered Africa. In Spain, which had fallen under the power of the West Goths, Hermenegild, son of the king, fell a sacrifice to the Arian fanaticism of his father, in 584. Hermenegild's brother Reccared, who began to reign in 586, became a Catholic and established the faith in Spain, with the help of a great council which met at Toledo in 589. About a century earlier, Clovis, with 3,000 of his Franks, had received Catholic baptism, and the triumph of the Frankish arms sealed the fate of Arianism.

ARLES, COUNCILS OF. (1) In 314, assembled chiefly to settle the Donatist disputes. This council represented the entire Western Church. The number of the bishops who met is uncertain, and the acts have perished. But we know that the Holy See was represented there by two priests and two deacons, and Constantine himself says he assembled "very many bishops from diverse and almost innumerable districts." It appears from the letter of the Council to Pope Silvester, that the Donatists were condemned, and Cæcilian, the orthodox bishop of Carthage, acquitted. A synod at Rome in the previous year had given the same decision. The council also decreed that Easter should be observed on the same day throughout the world, the day to be notified by the Pope (Can. 1); that baptism conferred with the proper form was valid even if given by heretics (Can. 8); that a bishop should be consecrated by three others (Can. 20); that a married priest or deacon who lived with his wife should be deposed (Can. 29) (see Hefele, "Concil." p. 201 seq.).

(2) In 353 a council at Arles was terrified by the Emperor Constantius into a condemnation of St. Athanasius (Hefele, ib. p. 652.) Various other synods which met in the same place are mentioned by Hefele.

ARMENIAN CHRISTIANS. The native legends recount the preaching of the Gospel to the Armenian nation by Thaddeus, one of the seventy disciples, but the conversion of the Armenian people as a whole was brought about by their great Apostle, Gregory the Illuminator, whose efforts were supported by King Tiridates III., just at the beginning of the fourth century. It is clear from Eusebius ("H. E." ix. 8) that the work of conversion was very rapid. Gregory established the chief see at Etchmiazin, near Mount Ararat: he and his successors were consecrated by the Metropolitan of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, and the title they took—viz. Catholicos—signified that they were the general procurators and representatives of the see of Cæsarea in Armenia (Le Quien, "Oriens Christianus," i. 1355). Early in the fifth century the golden age of Armenian literature began. Isaac the Great and Mesrob (both Catholics) invented the Armenian alphabet and translated the Bible from the Syriac Peshitto into Armenian, afterwards improving their work by collating it with good MSS. of the LXX (Hexaplar text) and the Greek New Testament. The work of translating Fathers, as well as works of Aristotle, Philo, Porphyry, &c., from Greek and Syriac was carried on with great zeal. This literary activity was accompanied by other changes of a very different kind. The brave Armenian nation had preserved its independence, but in 390 Armenia was divided between the Byzantine and Persian empires, and East Armenia, the larger and more fruitful part of the country, fell to the portion of the latter Power. In 430 the very shadow of a national monarchy disappeared, and ever since the Armenians have been subject in succession to Persians, Arabs, Turks, and Russians. They were scattered far and wide by the Mongol invaders, and their unity, like that of the Jews, has consisted in the common bond of race, language, literature, and religion. After the Persian conquest the Armenian Catholicos became independent of Cæsarea, and this change was followed by another of much greater moment. The opposition of the Armenians to the Council of Chalcedon, mainly due to the mission of Samuel, whom the Syrian Archimandrite Barsumas sent to the Armenian church, was clearly displayed in the synod of Vagarshiabad, A.D. 491. The schism was consummated at the Synod of Dovin in 596 (see Hefele, "Concil." ii. p. 717, 2nd ed., where the statements of Pagi, Mansi, &c., are corrected from the National History published at Venice in 1785), and has endured ever since, though Greek influence induced the Iberian and Colchian bishops to sever themselves from the Armenian Catholicos. True, a union between the Armenians and the orthodox Greeks was effected at a council of Karin (the modern Erzeroum) in 628, but it did not last long. The Armenians held fast to the Monophysite doctrine—viz. that in Christ there was but one nature—and external differences increased the opposition between them and the Greeks. Some of these, such as the addition of the words "Who wast crucified for us" in the Trisagion, and probably the use of pure wine, without the addition of any water, in the Mass, were connected with their theological views. Besides this, they maintained the old Eastern custom of celebrating Christ's birth and His epiphany on one day—viz. January 6. They use leavened bread at the altar, eat lacticinia in Lent (Syn. in Trull. can. 32, 56). They were also charged by the Greeks with making the priesthood into a caste, and only ordaining sons of priests (ib. can. 32); and further, with a semi-Jewish practice of cooking flesh in the sanctuary and giving portions of it to the priests (ib. can. 99).

The Catholicos lives at Etchniazin, which has belonged since 1828 to Russia. He is chosen from the metropolitans by the synod, with the consent of the Armenian bishops and of all Armenians present at the place, and the election must be confirmed by the Czar. He is enthroned in his cathedral by the Metropolitan of Siunic. It is his office to watch over religion and discipline; he consecrates the chrism for his bishops, which he does only once in seven years, and he can convene a national council. In matters of importance he must consult his synod. He is Bishop of Ararat. His distinctive dress consists in a silk veil, with gold fringes, which covers his head and shoulders, and is called kogh, and in a pallium folded five times over his breast. The patriarchal cross and torch are carried before him, and he uses everywhere the staff of the vartabed or doctor. He is chiefly supported by a poll-tax on all adults within his diocese, contributions, stole-fees, &c. from the revenues of the monastery at Etchniazin, and the gifts of pilgrims to the shrine of St. Gregory. There are twelve archbishops and bishops, four vartabeds or doctors, sixty monks in priest's orders, and 500 other monks in the great monastery just mentioned. The archbishops, bishops, and archimandrites residing there form his synod. Deputies from the Armenian nation are added to their number at the election of a patriarch.

Next come the patriarchs, who are now almost independent of the Catholicos. The patriarchial sees arose from the constant change of the chief see during the disasters of the nation, and also from the dispersion of the Armenians after the Mongol invasion in the fourteenth century. The Patriarch of Constantinople (bishopric since 1307, title of patriarch since 1481) holds the first rank amongst the patriarchs, and is only inferior in name to the Catholicos. He is chosen by the Armenians, lay as well as clerical, at Constantinople, and gets his berat from the Porte. He can consecrate the holy oil, and can appoint and consecrate metropolitan bishops throughout the Turkish dominions except at Jerusalem. The church property is under his control, but he must administer it with the advice of a synod of twenty lay members chosen by the Porte. He has also a synod of ecclesiastics for spiritual matters. He has secular jurisdiction over the members of his church, and he represents not only the Armenians but also the Syrian Jacobites before the Turkish Government. The Patriarch of Sis (title granted 1441) is supposed to be chosen by the twelve neighbouring bishops, who, however, really follow the popular choice, which takes place under the influence of the Turkish Government. His jurisdiction extends over Lesser Armenia, Cappadocia, and Cilicia. He receives the holy oil from the Catholicos. The Patriarch of Jerusalem (title since the middle of the seventeenth century) is chosen by his suffragan bishops, with the consent of the clergy. He has very limited power, for he leaves the consecration of bishops and of the holy oil to the Catholicos, and he can be called to the court of the Patriarch of Constantinople. The Patriarch of the island of Aghtamar (1114) has little power, and his jurisdiction scarcely extends beyond the shores of the lake of Van. He is chiefly maintained by the monastery on the island.

The metropolitans, according to the canons, are empowered to consecrate their suffragans and the holy oils, but these rights are now reserved to the Catholicos, or else to the patriarch, and the metropolitans only differ from other bishops by wearing a gold mitre, a triple pallium, a longer staff, and an archiepiscopal ἐπιγονάτιον, which the Armenians call goncher, suspended from the girdle. A monk cannot, except by dispensation, become a bishop, and the bishops are usually chosen from the unmarried vartabeds or doctors. The patriarch may nominate, but usually the bishops are chosen by the clergy and fathers of families. The election is confirmed, and the bishop consecrated by the Catholicos or patriarch. The rite of consecration closely resembles that of the Greeks, but the Armenians anoint the head and thumbs of the elect with chrism, and he receives a ring as one of his insignia. Bishops also wear a mitre[1] like that of the Latins, and they do not use the σάκκος of the Greeks (see VESTMENTS OF THE GREEKS). The bishop appoints the chorepiscopi; convents, schools, hospitals, &c., are subject to him; no altars may be set up or relics exposed for veneration without his leave.

The priests are divided into two classes, that of the vartabeds or doctors, who are again subdivided into many grades and who remain unmarried, and the parish priests. The former are far more highly esteemed. A staff is the mark of their office, and their chief duty consists in preaching. They live by collections made after the sermon. The ordinary clergy are married, taken from the humbler classes and trained either by a parish priest or at a monastery. The Armenians have the same minor orders as the Latins, and, like them, they reckon the subdiaconate among the greater orders. A priest is elected by the people, who, however, invariably accept the candidate proposed by the lay administrator of the church property; he must then be approved by the bishop. The priestly vestments are alb, girdle, maniple, stole, chasuble; but they also have a collar of gold or silver stuff called vagas, from which a sort of metal amice is suspended, with the figures of the twelve Apostles upon it, and they wear a high cap with gold or silver crosses. The priest says Mass with covered head till the Trisagion, when he removes his cap amice, and sandals. Priests live by stolefees and by offerings in kind at Epiphany and Easter. They also get subsidies from the fund for pious uses. But they are very poor, and generally have to follow some trade.

The Armenian schismatic monks follow the rule of St. Basil, but their fasts are stricter than those of the Greek religious. They have many monasteries, and at least one large convent of nuns—viz. on Mount Sion. Silbernagl enumerates between sixty and seventy dioceses, of which fourteen are in Russia, five in Persia (including the see of the Armenian Bishop of Calcutta), the rest in the Turkish territory. He estimates the number of schismatic Armenians in Turkey at 2,400,000, of whom 400,000 are in Turkey in Europe. There are 500,000 in the Russian Empire. Add to these the Armenians in other lands, especially Egypt and the principalities of the Danube, in which last the chief settlement of the Armenians was made in 1342, and we may calculate the whole number as about three millions.

United Armenians.—Some of the Armenians in Cilicia were united with the Catholic Church by Latin missionaries sent there by John XXII. But much more was done by Jesuit missionaries and the Mechitarists among the Armenians scattered from the fourteenth century onwards throughout other countries, and at present there are about 100,000 Catholics of the Armenian rite.

In 1742, Benedict XIV. appointed a patriarch for the Armenians in Cilicia and the Lesser Armenia. In 1830 Pius VIII. nominated a primate at Constantinople for the Armenians in European Turkey; and owing to the progress of Catholicism in the nation, Pius IX. in 1850 empowered the Primate Anthony Hassun to erect six suffragan dioceses. The Pope himself nominated the bishops, and a schism seemed likely to ensue. In 1866 Hassun was chosen patriarch by the bishops of the Cilician patriarchate. Pius IX. confirmed the election, united the patriarchal and primatial dignities, transferred the patriarchal residence to Galata, near Constantinople, provided for the election of the patriarch by the bishops to the exclusion of the laity, and regulated the affairs of the Armenian church by the bull "Reversurus," of July 12, 1867. Some Armenians thought the rights of the nation injured by this bull, and a formal schism arose in 1870; more than thirty-five of the clergy and many of the laity were excommunicated by the Pope. The schism, however, won about 4,000 adherents; a schismatical patriarch was elected, and most of the church buildings and goods passed into their hands. They repudiated the decrees of the Vatican Council. In 1879 the schismatical patriarch Kuppelian made his submission to Leo XIII. Many of the clergy and laity followed his example, and Monsignor Hassun was acknowledged as patriarch by the Porte till he was made cardinal in 1880, and replaced by Monsignor Azarian. At present seventeen dioceses are subject to the Armenian Patriarch. He has no authority over Armenians in Russia and Austria. Russia has many Armenian inhabitants in the Crimea, Kasan, and the Ukraine. Pius VII. sent them a vicar-apostolic in 1809, and the Concordat of 1847 provided for the erection of Armenian bishoprics at Cherson and Kamieniek. This arrangement, however, owing to the troubles with the Russian Government, has not been carried out. Austria has about 14,000 United Armenians. Those in Siebenbürgen, who came there in 1671, and continued for a time Monophysites, are under the Latin bishops. The archbishopric of Lemberg was erected for the Armenians of Gallicia in 1635; and Pius VII., by a brief in 1819, agreed that the emperor should nominate one of three candidates proposed by the Armenian people. The Armenians who settled in Hungary after the capture of Belgrade by the Turks in 1521 are placed under the Mechitarist monks.

The United Armenian monks belong to the order of St. Antony. The Mechitarists will be described in a separate article. (Chiefly from Silbernagl, "Kirchen des Orients," with the addition of the facts regarding the recent schism from Hergenröther's article in the "Kirchenlexikon," edited by Kaulen.)

ARTICLE OF FAITH. [See DOGMA.]

ASCENSION, FEAST OF. This feast had been kept from time immemorial in St. Augustine's day, and he attributes its institution to the Apostles. We have a sermon among the works of St. Chrysostom preached on Ascension Day. St. Augustine calls it Quadragesima, because kept forty days after Easter; the Greek name Tessarocostes or Tetracostes was given for the same reason. Gregory of Tours mentions a procession which used to be held on this day, in memory of that which the Apostles made from Jerusalem to Bethany and the Mount of Olives. It was also the custom in ancient times to bless the bread and new fruits in the Mass of this day.

The practice of lighting the paschal candle in solemn Mass till the feast of the Ascension was established througout the Franciscan Order by a decree dated 1263. In 1607 the Congregation of Rites ordered that the paschal candle should be lighted when Mass is sung and in vespers, on Easter Sunday, Easter Monday, Easter Tuesday, on Saturday in Low Week, and on Sundays till Ascension Day, when it is extinguished after the Gospel. The rite symbolises Christ's departure from the Apostles. (Benedict XIV. "De Festis.")

ASCENSION OF CHRIST. Our Lord ascended into heaven forty days after His resurrection, and therefore, according to the common reckoning, on a Thursday. The opinion of Chrysostom that the Ascension took place on a Saturday, is quite singular. He ascended by His own power—not indeed, St. Thomas remarks, by the power proper to a natural body, but by the virtue proper to Him as God and by that which belongs to a blessed spirit. Such an ascension, St. Thomas continues, "is not against the nature of a glorified body, the nature of which is entirely subject to the spirit." Christ ascended from Mount Olivet in the presence of His disciples, whom He blessed as He parted from them. He took His seat at the right hand of God, the sitting posture symbolising His rest from toil and His judicial power; the "right hand" of God denoting according to many of the Fathers, the equality of Jesus Christ God and man with God the Father: according to some other writers, signifying that as man He holds the next place to God in heaven. Angels, as has been generally inferred from the sacred narrative, attended Him in His ascent, and the souls of the just, who had been detained in Limbo, entered heaven with Him. Thus "ascending on high, he led captivity captive."

Theologians give many reasons for our Lord's ascension. The glory which He receives in heaven is due to the merits of His sacred humanity. For Christians, too, it was "expedient that he should go." Faith is exercised by the fact that we can no longer see our Lord: His ascent into heaven is the pledge that we shall follow Him if we are worthy. Above all, according to the constant teaching of the Fathers, Christ exercises His priestly office in heaven. Just as the high-priest on the day of Atonement offered sacrifice without on the brazen altar, and then with the blood of the sacrifice and with burning incense, entered the holy of holies, so the high-priest of the new law, having offered Himself as a sacrifice on Mount Calvary, continually presents His merits and exhibits His sacred wounds before the Eternal Father. Whether He as man actually prays for us, is uncertain. Of course He does not pray as the saints do, for they are creatures, and ask of God what they cannot give by their own power. And the words "Christ, pray for us," could not be lawfully used, on account of the scandal and confusion they would create. But it is quite possible that Christ, as Petavius[1] expresses it, by "a voluntary condescension" still prays for us, as He did while on earth. (Benedict XIV. "De Festis.")

ASCETÆ (Gr. ἀσκέω, ἀσκητής). The belief that through bodily "exercise," and a strict discipline imposed on the senses, it was in the power of man to perfect his moral nature and rise to spiritual heights not otherwise attainable, had been common both among Jews and Pagans for some time before the coming of Christ. Philo's account of the Essenes is well-known—a Jewish sect of mystical and ascetic tenets, much diffused in Palestine in the first century before Christ, with its initiations, grades, and secrets, living in villages because of the luxury and immorality of the towns, renouncing marriage, and following rules of strict temperance in regard to food, sleep, and whatever else nature craves. The Therapeutæ in Egypt were a similar sect. Their name—and that of the Essenes is said to have the same meaning —signifies healing, for they believed that their discipline healed the concretam labem of the soul's impurity.

In the Pagan world similar doctrines were widely held by the Stoics. Both among them and the Essenes the doctrine of the two principles, the persuasion that matter was essentially evil, and that he was most perfect who was freest from the blasting touch of animal existence, coloured largely both their theories and their practice. The Christian Ascetes could not so deem of that fleshly nature of which Christ their divine Lord had deigned to be a partaker: to master the lower nature was their aim, not to eradicate it; desire and fear, joy and grief, they did not regard as in themselves evil, but as to be brought by discipline into a strict subordination to the true end of man, which is to know and love God, and do His will. The means which they employed were voluntary chastity, fasting, perseverance in prayer, voluntary poverty, and maceration of the flesh. In the Apostolical Constitutions (Kraus, p. 96) the Ascetæ are mentioned as an intermediate order of Christians between the clergy and the laity. As a general rule, they did not go out of the world, like anchorites and monks, but strove to live a perfect life in the world. Abuses after a time appeared, particularly in regard to the γυναῖκες συνείσακτοι, women who lived under the same roof with Ascetes for the benefit of their instruction and example.

Modern life, especially when permeated with Baconian ideas respecting the true task of man in the world, is pointedly unascetic. If we turn over a series of pictures of eminent modern men, there is one common feature which we cannot fail to notice, whether the subject of the picture be artist, or literary man, or man of action, and whatever intelligence, power, or benevolence may breathe from the face —namely, the absence of an expression of self-mastery. A similar series of portraits of men who lived in the middle ages, when law was weaker than at present, but the sense of the necessity of self-control stronger, reveals a type of countenance in which the calmness of self-conquest, gained by the Christian ἄσκησις, is far more frequently visible than in later ages.

ASCETICAL THEOLOGY. A name given to the science which treats of virtue and perfection and the means by which they are to be attained. Whereas mystical theology deals with extraordinary states of prayer and union with God, ascetical writers treat of the ordinary Christian life. The number of ascetical writers has at all times been great in the Church, but during the last three centuries special attention has been given to the life of secular, as distinct from religious, persons. St. Francis of Sales and St. Alphonsus Liguori may be mentioned as modern saints whose ascetical works are most esteemed.

ASH WEDNESDAY. The first day, according to our present observance, of the forty days' fast of Lent. But that it did not come within the quadragesimal period in primitive times we know from the testimony of Gregory the Great, who, in speaking of the fast, describes it as of thirty-six days' duration—that is, as extending over six weeks, from the first Sunday in Lent to Easter Day, omitting Sundays. Thirty-six days are nearly a tenth part of the year, and thus, by observing the fast, Christians were thought to render a penitential tithe of their lives to God. Lent, therefore, at the end of the sixth century, began on the first Sunday, and we know from the Sacramentary of Gelasius that the practice was the same at the end of the fifth century. At what time Ash Wednesday and the three following days were added to the fast has not been precisely ascertained. It is true that in the Sacramentary of Pope Gregory there is a Mass for Ash Wednesday, under the heading "Feria IV., caput jejunii" (beginning of the fast); whence it might be inferred that Pope Gregory, in spite of the words cited above, had himself before his death sanctioned the alteration in question. But this would be an unsafe conclusion, for one of the best MSS. of the Sacramentary does not contain this heading. However this may be, a Capitulary of the Church of Toulon (714) and the liturgical work of Amaury (about 820) describe the Lenten usage as identical with our own. There can be no difficulty in understanding the motive of the change; for by the addition of the four days preceding the first Sunday, the number of fasting days before Easter (the Sundays being omitted) becomes exactly forty, and accords with the fasts recorded of Moses and Elias, and with that of our Saviour in the wilderness of Judea.

The office for Ash Wednesday opens with the solemn ceremony which has given the day its name.[1] After an introit and four collects, in which pardon and mercy are implored for the penitent, the faithful approach and kneel at the altar rails, and the priest puts ashes upon the head of each, saying. "Memento, homo, quia pulvis es, et in pulverem reverteris" (Remember, man, that thou art dust, and shalt return to dust). The ashes are obtained by burning the palms of the previous year. The Lenten pastorals of Bishops, regulating the observance of the season, usually prescribe that the fast on Ash Wednesday shall be more rigorously kept than on any other day in Lent except the four last last days of Holy Week.

The administration of the ashes was not originally made to all the faithful, but only to public penitents. These had to appear before the church door on the first day of Lent, in penitential garb and with bare feet. Their penances were there imposed upon them; then they were brought into the church before the bishop, who put ashes on their heads, saying, besides the words "Memento," &c., "age pœnitentiam ut habeas vitam æternam" (Repent [or, do penance], that thou mayst have eternal life). He then made them an address, after which he solemnly excluded them from the church. Out of humility and affection, friends of the penitents, though not in the same condition, used to join themselves to them, expressing in their outward guise a similar contrition, and offering their foreheads also to be sprinkled with ashes. The number of these persons gradually increased, until at length the administration of ashes was extended to the whole congregation, and the rite took its present form. ("Dict. of Antiq." Smith and Cheetham; Kössing, in Wetzer and Welte.)

ASPERGES. A name given to the sprinkling of the altar, clergy, and people with holy water at the beginning of High Mass by the celebrant. The name is taken from the words, "Asperges me," "Thou shalt wash me, O Lord, with hyssop," &c., with which the priest begins the ceremony. During the Easter season the antiphon "Vidi aquam" is substituted. This custom of sprinkling the people with holy water is mentioned in the Canon of a synod quoted by Hincmar of Rheims, who lived at the beginning of the ninth century.

ASPERSION. [See BAPTISM.]

ASSUMPTION. After the death of her divine Son the Blessed Virgin lived under the care of St. John. It is not quite certain where she died. Tillemont conjectures from a passage in a letter of the Fathers assembled in the General Council of Ephesus that she was buried in that city, but the common tradition of the Church represents her as having died at Jerusalem, where her empty tomb was shown to pilgrims in the seventh century. In any case, it is certain that she really died, and that her exemption from sin original and actual did not prevent her paying this common debt of humanity. The very fact that she had received a passible nature rendered her liable to death. Except for the special gift of immortality which he received from God, Adam would have died in the course of nature, even if he had never sinned; and St. Augustine declares that our Blessed Saviour would have died by the natural decay of old age, if the Jews had not laid violent hands upon Him.[1]

[1] In French, Mercredi des Cendres; in German, Aschermittwoch.

Still, although the Blessed Virgin tasted of death, her body was preserved from corruption and it was united to her soul in the kingdom of heaven. The Church signifies her belief in this fact by celebrating the feast of her Assumption on the fifteenth of August. There is no distinct assertion of the corporal assumption in the prayers of the feast, but it is plain that the Church encourages and approves this belief from the fact that she selects for the lessons during the octave a passage from St. John Damascene in which the history of this corporal assumption is given in detail. This pious belief is recommended by its intrinsic reasonableness; for surely it is natural to suppose that our Lord did not suffer that sacred body in which He himself had dwelt and from which He had formed His own sacred humanity to become a prey to corruption. It is confirmed by the testimonies of St. Andrew of Crete, of St. John Damascene, and of many ancient Martyrologies and Missals, cited by Butler in his note on this feast. It is, moreover, a striking fact that, notwithstanding the zeal of the early Church in collecting and venerating relics, no relics of the Blessed Virgin's body have ever been exhibited. Much weight, too, must be given to the common sentiment of the faithful. "Admirable," says Petavius, "is the admonition of Paulinus of Nola, an author of the greatest weight, who bids us adhere to the common voice of the faithful, since the spirit of God breathes upon them all."[2]

The corporal assumption is not an article of faith. Still Melchior Canus sums up the general teaching of theologians on this head when he says:—"The denial of the Blessed Virgin's corporal assumption into heaven, though by no means contrary to the faith, is still so much opposed to the common agreement of the Church, that it would be a mark of insolent temerity."[3]

The feast, according to Butler, was celebrated before the sixth century in the East and West. The Greeks called it κοίμησις or μετάστασις; the Latins, dormitio, pausatio, transitus, assumptio.

ASTROLOGY. The doctrine of the Church on this matter is clearly laid down by St. Thomas. There is nothing contrary to the faith in holding that the stars affect the bodies of men, and so indirectly cause passions to which most men will give way. Taking this influence of the heavenly bodies for granted (and its existence or non-existence is a question of physical science, not of theology), an astrologer may make probable guesses at the truth. But he cannot predict with certainty our future actions, for it is of faith that the will in all cases remains free.

Astrology was forbidden to the early Christians. A law of the emperor Honorius condemned astrologers to banishment. The practice of astrology was condemned in 1586 by a bull of Sixtus V.[1]

ASYLUM. A place to which a criminal, pursued by the ministers of justice, may escape, and where so long as he remains he cannot be arrested. Such asylums, the inviolable character of which was nearly always connected with some notion of the religious sanctity of the spot, were common among the nations of antiquity. Rome, says the legend, grew out of an asylum for malefactors of every description; and Moses (Deut. xix. 2) appointed cities of refuge, whither men who had committed involuntary homicide might flee and be safe. The same privilege passed over to the Church, and was sedulously respected by the Christian emperors. Theodosius punished the violation of the protective sanctity of a church as a crime of lese-majesty. But the immunity from the consequences of crime arising from the extended assertion of the principle of sanctuary led to many abuses, and by the legislation of Justinian those guilty of certain specified crimes were to find no right of asylum in the churches.

For particulars as to the immunities long enjoyed by certain famous English sanctuaries—e.g. St. Cuthbert's franchise, Beverley, and Westminster—see the article SANCTUARY.

ATTRITION, as distinct from contrition, is an imperfect sorrow for sin. Contrition is that sorrow for sin which has for its motive the love of God whom the sinner has offended. Attrition arises from a motive which is indeed supernatural—that is to say, apprehended by faith—but which still falls short of contrition. Such motives are—the fear of hell, the loss of heaven, the turpitude of sin. By this last, we understand the turpitude of sin as revealed by faith. We may also, for the sake of clearness, exclude from our definition that kind of sorrow which theologians call serviliter servilis—the sorrow which makes a man renounce sin because he is afraid of hell, while at the same time he would be ready to offend God if he could do so without incurring the penalty.

All Catholics are bound to hold that attrition, as explained above, is good and an effect of God's grace. This is clear from the words of our Lord, "Fear him who can destroy both body and soul in hell;" from the declaration of the Tridentine Council, that attrition which proceeds from considering "the baseness of sin or from the fear of hell and punishment, if it excludes the purpose of sinning and includes the hope of pardon, . . . is a true gift of God and an impulse of the Holy Spirit;"[1] and from subsequent pronouncements of the Popes, particularly of Alexander VIII. The council put forward this Catholic truth against Luther, and succeeding Popes against the Jansenists.

Further, the Council of Trent teaches[2] that attrition does not of itself avail to justify the sinner. Sin which separates the soul from God is only annulled by love which unites it to Him.

But a question was long keenly debated among Catholic divines, viz. whether if a man comes with attrition to the sacrament of penance and receives absolution, this avails to restore him to God's grace. The negative opinion was held by the French clergy in their assembly general of the year 1700, and prevailed in the universities of Paris and Louvain. On the other hand, the affirmative, according to which a sinner who receives absolution with attrition is justified through the grace which the sacrament confers, has always apparently been the commoner tenet in the schools. It rests on the strong argument that as perfect contrition justifies without the actual reception of the sacrament of penance, it is hard to see why this sacrament should have been instituted, if perfect contrition is needed to get any good from it. Alexander VII. in 1667 forbade the advocates of either opinion to pronounce any theological censure on their opponents. But at present the opinion that attrition with the sacrament of penance suffices is universally held. St. Liguori[1] calls it "certain."

AUDIANS or AUDEANS. [See ANTHROPOMORPHITES.]

AUDITOR OF ROTA. [See ROTA.]

AUGUSTINIAN CANONS. The pretensions to high antiquity made by this order, or on its behalf, have involved the history of its origin in much obscurity. Their commencement has been ascribed to some supposed resolution taken by the Apostles to renounce all private property and live in common. This being difficult of proof, the foundation of the order was at least confidently referred to St. Augustine of Hippo, whose rule, it was said, the regular canons had never ceased to follow. But it cannot be shown that St. Augustine ever composed a rule, properly so called. He did, indeed, write a treatise "De Moribus Clericorum," and he also wrote a letter (No. 109) in which he laid down a rule of life for the religious women under his direction, not binding them to strict enclosure, but requiring them to renounce all individual property. But when and by whom the injunctions contained in this letter were adapted to communities of men, are points which have never been cleared up. Moreover, it has been urged, that if St. Augustine promulgated a rule and founded congregations which have had perpetual succession ever since, it seems impossible to explain how St. Benedict should have been universally regarded for centuries as the founder of Western monachism

In one sense, indeed, the regular Canons of St. Austin may lay claim to an antiquity with which no other order can compete; for, as canons, they grow out of an institution and a way of life which reach nearly to the apostolic age. [CANON.] Considered, however, as a particular institution, the mode in which they arose has been thus explained. Discipline having become much relaxed among the canons of the various cathedrals in the Frankish empire, a council held at Aix-la-Chapelle in 816 drew up a rule for their observance. But as this rule did not absolutely prohibit the acquisition or enjoyment of private property, abuses again crept in; and the Popes Nicholas II. and Alexander II., strenuously assisted by St. Peter Damian, held councils at Rome in 1059 and 1063, by the decrees of which the rule of Aix-la-Chapelle was amended, and in particular the canons were bound to a community life and to the renunciation of private property (Fleury, "Hist. Eccl." lxi.). Even after these councils, the canons of many churches lived in much the same way as before; those, therefore, who obeyed the rule prescribed, by way of distinction from the recalcitrants, were called regular canons. The rule itself after a time was commonly described as the rule of St. Augustine, apparently because it was held to be in conformity with his 109th letter and the general spirit of his teaching. The adoption of this rule facilitated the formation of independent bodies of regular canons, neither connected with cathedrals nor with collegiate churches, as had hitherto been the case; accordingly, soon after the beginning of the twelfth century, we read of the foundation of societies of canons, following the rule of St. Austin, in several countries of Europe. In England these canons—who were regarded as monks, not as friars—were very popular and had many houses; they were called Black Canons. At the time of the Dissolution there were about 170 of their houses in England; two out of their number, Waltham and Cirencester, were presided over by mitred abbots. Newstead Abbey, the birthplace of the poet Byron, was originally an Augustinian house.

In Ireland this order was even more popular than in England, holding there, in fact, much the same prominent position that the Benedictines held amongst ourselves. D'Alton puts the number at 223 monasteries and 33 nunneries. The Augustinian priors of Christ Church and All Hallows, Dublin, and of the monasteries at Connell, Kells, Louth, Athassel, Killagh, Newtown, and Raphoe, had seats in the Irish parliament. (Hélyot, "Ordres Monastiques;" Dugdale's "Monasticon.")[1]

AUGUSTINIAN HERMITS. The remarks made in the foregoing article on the Canons apply equally to the pretensions to an historical descent from St. Austin made by the Hermits who bear his name. In point of fact the order originated in a union of several existing congregations effected in 1265 under the direction of Pope Alexander IV. Their houses soon became very numerous, and the usual variations in regard to the strict observance of their rule, followed by reformations of greater or less fame, made their appearance. They were regarded as friars, not as monks, and were expressly aggregated to the other orders of friars by Pius V. in 1567. Their house at Wittenberg had the dubious honour of counting Martin Luther among its members. The Augustinian Hermits are said to have possessed in the sixteenth century three thousand convents with thirty thousand friars, besides three hundred nunneries following a similar rule. But during the French Revolution an immense number of their houses were dissolved; and at the present time scarcely a hundred are left.

there were about thirty-two houses of Augustinian Hermits at the Dissolution. The most celebrated was the friary at Oxford, which educated many distinguished men; here Erasmus lodged with his friend Prior Charnock when he visited Oxford. A grey crumbling gateway in New Inn Hall Lane alone is left to mark the spot. Capgrave, the well-known hagiographer, was an Augustinian Hermit. At the present time there is one house of Augustinian friars in England (at Hoxton, London, N.), none in Scotland, and twelve in Ireland—viz. Drogheda, in the province of Armagh; Dublin, Rathfarnham, Callan, New Ross, and Grantstown (to which community belonged the illustrious Dr. Doyle); Fethard, Cork, Limerick, and Dungarvan, in the province of Cashel; and Ballyhaunis and Galway in that of Tuam. The house in London, as well as one in Rome, form part of the Irish province, which now numbers about forty-five Fathers and twenty clerical students, and whence Augustinians have gone out who have founded a new and separate province in the United States of America, where there are several fine churches, convents, and colleges. AUREOLE (from aureolus, golden, gilt, of golden colour). 1. In Christian art it is the gold colour surrounding the whole figure in sacred pictures, and representing the glory of the person represented. It is distinct from the nimbus, which only covers the head. The aureole (also called scutum, vesica, piscis, &c.) was usually reserved for pictures of the three divine Persons, of Christ, and of the Blessed Virgin along with the Holy Child. (Kraus, "Archæol. Dict.")

2. In theology, it is defined as a certain accidental reward added to the essential bliss of heaven, because of the excellent victory which the person who receives it has attained during his warfare upon earth. It is given, according to St. Thomas,[1] to virgins, martyrs, and to doctors and preachers. Virgins have triumphed with special glory over the flesh; martyrs, over the world, which persecuted them to death; preachers, over the devil, whom they have driven, not only from their own hearts, but also from those of others.

AUTOCEPHALI (αὐτοκέφαλοι). A name given by Greek canonists to metropolitans who were not subject to a patriarch. Such were the metropolitans of Cyprus, who contrived to free themselves from subjection to the Patriarch of Antioch; or, again, the archbishops of Bulgaria, who were independent of Constantinople.

AVE MARIA. This familiar prayer, called also the Angelical Salutation, consists of three parts—(1) the salutation of the Archangel Gabriel, Ave [Maria] gratia plena, Dominus tecum; benedicta tu in mulieribus; (2) the words of Elizabeth to our Lady, et benedictus fructus ventris tui; (3) an addition made by the Church, Sancta Maria, Mater Dei, ora pro nobis peccatoribus nunc et in hora mortis nostræ. Parts 1 and 2 seem to have come into common use as a formula of devotion towards the end of the twelfth century; the use of them is enjoined by the Constitutions of Odo, bishop of Paris, in 1196. The third part gives a compact and appropriate expression of the feelings with which Christians regard the Blessed Virgin. The words nunc. . . . nostræ are said to have come from the Franciscans; the rest of the verse is believed to have first come into use in the middle of the fifteenth century. The whole Ave Maria as it now stands is ordered in the breviary of Pius V. (1568) to be used daily before each canonical hour and after compline.

AZYMITES (ἀ priv. ζύμη). By this term the Greek Schismatics designate Christians of the Latin Church, because the latter use unleavened bread in the administration of the Eucharist. In the Western Church the point has never been regarded as of vital importance; the priest is only enjoined sub gravi to use unleavened bread; and the Council of Florence declared (1439) that after consecration the body of our Lord was really present (veraciter confici) whether the bread used were made with or without leaven. But the Greek ecclesiastics who assented to this article were ill received by their countrymen on their return to Constantinople (Gibbon, ch. lxvii.), and this point of using or not using leaven is still one of the marks of difference between East and West. The arguments either way are well summed up by Fritz (art. Azymites, Wetzer and Welte). The original propriety of using or not using leaven turns mainly on the question whether Maundy Thursday was within the period of the Azymes; on which see HOLY WEEK.

BACCANARISTS (or PACCANARISTS), or Regular Clerks of the Faith of Jesus. The object of this congregation, founded at the end of the last century by one Baccanari or Paccanari, a native of the Trentino, was to revive the suppressed Society of Jesus under another name. In 1798, having obtained ecclesiastical approval for his project, Baccanari with twelve companions took possession of a country house near Spoleto, and commenced a monastery. They wore the Jesuit habit, and made the three simple vows, to which they afterwards added a fourth vow of unconditional obedience to the Pope. Many others joined them, and they had branches in France and even in Holland. But as the prospect of a speedy revival of the Society of Jesus grew brighter, members of Baccanari's congregation began to desert him, some joining the Jesuit colleges which had never ceased to subsist in Russia, others repairing to the kingdom of Naples, where the Society was re-established in 1804. Finally, in 1814, the Jesuits being everywhere restored, the remaining Baccanarists applied for admission into the order, and the congregation of the Faith of Jesus came to an end.

BAIUS. A famous theologian of the University of Louvain, who anticipated the errors of Jansenius. His real name was Michael Bay. He was born at Melin, in the Low Countries, in 1513. He studied at Louvain, where he taught philosophy and took his Doctor's degree. In 1551 he became Professor of Scripture, and in 1563 he was sent to the Council of Trent by the King of Spain, returning in the following year to the university. He won great repute by his undoubted learning and by his blameless life, and honours were heaped upon him. In 1578 he was made chancellor of the university, and, at a later date, General Inquisitor for the Netherlands. He continued to teach till his death, in 1589.

However, his life was a stormy one. Baius deserted the scholastic method and did much to revive the study of the Fathers. No one, of course, could justly blame him for promoting patristic learning. But he marred the services which he might well have rendered to the Church, by exaggerating and misinterpreting the Augustinian doctrine on grace. His lectures excited opposition especially among the Franciscans, and several propositions taken from his oral teaching were delated to the Sorbonne and condemned there. In 1563 and 1564 he published various treatises on free will, original justice, justification, &c. Three years later, Pius V. condemned 76 propositions, representing on the whole the opinions of Baius, although some are not actually contained in his works. These propositions were condemned "in globo et respective," as heretical, erroneous, suspicious, rash, scandalous and offensive to pious ears—i.e. each of these propositions merited one of these censures, but no particular censure was attached to any one proposition. The name of Baius was not mentioned in the bull, which was communicated privately to the theological faculty at Louvain, without being promulgated. Various disputes arose on the authority and sense of this bull which need not detain us here. Gregory XIII. confirmed the bull of his predecessor, and again condemned the propositions. The famous Jesuit Toletus took the constitution of Gregory to Louvain, where it was read before the assembled university. Thereupon Baius acknowledged that many of the condemned propositions were to be found in his writings. "I condemn them," he said, "according to the intention of the bull, and as the bull condemns them." Toletus, it is reported, frequently declared that he had never met a more learned or more humble man.

The following are the chief heads of the erroneous system which Baius maintained. He regarded original justice, including the perfect subjection of the lower nature, as a part of human nature, not as a free gift of God to our first parents. Starting from this principle, he held further that eternal life would have been due to Adam, in the event of his perseverance, as a matter of rigorous justice, excluding grace and mercy altogether. Consequently, man, after the fall, was, till restored by grace, mutilated in nature and capable only of sin. Baius did not deny the freedom of the will in terms, but he did so in effect, for he made it consist in the mere absence of external restraint. Man chose to sin, but he could not choose anything else. The Benedictine Gerberon published the works of Baius with the documents relating to the controversy in a quarto volume at Cologne in 1696. (See Kuhn, "Dogmatik," vol. iv. p. 319 seq.; and his article Baius in Wetzer and Welte. Linsenmann, "Michael Baius und die Grundlegung des Jansenismus," Tübingen, 1867.)

BALDACCHINO. A canopy, such as is often suspended over the high-altar, usually hanging from the roof of the church, though sometimes, as at Rome, it rests on four pillars.

From the time when Constantine began to build sumptuous churches, the altar-table was overshadowed by a canopy made in the form of a cupola and surmounted by a cross. It was adorned with sculptures and rested on columns of precious material. This canopy was named ciborium, κιβώριον, from its resemblance to the bowl of a cup, and the Blessed Sacrament was placed in a vessel suspended by a cord from the interior of this canopy.

The name Baldacchino is said to have come into use in the middle ages and to be derived from Baaldak, the name by which Babylon (Bagdad?) was known during the time of the crusades. Baaldak or Babylon was celebrated for the manufacture of fine silken stuffs, and with these the canopy was frequently hung. (Rock, "Hierurgia," p. 506 seq.)

Baldacchino is also used as the name of the canopy which is carried over the priest who bears the Blessed Sacrament in procession on Holy Thursday, Corpus Christi, &c. (Gavantus.)

BANNER. An ecclesiastical banner is one in which the stuff, whether of silk or linen, on which religious persons, objects, or mottoes are depicted, is not nailed to the staff, as in the case of an ordinary flag, but to a transverse bar which is attached to the staff and with it forms the figure of a cross. Of this kind were the cavalry standards (vexilla) used in the Roman army. At the head of the staff, above the banner, and also in those signa militaria which were without a banner, was fixed some emblem possessing significance in the eyes of the soldiers, as an eagle, or a serpent, or a ball, or a bronze figure of Victory, or of Mars, or of the reigning emperor. Constantine, after his vision, and the victory which followed over Maxentius, ordered that the sacred standard (labarum; q. v.) which had been shown to him should be adopted throughout the army, the eagle or other figure at the head of the staff being replaced by the sacred monogram ☧ or ☩, representing the first two letters of the Greek ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ. The Christian apologists—e.g. Minucius Felix and Tertullian—are fond of drawing attention to the resemblance which a Roman military standard bore to a cross. The adoption of the labarum would at once satisfy the large and ever increasing number of Christians in the imperial armies, and not displease the Pagan soldiers, because the traditional shape was not departed from.

As the soldier in battle looks to the colours of his regiment, and while they float aloft knows that the day may still be won, and is animated to do valiantly, so should Christians, as the Church by her sanction of banners reminds us, fix their gaze on that Cross of Christ which is the standard of their warfare, and be continually animated by the thought to fresh courage.

Banners are chiefly used in processions, but they are also hung round or near the altar, their prime significance being in all cases that they show forth the victory of Christ.

In the military orders [see that article] a practice was introduced for each knight at the time of his admission to hang up his banner in the church; hence the mouldering relics which may be seen in Henry VII.'s Chapel, Westminster, in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and other places. ("Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiq.," Smith; Smith and Cheetham; Schmid in Wetzer and Welte.)

BANNS. The proclamation of intended marriage, in order that if anyone is aware of an impediment, he may state it to the ecclesiastical authorities, and so prevent the celebration of the wedding. Such proclamations were introduced first of all by the custom of particular places, but it was not till 1215 that they were imposed, at the Fourth Lateran Council, by a general law binding the whole Church,[1] The Council of Trent[2] orders the banns to be proclaimed by the parish priest of the persons who intend to marry, during Mass on three continuous festivals. At the same time, it permits the ordinary to dispense from the obligation of proclaiming the marriage, for a grave reason. According to theologians and the S. Congregation of the Council, the banns must be proclaimed in the parish church of the contracting parties, and in each parish church if they live in different parishes, at the principal Mass on three continuous Sundays or holidays of obligation—or at least on days when there is sure to be a concourse of people in the church. It is generally held that if the marriage does not take place within two months, or at most four, of the last publication, the banns must be proclaimed anew.

BAPTISM (from βαπτισμός, dipping, or immersion[3] in water). A spiritual meaning was given to baptism by St. John the Baptist, who baptised or immersed his disciples in the Jordan, to signify the repentance and renewal by which the whole man was to be cleansed and purified. The Talmud of Babylon[4] mentions a baptism of Jewish proselytes, but it is impossible to say when this rite arose. In any case, it is certain that when our Lord made baptism the rite of initiation into His Church, He employed a symbolism already familiar to the Jews. But Christ exalted the act to a dignity beyond the baptism of John, changing the "baptism of penance" into the sacrament of regeneration. The Gospels do not tell us when Christian baptism was instituted, and a great variety of opinions has prevailed upon this point among the Fathers and theologians of the Church. We may, however, safely assume that Christ instituted baptism before His Passion, for since baptism is, as we shall see further on, the gate of the sacraments, the Apostles could not have received Holy Communion at the Last Supper, unless they had been previously made Christians by baptism. Christ himself did not as a general rule baptise: still He did, according to an ancient tradition, baptise St. Peter, who conferred the sacrament on St. Andrew, St. Andrew on St. James and St. John, and they on the rest of the twelve.[1] After Christ's Passion and Resurrection, or at latest after Pentecost, the precept of receiving baptism became binding on all human beings.

After this sketch of the history of the institution and promulgation we may go on to consider the sacrament as it exists in the Church. We shall treat of the following points in order: viz. the essentials in the administration of the sacrament, its effects, its necessity, and the ceremonies with which it is given.

I. Under the first head questions occur as to the matter, the form, the minister, and the subject of baptism. (α) The matter is water, poured on the head of the candidate. The Scripture makes it clear enough that water is to be used, but it is not so plain at first sight that the sprinkling or pouring of water will suffice. In Apostolic times the body of the baptised person was immersed, for St. Paul looks on this immersion as typifying burial with Christ, and speaks of baptism as a bath.[2] Immersion still prevails among the Copts and Nestorians, and for many ages baptism was so given among the Latins also, for even St. Thomas, in the thirteenth century, speaks of baptism by immersion as the common practice (communior usus) of his time.[3] Still the rubric of the Roman Rituale, which states that baptism can be validly given by immersion, infusion, or aspersion, is fully justified by tradition. Persons on a sick-bed, in danger of death, were baptised where they lay without immersion. This baptism was always considered sufficient, and in case of recovery they had only to get the ceremonies supplied and to be confirmed.[1] It is only necessary for the validity of the sacrament to pour the water once—for although a threefold infusion or immersion has been given from the earliest times, still here, too, we meet with exceptions, for Gregory the Great allowed the Spanish Church to continue its custom of baptising by one immersion.

(β) The form or words used in the sacrament are "I baptise thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," or words equivalent to these. Thus the Greek form "The servant of Christ N. is baptised in the name," &c., is valid, as appears from the instruction of Eugenius IV. to the Armenians, and from subsequent decisions of the Holy See. A form similar to that of the Greeks is used by all the Orientals, except the Copts, Abyssinians, and Maronites, who approximate to the Latin form.[2] Many great theologians suppose that the Apostles, for a time, in virtue of a special dispensation, baptised simply in the name of Christ; but this opinion seems to rest on a very questionable interpretation of passages in the New Testament.

(γ) The minister of baptism, says Eugenius IV., in the instruction quoted above, "is a priest, to whom in virtue of his office it belongs to baptise." The Roman Rituale prescribes that baptism should be given by the parish priest of the place, or by another priest appointed by him, or by the ordinary. A deacon is the extraordinary minister of solemn baptism. The Pontifical mentions baptising as one of his duties, a duty, however, which he can lawfully exercise only by delegation from the bishop or priest. But besides this, in case of necessity, anyone, even a heretic or Jew, may baptise if he uses the proper matter and form, and intends to do what Christ ordained; and even if no such necessity exist, baptism so given, although unlawful, is still valid. That one who is not a priest may baptise is clear from the fact that Philip the deacon did so, as we learn from the Acts of the Apostles. Tertullian expressly says that baptism can be given "by all."[3] The 38th Canon of the Council of Elvira, in 306, assumes the same truth. There was, however, a difficulty in early times about baptism given outside of the Church—viz.

[2] Rom. vi. 4; Ephes. v. 26 (λουτρῷ).

[3] It is not true that the Greeks and all other Orientals baptise by immersion. The child is, indeed, according to the common Oriental rite, placed in the font; but the actual baptism is by infusion of water on its head. Billuart, De Bapt. i. 3, where Goar is quoted. by heretics. St. Cyprian and Firmilian denied, St. Stephen, the contemporary Pope, affirmed, its validity. The Pope appealed in favour of his view to Apostolic tradition. It is needless to say that the Pope's teaching prevailed. The great Council of Arles in 314 decided for the validity of heretical baptism, and the Fourth Lateran Council defined it. The 18th Canon of the Council of Nicæa in no way contradicts this article of faith, for, though it orders the disciples of Paul of Samosata to be rebaptised, these heretics had in all probability corrupted the form of baptism.[1]

(δ) The Recipient of Baptism.—All human beings, even infants and adults who have never had the use of reason, are capable of receiving this sacrament. Adults are bound by the precept of Christ to come and be baptised; parents and guardians are bound by the same precept to bring their children, or other persons in their charge, who have not come to the use of reason, and to have them baptised. In the middle ages and in modern times various sects have repudiated infant baptism. It is difficult to give strict proof from Scripture in favour of it, nor can it be denied that in the early ages persons often deferred their own baptism or that of their children, except in danger of death, from a dread of incurring the responsibilities of the Christian life. At the same time the Catholic doctrine that children are to be baptised may be inferred from Scripture, and is abundantly justified by tradition. Thus we read of the Apostles baptising whole houses; and the very fact that our Lord promises His kingdom to children shows that He did not mean to exclude them from the sacrament of regeneration. The early Fathers supply the needed comment on Scripture. We have an explicit testimony for infant baptism in St. Irenæus. "Christ," he writes, "came to save all—all, I say, who through Him are born again to God, infants and little ones, and boys and young men, and the aged."[2] In a letter written by St. Cyprian and sixty-four bishops assembled in council, an answer is given to the question whether the baptism of children must be deferred, on the analogy of circumcision, till the eighth day. The bishops answer unanimously in the negative. If, the saint argues, adults are admitted to the font, how much more should those be baptised at once who have not sinned, except so far as by natural descent from Adam they have contracted in the moment of birth the infection of ancient death, who for this very reason come more easily to the remission of sins, because it is the sins of another, not their own, which are remitted to them.[1]

II. The Effects of Baptism.—(α) It remits all sin, original and actual. "Be baptised," St. Peter said,[2] "everyone of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of your sins." "I believe in one baptism," says the Nicene Creed, "for the remission of sins."

(β) It remits all the penalties due for sin before God, whether temporal or eternal. A temporal punishment often remains due to sin, even after its guilt has been removed by absolution. Baptism, as the Church defines, leaves no such penalties, and the apostolic origin of this belief is proved by the practice of the early Church, which imposed no penance for the gravest crimes if committed before baptism. The rebellion of the flesh does of course remain after baptism, but this rebellion is not sin, unless the will fully consents to it.[3] (γ) It bestows sanctifying grace and the infused virtues. A difficulty was felt even among Catholic divines with regard to the case of children. All admitted that children received the forgiveness of sins, but how could they have grace and the infused virtues imparted to them? How, for example, could a child receive faith in baptism, when it plainly remains unable to exercise faith till the age of reason? The answer is that the capacity is one thing, the actual exercise another. A man in sleep may have the capacity for or habit of faith, though he cannot exercise it till he wakes. Moreover, the very fact that baptism gives a title to the possession of heaven proves that it always confers grace, since it is the grace of God, not the mere absence of sin, which enables us to enter there. The Council of Vienne contented itself with pronouncing the opinion that grace is conferred in baptism "more probable." Since then, the Council of Trent defined that all the sacraments of the new law confer grace on those who rightly receive them.[4]

(δ) It imprints a "character" or indelible mark on the soul, whence it cannot be reiterated. [See under CHARACTER.] (ε) It makes the recipient a member of Christ and of the Church, and makes it possible for him to receive the other sacraments.

An infant is unable to put a bar in the way of sacramental grace, and therefore must receive the full effect of baptism rightly administered. With adults it is different. In them positive dispositions are called for. In order to receive baptism validly, an adult is only required to have the intention of doing so. If the intention be there, he receives the character and incurs the responsibilities of a Christian; but in order to obtain the grace of the sacrament, he must come with faith and with contrition perfect or imperfect—i.e. he must from a supernatural motive detest his sins, and resolve to begin a new life.[1] Thus a person who comes without at least attrition for all his mortal sins, and the purpose of amendment, would receive neither grace nor forgiveness. If, however, he afterwards supplied the requisite dispositions, the grace of the sacrament would revive, and he would receive remission of original sin, and of all actual sins (including the temporal punishment annexed) which he had committed up to the date of his baptism.[2]

III. The Necessity of Baptism.—The "passage" (from death to life), says the Council of Trent, "cannot be made since the promulgation of the Gospel except by the laver of regeneration, or by the desire of it, as it is written, 'Unless a man be born of water and the Holy Ghost, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.'" It is interesting to notice that Tertullian makes precisely the same application of this text against the heretics of his day.[3] Accordingly, infants dying unbaptised are excluded from the kingdom of heaven, although, according to the opinion now universally held, they do not undergo suffering of any kind in the next world. [See LIMBO.] Protestant difficulties on this point arise from inadequate ideas on grace and the sovereignty of God. Heaven is a reward which is no way due to human nature, and God can withhold it, as He pleases, without injustice. In adults the baptism of desire or of blood may supply the place of baptism by water. Thus an act of the perfect love of God remits sin, original and actual, and confers sanctifying grace. Our Lord in St. John's Gospel promises that He will love those who love Him, a promise which would not be fulfilled if a man who loved God above all things and for His own sake, were still allowed to remain God's enemy in consequence of unforgiven sin. The baptism of blood—i.e. martyrdom—not only forgives sin but remits the temporal penalties of sin also. St. Cyprian says of catechumens who died before being baptised with water, that they had in fact been baptised "with the most glorious and greatest baptism of blood,"[1] and Tertullian witnesses to the belief of the early Church that the Holy Innocents were sanctified by their blood.[2]

IV. Conditional Baptism is given when there is some doubt whether a person has been validly baptised. The form prescribed in the Roman Rituale is "If thou hast not been baptised, I baptise thee," &c., and in England this form is used in the case of all persons who have received baptism from a Protestant minister, when they are reconciled to the Church.[3] In early times the condition was not expressed in words. Fleury could not find any trace of the conditional form before the time of Alexander III., and St. Thomas alleges a decretal of this Pope for its use.[4]

V. The Ceremonies of Baptism.—The following is a summary of the ceremonies prescribed by the Roman Rituale, with their signification as given in the Roman Catechism. The sacrament is to be administered, apart from cases of necessity, in the church or baptistery near the church. However, the children of kings and princes may be baptised in their private chapels. Baptismal water is in all cases to be used. The person baptised is to receive a baptismal name, and the Rituale recommends the parents to impose the name of a saint, that the child may profit by his example and patronage. The priest meets the child at the door of the church; drives the devil from him; breathes thrice upon his face, to signify the new spiritual life which is to be breathed into his soul; puts salt into his mouth, as a sign that he is to be freed from the corruption of sin; signs him on the forehead and breast with the sign of the cross, and leads him into the temple of God. Then the priest solemnly exorcises the child; anoints his ears and nostrils with spittle—after our Lord's example, who thus restored the blind man's sight—and asks him in three separate interrogations whether he renounces Satan, all his works and all his pomps. He next anoints him with the oil of catechumens on the breast and between the shoulders. The ancient athletes were anointed before their contests in the arena, and in the same way the young Christian is prepared for the "good fight" which lies before him.[1] The recipient then, through his sponsors, professes his faith by reciting the Creed, and the priest pours water three times on his head, in the form of a cross, at the same time pronouncing the words "I baptise thee," &c. After baptism, chrism is put on the top of his head, to signify his union with Christ, the head of his Church; he receives a white garment, and a burning light in his hands, symbols of innocence and of the light of faith and charity.

[3] An order was issued by the Vicars Apostolic at the beginning of this century, that all converts from Protestantism born after 1773, should be conditionally baptised. This order was re-enacted by the first provincial synod of Westminster, cap. xvi. The water used is to be holy water, not water taken from the font, and all the ceremonies are to be omitted.

These rites are recommended as well by their beautiful symbolism and the majestic words which accompany them as by their venerable antiquity. Tertullian[2] mentions the triple renunciation made in baptism, the unction, the triple immersion. The Sacramentary of Gelasius[3] (died 496) contains almost every ceremony of baptism to be found in the present Rituale. Two differences, however, must be noted. In the West solemn baptism was given as a rule only at Easter and Pentecost; in the East it was also given at the Epiphany.[4] Again, the ceremonies now in use were intended primarily for adults, and instead of being given together were spread over three or four weeks. Thus in the Gelasian Sacramentary, the ceremonies of baptism begin on the third Sunday in Lent, although the baptism itself did not take place till Holy Saturday. (See Chardon, "Histoire des Sacrements.")

BAPTISM OF SHIPS. Baptism, or, more correctly, blessing, of ships, a form in the Roman Rituale. Certain prayers are said, in which God is asked to bless the ship and those who travel in it, as He blessed the ark of Noe and helped Peter when he was sinking in the deep. This form is not found in the older "Ordines." The practice of blessing ships seems to have become common during the time of the Crusades.

BAPTISMAL NAME. A name given in baptism, to signify that the baptised person has become a new creature in Christ. The Rituale forbids heathenish names, and advises, though it does not enjoin, the taking of a saint's name.

The custom of taking a new name in baptism was not usual in the early Church—though we find instances of it from the third century onwards. Then, and long after, Christians bore not only the names of saints, but also those (1) of feasts—e.g. Epiphanius, Natalis (from Christmas), Paschasius, &c.; (2) of virtues—e.g. Faith, Innocent, Pius, &c.; (3) animals—e.g. Leo, Columba, Ursula, &c. (Hefele, "Beiträge," 393.)

BAPTISMAL WATER. Water blessed in the font on Holy Saturday and the vigil of Pentecost, which must be used at least in solemn baptism. The priest signs the water with the cross, divides it with his hand, pouring it towards the north, south, east and west: breathes into it, and places in it the paschal candle, after which some of it is sprinkled on the people and some removed for private use. The priest then pours oil of catechumens and chrism into the water.

The origin of this custom of blessing the water is lost in immemorial antiquity. A form for blessing the water is found even in the Apostolic Constitutions,[1] in ancient Western and in all the Oriental liturgies.[2]

BAPTISTERY (called also in Greek φωτιστήριον, the place of illumination). That part of the church in which solemn baptism is administered. Anciently, when baptism was constantly given to adults and the rite of immersion prevailed, it was inconvenient to baptise in the church itself, and hence after the conversion of Constantine separate buildings for the administration of baptism were erected and attached to the cathedral church. Eusebius [1] mentions a baptistery of this kind in the basilica at Tyre, and examples of such buildings still exist at Rome, Pisa, Pistoia, Modena, Padua, &c. It was only gradually that baptism was administered in any but cathedral churches. The ancient baptistery was sometimes round, sometimes it had four, eight, or twelve sides. Cyril of Jerusalem distinguishes the outer part of the baptistery (προαύλιος οἶκος), in which the catechumens renounced Satan, &c., from the inner portion (ἐσώτερος οἶκος), in which they were baptised.

[1] Apost. Constit. vii. 43.

[2] Denzinger, Ritus Orient. p. 24.

The modern baptistery is merely a part of the church set apart for baptism. According to the Roman Rituale, it should be railed off, it should have a gate fastened by a lock, and be adorned, if possible, with a picture of Christ's baptism by St. John. It is convenient that it should contain a chest with two compartments, one for the holy oils, the other for the salt, candle, &c., used in baptism. (See De Montault, "Construction des Eglises," p. 105.)

BARNABITES. The proper designation of the religious of this order is that of "Regular Clerks of the Congregation of St. Paul;" they are popularly called Barnabites on account of a church of St. Barnabas at Milan which belonged to them in the sixteenth century. Their principal founder was the holy priest Antonio Maria Zaccaria (died 1539); with him were joined Bartolommeo Ferrari and Giacomo Antonio Morigena. The frequent wars by which the north of Italy had been devastated; the influx of Lutheran soldiers, whose example tended to propagate a spirit of contempt for the sacraments and the clergy; and the frequency of pestilential disorders caused by the famine and misery of the population, had produced about 1530 a state of things which powerfully appealed to the charity and pity of the true pastors of Jesus Christ. It occurred to Zaccaria that a better way of combating these evils could not be found than by organising a congregation of secular clergy, not going out of the world but living in it and working for it, and bound by a rule—that is, diligently attending to their own sanctification while preaching reformation to others, —"who should regenerate and revive the love of the divine worship and a truly Christian way of life by frequent preaching and the faithful administration of the Sacraments." In 1533 the foundation of such a congregation, under a special rule approved by the Holy See, was sanctioned by Clement VII. The members pronounced their vows before the Archbishop of Milan, and chose Zaccaria for their superior. The order soon spread into France and Germany. In 1579 their constitutions were examined by St. Charles Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan, protector of the congregation, and being approved by him were finally confirmed. They called, and still call, their establishments colleges. They are governed by a General residing at Rome, elected for three years, and capable of re-election once. Besides the three usual vows they take a fourth, never to seek any office or ecclesiastical dignity, and to accept no post outside of their order without the permission of the Pope. The habit is merely the black soutane worn by secular priests in Lombardy at the time of their foundation. Their principal house is now at Rome; and they have about twenty colleges in all, one in Paris, and others in various parts of Italy and Austria. There is no house of these religious either in England or in Ireland. Among the eminent men of this order may be mentioned Sauli, called the Apostle of Corsica; Bascapé, the biographer of St. Charles Borromeo; and Gavanti, the well-known writer on rubrics and ceremonies. (Hélyot, "Ordres Monastiques.")

BASILIANS. This order takes its name from the great St. Basil (died 379), bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia. On his return to his own country after a long journey through Egypt, Palestine and Mesopotamia—made that he might collect the experience of monks and solitaries living under many different rules—Basil, still thirsting for the perfect life in which self should be subdued and union with Christ attained, withdrew into a desert region of Pontus, where his mother Emelia and his sister Macrina had already established monasteries, and laid the foundation of the great order which bears his name. To those who placed themselves under his direction he gave two rules, the Great and the Little—the former containing fifty-five, the latter three hundred and thirteen articles. This twofold rule became so famous and popular in the East as to supplant all others; and at this day it alone is recognised and followed by the monks of the Greek Church. The order never penetrated into France or England; but in southern Italy there were many Basilian convents in existence, even before the time of St. Benedict, who regarded both the rule and its author with great veneration, and appears to have had it before him when framing his own rule. In Russia, the first missionaries to which were Greek monks, the Basilian order received an immense development. Nearly all of them have, since the division of the ninth century, adhered to the Photian schism; there are, however, in Austrian Poland and Hungary several communities of Basilian monks which are in communion with Rome; the monks of these call themselves Ruthenians. In Spain there were several Basilian monasteries, reformed and unreformed, up to the date of the suppression in 1835. The habit of the Basilians is scarcely to be distinguished from that of the Benedictines. Nearly all the convents of Basilian nuns, founded by St. Macrina, like those of the monks, have embraced the Eastern schism. (Hélyot, "Ordres Monastiques.")[1]

BASILICA (βασιλική). This name began to be applied to Christian churches about the beginning of the fourth century. The earlier expressions were "house of prayer" (οἶκος προσευκτήριος), "oratory" (προσευκτήριον), and "Lord's house" (κυριακόν, dominicum), besides the loosely-employed term "ecclesia."

It has been commonly held that the ancient Roman basilicas (large halls, like the "Basilica Portia" built by Cato about 180 B.C., used for the purposes of justice or commerce) passed in considerable numbers into Christian hands, after the conversion of Constantine, and were used for Christian worship; that new churches were built after the model of these, and that the name "basilica" was naturally applied to buildings of either class. Closer investigation has furnished grounds for a somewhat different view. In a learned paper contributed by Prof. Kraus of Freiburg to the "R. Encykl. d. christl. Alterth." the following conclusions are given, as, in the opinion of the writer, solidly established by the evidence. (1) All that the Romans meant by "basilica" was a fine, stately, splendid building; no notion of what was kingly or princely connected itself in their minds with the term. (2) Christian congregations used buildings or rooms set apart for divine worship, from the first. (3) Before the time of Constantine, these were, at Rome, ordinary chambers in private houses, the triclinia, or other large rooms in the dwellings of the wealthy, and, specially, the private basilicas of Roman palaces. Such a basilica is mentioned in the Clementine "Recognitions" (a work which, apart from all question as to its genuineness, is certainly of a date not later than the third century) as having formed part of the mansion of Theophilus, a wealthy citizen of Antioch, even in the Apostolic age, and been used by the Christians as a church. (4) The form of these private basilicas probably bore a considerable resemblance to that of the pre-Augustan forensic basilicas, such as the Portian basilica already noticed; this point, however, is not at present determined with absolute certainty. (5) It is not probable that, apart from the chambers or halls and private basilicas above mentioned, the Christians of the pre-Nicene period possessed, at least in Rome, any churches properly so called within the city. (6) Besides the private basilicas, sepulchral buildings were used for Christian worship in the period referred to—exceptionally, and in times of persecution, those under ground (Catacombs); regularly, the "Memories" and Cells of Martyrs built above ground. Both parts of this proposition can be proved by abundant evidence. (7) The Christian basilica of the age of Constantine is not a simple adaptation or imitation of the forensic basilica of the preceding period. For the forensic basilica appears to have had no one determinate shape; sometimes it had an apse, sometimes not, and it was entered either from one end or from the side—whereas the Christian basilica, faithful to the form of the crypt, or "Memory," of the earlier time, had always an apse, and was always entered from the end opposite the apse. At the same time, the forensic basilica, with its constant internal feature of a space divided by rows of columns into three aisles—a form very suitable to the needs of a large congregation—was certainly not overlooked by Christian architects. (8) The final conclusion is that the Christian basilica of the age of Constantine arose out of the combination of two factors—one the sepulchral "Cella," terminating in one or three apses; the other, the great three-aisled hall, so familiar to Roman eyes, whether in the forensic or in the private basilicas.

The origin of the Christian basilica having been considered, it remains to show what were its parts, structural features, and arrangements for worship. As a general rule, it was built in an east and west direction, the altar or table being sometimes at one end, sometimes at the other. It was usually surrounded by an outer wall. Through a portico or colonnade, forming a vestibule, admission was obtained into a quadrangle (atrium), round which ran an arcade, separated by a low partition from the enclosed space (area), which was open to the air. In the middle of the "area" was the "cantharus," or water-basin, where the faithful washed their faces and hands before entering the church. The right-hand arcade was for men; that on the left, for women; here penitents must remain during the service; those, however, whose offences were of a very heinous type were excluded even from these, and had to stand in the open area. On the opposite side of the atrium was an oblong hall, formed by rows of pillars, which was sometimes called the "narthex" or "ferula." Passing through this, the worshipper entered the church by a door which was called the "Beautiful Gate." He found himself in a nave (vaós) with two flanking aisles (from which it was separated by pillars), but without a transept; as he proceeded, he came upon the "ambo" [see that article]; beyond which were the "cancelli," or rails, parting off the choir—which was for the clergy—from the rest of the church. At the end of all was the semicircular vaulted apse [see APSE], with the bishop's chair in the centre, and seats for the clergy on either hand; just in front of the apse was the altar or table. During the divine worship, the men occupied the south, the women the north, aisle; the space between was left free.

At Rome thirteen churches still retain the name of "basilicas"—five larger, and eight smaller. Those of the former class are St. Peter's, St. John Lateran, St. Mary Major, St. Paul Without the Walls, and St. Lawrence. Among the smaller basilicas, San Clemente (beneath which an older church was discovered in 1858 by the Irish Dominican, Father Mullooly), Santa Croce in Gerusalemme, Santa Sabina, and San Sebastiano, are of great interest and beauty. BASILIDIANS. [See GNOSTICISM.]

BASLE, COUNCIL OF. The schism in the Papacy, healed with difficulty at the Council of Constance through the election of Martin V., produced in the fifteenth century a prevalent sentiment that the most effectual safeguard against the recurrence of so terrible an evil lay in the frequent assemblage of general councils. It was provided accordingly, by one of the decrees of Constance (1414–1418), that a general council should in future be held every five years. Martin V., in pursuance of the decree, convoked a council for 1423, to meet at Pavia; but various difficulties arose, and it was finally arranged that Basle should be the place of meeting, and the time, July 1431. Martin also named Cardinal Julian Cesarini papal legate and president of the assembly. But before the day of meeting the Pope died; and a doubt as to the intentions of his successor influenced many bishops, so that there was but a slender gathering at the formal opening of the council. Cesarini, however who had himself been absent on the opening day, having been sent into Bohemia to endeavour to effect a reconciliation with the Hussites, sent out messengers and letters in all directions; and soon a great number of French and German bishops—most of whom sincerely desired to carry out a real reformation, both "in the head and the members" of the Church—was assembled at Basle. The new Pope, Eugenius IV., was deeply impressed with the importance of taking advantage of the humiliation of the Eastern Empire (which, owing to the encroachments of the Ottoman power, was now reduced to a small district round Constantinople) to open negotiations—earnestly desired by the Greeks themselves—for the healing of the Photian schism, and reunion of the East and West. The joint council which would be necessary for this purpose could not, the Pope saw, be held at Basle, because the Greeks would never consent to cross the Alps. Again, the Hussites in Bohemia having recently gained some important military successes, the Pope considered that bishops could not safely proceed to a city which seemed, in Italian eyes, to be within the reach of the dreaded Procopius. Other special objections were alleged in the bull, which transferred the council to Bologna. The bishops at Basle, headed by Cesarini—who wrote to the Pope, endeavouring to show that the particular reasons alleged for the transfer were founded on mistake, or had little weight—vehemently opposed the removal of the council, and continued their sittings. They came chiefly from France and Germany; Italy, England, and Spain, furnished each a very slender contingent. The number present, even at the most important sessions, does not appear to have exceeded fifty. According to the relative importance which good men might attach to the project of reunion with the Greeks or to the reform of ecclesiastical abuses, they might honestly prefer a city south or north of the Alps as the place of meeting for the council. The general opinion, however, seems to have been at this time in favour of Basle. The Pope himself, finding in 1432 that he could not bring over the Emperor Sigismund to his opinion, began to waver, and sent a legate, Christopher, Bishop of Cervia, to Basle with authority to negotiate with the council on the question. By February in the following year, he had come to the conclusion that it was expedient to yield still further; a bull appeared, explaining the reasons why the Pope had hitherto objected to Basle, and the considerations which now induced him to withdraw his opposition and send legates to the council. This he did; but his legates, who were to agree to the discussion only of certain subjects prescribed by the Pope, were ill received at the council. Several other decrees and bulls were issued on one side and on the other in this controversy; at last, in February 1434, a letter from the Pope was read at the council, with the terms of which they declared themselves satisfied, and they admitted the papal legates.[1] But before long a breach occurred, which proved to be irreparable. At its twenty-first session (June 1435) the council adopted a decree for the reform of the Roman Chancery—abolishing first-fruits, cutting down fees, and regulating official charges and perquisites. The Pope might well complain that a measure so important had been adopted without previous consultation with him. He refused his sanction, and the council launched an angry decree against him. Meantime the Eastern emperor, John Palæologus, had been in negotiation both with the Pope and the council on the subject of the proposed reunion of East and West; one consequence of which, the Emperor fondly hoped, would be the effective armed intervention of Western Europe to roll back the tide of Ottoman invasion. A synod can seldom hold its own with a single ruler in such transactions; moreover, the envoys of the council were empowered to propose to the Emperor and the Greeks no place of meeting more acceptable than Avignon, to which Ferrara, offered by the Pope, would appear to them infinitely preferable. A division hereupon sprang up in the council itself, the minority—among whom was the excellent and able Nicholas of Cusa, a theologian from Coblentz—voting for the removal of the council to Italy, while the majority were in favour of Avignon. In October 1437, Eugenius published a bull in which he formally transferred the council from Basle to Ferrara; and although, at the first session held in the last-named city, in January 1438, the number in attendance was scanty, the Papal influence gradually asserted its ascendency, and defections from the council at Basle began to be of frequent occurrence. In his famous work, written some years before, "Concordantia Catholica," Nicholas of Cusa had said, "Where there is no true œcumenical council, the most certain synod is that in which the Pope is found;" and agreeably to this maxim, Nicholas himself now abandoned the cause of the council, and repaired to Ferrara. From the time of the publication of the bull of October 1437, the acts of the Council of Basle are considered as of no authority. Before that date, in the years between 1431 and 1436, their most meritorious and successful work was the pacification of the Hussites, whom they succeeded to a great extent in reconciling to the Church, by conceding the demand of the more moderate party—the Utraquists—for communion under both species.

The recalcitrants at Basle, headed now by the Cardinal of Arles, exasperated by the desertions from their ranks and the growing influence of the Council of Ferrara, proceeded to extreme measures. They erected into a universal axiom that theory of the subjection of Popes to General Councils which, as enunciated by the Council of Constance, had been a particular proposition, referring only to one Pope and a special complex of circumstances. Next (May 1439), they pretended to depose Eugenius, in whose stead they chose Amadeus of Savoy. This anti-pope took the title of Felix V. But he was feebly supported, and after playing his miserable part for five years, abdicated in April 1445. At the same time, the Council of Basle, which, after lingering on for several years in almost entire obscurity, had transferred its sittings to Lausanne, gave a last sign of life by recognising the pontificate of Nicholas V. Nothing more is heard of them afterwards.

BEARD, CLERICAL. In the earliest times the shaving of the hair on the face was considered effeminate (Clem. Al. "Pædagog." iii. 11), and the beard was worn by clergy and laity alike. Early, however, in the middle ages, ecclesiastics in the West shaved off the beard (Bede, "H.E." iv. 14), and this custom furnished Photius, in 867, with the ground for one of the reproaches which he made against the Latins. Pope Gregory VII. required the Archbishop of Cagliari and his clergy to shave, and from the twelfth century onwards, all through the middle ages, synods were constantly enforcing the rule, "Clerici barbam ne nutriant." In the middle of the sixteenth century the clerical beard again came into fashion, and the beard is seen on the portraits of the Popes from Paul III. to Innocent XII. Synods now simply required that the beard should not be too long. At the end of the seventeenth century fashion changed again, under French influence, and when some of the Bavarian priests began to wear the beard, Pius IX., in a brief dated 1863, commissioned the Nuncio at Munich to see that the bishops put a stop to the innovation. This rule, of course, does not apply to an order like that of the Capuchins, with whom the beard is no novelty. (Talhofer, in the new edition of the "Kirchenlexikon.")

BEATIFIC VISION. The sight of God face to face, which constitutes the essential bliss of angels and men. The Council of Florence defines that the "souls of those who after receiving baptism have incurred no stain of sin whatsoever, or who after incurring such stain have been purified, in the body or out of the body, ... are at once received into heaven and clearly see God Himself as He is, in three Persons and one substance, some, however, more perfectly than others, according to the diversity of their merits." [1]

Many passages of Scripture speak of this vision as the reward of the just. "When He shall appear," St. John says, "we shall be like to Him, because we shall see Him as He is." Similarly, St. Paul contrasts the seeing through a glass in an obscure manner with that vision "face to face" which is reserved for the life to come.[1] Petavius adduces a multitude of patristic testimonies on this point, and explains passages from other Fathers who seem to affirm the absolute impossibility of seeing God as He is. At the same time, he confesses frankly that some ancient Catholic writers spoke ambiguously and others erroneously with regard to the vision of God. They had a difficulty in supposing it possible even for the blessed to behold the divine essence.

It is with the eyes of the soul, not with the bodily eyes, that God is seen. This follows from the very fact that God is incorporeal. Nor can any created intellect in its own strength or by the force of its nature enjoy the beatific vision, for there is no proportion between the divine nature and any created intelligence. In order that the blessed may see Him, God infuses a supernatural quality which elevates and perfects the intellect and makes it capable of the beatific vision. Just as the natural eye, in order that it may see, requires first the presence of the object, and then light, in order that the image of the object may be received, so the intellect, in order to see God, requires not only the proximity of the divine essence, but also an interior disposition by which it is elevated to an act above its natural powers.[2] The schoolmen fitly call this quality in the intellect of the blessed the "light of glory," a term which occurs in the Fathers—e.g. in St. Augustine, though not in the same definite sense. The Council of Vienne adopted the expression in its condemnation of the error "that the soul does not need the light of glory, which elevates the soul so that it beholds God and enjoys Him in bliss." The word "light" is of course a mere metaphor, for the light of glory is immaterial. Nor is it anything outside the intellect, or again an object which the intellect perceives. It is in the intellect and enables it to see God.

By the ordinary law of God, this vision is not given in the flesh, since no man can see God's face and live, although great authorities maintain that it has been bestowed in exceptional cases even during this life. St. Thomas, for instance, maintains that Moses and St. Paul enjoyed the beatific vision before their death, though the gift was not a permanent one. On the other hand, it was a question long discussed in the Church, whether the saints saw God face to face before the day of judgment. The Council of Florence, quoted above, closed the controversy, and this definition is the true development of patristic teaching. From the first it was held that martyrdom, as the perfect purgation of the soul, admits to the immediate possession of glory, a tenet which logically involves the belief that heaven since Christ's ascension has been opened to all who are fitted by perfect purity for the vision of God. St. Gregory[1] places the difference between the saints of the Old and New Testaments in this very point, that whereas the former had to wait for the vision of God till Christ's descent into limbo, the latter, when "their earthly house of this habitation is dissolved," have a "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." The words of the council, with which we began, explain what it is that the beatific vision implies. The saints and angels see God—i.e. His essence, His attributes, and the three Persons of the Trinity. Further, seeing God, they see creatures in Him, who is the supreme cause, in whom all things live and move and exist. The saints do not, indeed, know all that God can do, because even to the blessed He remains in a certain sense incomprehensible, and it is one thing to see an object before us, quite another to know that object in the utmost extent to which it can be known. Such perfect comprehension of the divine nature belongs to God Himself, and cannot be communicated to any creature. But the saints see in God all the facts concerning creatures which it is suitable for them to know. They have, for example, a special knowledge of those who are placed under their patronage; they are aware when souls on earth implore their prayers; they are acquainted with the best means of helping their clients. The most plausible objection which is made to the invocation of the saints falls to the ground if this point, which St. Augustine sets forth with great fulness, is well understood. We ask the saints to pray for us, not because we believe them omniscient or omnipresent, but because, seeing God, they see in Him all that He wishes them to see.

[2] St. Thom. i. 12, 5.

Lastly, though all the blessed see God, they do so with different degrees of perfection. The vision of God is the reward of merit, and as God repays every man according to his works, as the crown promised in heaven is a crown of justice, therefore the vision of God cannot be given in precisely the same manner to all. This truth was denied by Jovinian in ancient, by Luther in modern, times, and the anathema of the Council of Trent—sess. vi. cap. 16, can. 32—is directed against the latter. (See Petavius, "De Deo," lib. vii.)

BEATIFICATION. [See CANONISATION.]

BEATITUDE, or bliss, is defined by St. Thomas as that perfect good which completely appeases and satisfies the appetite.[1] God alone can constitute man's perfect bliss, for man's will seeks the fulness of all good, and this cannot be found except in God. Had man been left without grace, then he would have found his natural beatitude in knowing God most perfectly as the author of nature, and in adhering to Him by natural love, sweetly and constantly.[2] He would have attained this happiness, after passing successfully through his probation in this mortal life. As it is, man has been raised to a supernatural state, and his bliss consists in God, seen face to face in the heavenly country. [See BEATIFIC VISION.]

So far all the Catholic theologians are at one. All admit that God is man's last end and that he attains this end through the beatific vision. But if we question theologians more closely and wish to know the precise manner in which the blessed reach perfect happiness, various answers are given, of which three may be repeated here. The Thomists, following apparently the clear teaching of their master,[3] place the essential happiness of the blessed (beatitudo formalis) in the act of the intellect by which the saints see God as He is. They argue that while the will is an appetite which tends to its object and rests in it, it is by the intellect that an immaterial object actually becomes present to the soul. Thus while the will of the blessed rests in God, it is the intellect which actually apprehends, acquires and possesses Him. The delight which the will takes in good attained does not constitute the possession of this good, but presupposes it. The Thomists allege further that the intellect is the noblest of the faculties, and that the bliss of man must consist in the exercise of this power.[4]

[3] See 1ª 2æ 4, 2.
[4] Billuart, De Ultimo Fine, Diss. ii. 2.

Here, we may add, they make a legitimate application of Aristotle's principles. "That which is proper to each by nature," says this philosopher,[1] "is best and sweetest for each; sweetest, then, for man is the intellectual life (ὁ κατὰ τὸν νοῦν βίος), since this [i.e. reason] chiefly constitutes man. Such a life, therefore, is most happy." St. Basil, St. Cyril of Alexandria, and St. Augustine (consciously or unconsciously) made a similar application of the Aristotelian principle.[2]

The second opinion is that of Scotus, which places beatitude in the act of the will by which it loves God with the love of friendship; a third, that of several Jesuit theologians, who make it consist in the exercise of intellect and will combined. It is scarcely necessary to say that the Thomists only place the essence or spring of beatitude in the vision of God by the intellect. Hence flow the full satisfaction of the will, the happy necessity of loving God, the knowledge which the saints have that their happiness is eternal. After the resurrection this bliss will overflow into the body, bestowing upon it the four gifts of impassibility, subtlety (by which it will be able to penetrate other bodies, as the risen Christ penetrated the closed doors), agility (which will make it capable of the swiftest motion), clarity (through which it will become luminous or transparent).

BEATITUDES, THE EIGHT. The blessings pronounced by our Lord at the beginning of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v. 3–10). In the so-called Sermon on the Plain (Luke vi. 20–22) only four are enumerated. Various reasons are given by the Fathers for this difference (see St. Thomas, 1ª 2ᵃᵉ qu. lxix. a. 3).

BÉGUINES and BEGHARDS. The Béguines of Flanders are an interesting and ancient foundation. An attempt, indeed, was made in the seventeenth century to trace their origin to St. Begga, the mother of Pepin of Herstal, who flourished about A.D. 700; but in the judgment of Hefele[3] the attempt failed. That they can be traced back to the twelfth century, and are consequently older than either the Franciscans or Dominicans, is unquestionable. The scandals caused by the conduct of a dissolute Bishop of Liège, about 1180, aroused the zeal of a holy priest of the diocese, Lambert le Bègue, who spent his fortune in founding an institution at Liège for widows and single women desirous to consecrate their lives to God, and opened it in 1184. The associates called themselves Béghines, corrupted to Béguines, after their founder, and the name of Béguinage was given to the abode, or rather group of abodes, in which they lived. For the Béguinage, resembling in this respect the ancient laura, is not a convent, but a collection of small houses (each inhabited by one or two Béguines, who do their own housekeeping), surrounded by a wall, and with a chapel in the centre. The Béguines do not take perpetual vows, nor do they renounce private property; they can leave the association whenever they desire it, and reclaim the capital which they may have contributed to it. But each Béguine on admission to the habit makes a vow, in the presence of the curé who has the spiritual charge of the community, of obedience and chastity so long as she remains in the Béguinage. They employ themselves, according to the strength or capacity of the several members, in educational work (including large Sunday-schools for girls) and corporal works of mercy of various kinds, besides taking part in the divine office. Some of their communities in the fourteenth century fell into the error of the Fraticelli, or brethren of the free spirit, and incurred condemnation on that account from the Council of Vienne (1311). At the present day, they are still flourishing in Belgium, their original seat: there are Béguinages at Ghent, Bruges, Antwerp, Mechlin, and other places. In the great Béguinage at Ghent there were in 1857 six hundred professed Béguines, and two hundred locataires—that is, ladies living within the enclosure, paying a certain pension, and to some extent participating in the religious life of the sisters. There are Béguinages in Germany, and one was lately founded at Castelnaudary, in the south of France, by a zealous priest of Carcassonne, M. Soubiran-la-Louvière, which promised to be eminently successful and useful.

The Beghards had no special founder, but were associations of laymen living together in imitation of the Béguines. They first appear in the early part of the thirteenth century. Heresy and antinomianism made great ravages in their ranks in the following age, and the severities of which they were consequently the object caused the greater number to pass into the third orders of the Mendicant fraternities. They were finally suppressed by Innocent X. in 1650.

BELLS. Nothing certain is known as to the date of their introduction, which has been attributed sometimes to St. Paulinus of Nola, sometimes to Pope Sabinian. During the heathen persecution it was of course impossible to call the faithful by any signal which would have attracted public notice. After Constantine's time, monastic communities used to signify the hour of prayer by blowing a trumpet, or by rapping with a hammer at the cells of the monks. Walafrid Strabo, in his celebrated book on the divine offices, written about the middle of the ninth century, speaks of the use of bells as not very ancient in his time, and as having been introduced from Italy. However, we learn from the history of St. Lupus of Sens that church-bells were known in France more than two centuries before Strabo's time.[1] For long the Eastern Church employed instead of bells clappers, such as we still use on Good Friday, and bells were not known among the Orientals till the ninth century.[2] Even then their use cannot have become universal among them, for Fleury mentions the ringing of church-bells as one of the customs which the Maronites adopted from the Latins on their reunion with the Catholic Church in 1183.[3] The classical words for bell are, κώδων and tintinnabulum. From the seventh century onwards, we find the names campana (from the Campanian metal of which they were often made), nola (from the town where their use is said to have been introduced), and cloccæ[4] (French cloche). Originally church bells were comparatively small. Large ones of cast metal first appear in the eleventh and twelfth centuries; those of the greatest size in the fifteenth. In the tenth century the custom began of giving bells names.[5]

Before the Church sets aside bells for sacred she blesses them with solemn ceremonies. The form prescribed in the Pontifical is headed "the blessing of a bell," though it is popularly called "the baptism of a bell," a title by which the office is mentioned as early as the eleventh century.[6] The bishop washes the bell with blessed water, signs it with the oil of the sick outside, and with chrism inside, and lastly places under it the thurible with burning incense. He prays repeatedly that the sound of the bell may avail to summon the faithful, to excite their devotion, to drive away storms, and to terrify evil spirits. This power of course is due to the blessings and prayers of the Church, not to any efficacy superstitiously attributed to the bell itself. Thus consecrated, bells become spiritual things, and cannot be rung without the consent of the ecclesiastical authorities.

Hitherto, we have been treating of the large church-bell. Small bells are also used during Mass, and are rung by the server at the Sanctus and at the Elevation. The object of this rite is to excite the attention and devotion of the faithful. The practice of ringing the bell at the Elevation was introduced after the custom of elevating the Host [see ELEVATION] had become common in the Church. The Elevation-bell is mentioned by William of Paris. In England it is the custom to ring the bell also as the priest spreads his hands over the Host and chalice before the consecration, and at the Domine, non sum dignus, before the priest's communion. This bell is not rung when Mass is said before the Blessed Sacrament exposed, nor again in the private chapel of the Apostolic Palace if the Pope says or hears Mass.[1]

BENEDICAMUS DOMINO, i.e. "Let us bless the Lord," a form used in the breviary at the end of each hour except matins, and at the end of Mass instead of Ite, Missa est on days when the Gloria in excelsis is not said. Various reasons are given for the use of Benedicamus Domino for the usual Ite, Missa est. Cardinal Bona thinks that the Ite, Missa est was omitted first of all during penitential seasons, such as Advent and Lent, because then the people did not immediately leave the church, but waited for the recitation of the hours, and that gradually the Benedicamus Domino came to be used in ferial Masses generally. In Masses for the dead, Requiescant in pace took the place of the Ite, Missa est, perhaps because the people often had to remain for the funeral rites. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss." 11, 24.)

BENEDICTINES. The patriarch of monks in the West, St. Benedict, having first established his order at Subiaco, removed it to Monte Cassino, on which Apollo was in those days still worshipped, in 529. The rule which he compiled for his monks was regarded as fraught with singular wisdom, and dictated by a marvellous insight into human nature, neither prescribing to all an asceticism only possible to a few, nor erring on the side of laxity. It regulated with great minuteness the mode of celebrating the divine office at the canonical hours; and, eschewing all idleness, ordered that the monks, when not employed in the divine praises, or in taking necessary food and rest, should engage themselves in useful works, either manual labour, or study, or copying books, or teaching. Every monastery was to have a library, and every monk was to possess a pen and tablets. The clothing, of which the prevailing colour was black, was to vary in material and warmth at the discretion of the abbots, according to the exigencies of different climates and circumstances. The abstinence from meat enjoined by the rule (except in the case of the sick) is perpetual; but there is some doubt whether the prohibition was meant to extend to poultry and winged game, as well as the flesh of four-footed animals. A singular clause in the rule, and one which was fruitful in results, was that which ordered that all persons whatever, without distinction of age, rank, or calling, should be admissible to the order of St. Benedict. If parents offered a son to the service of God in a monastery, even if he were but a boy of five years old, the monks were to receive and take full charge of him. Thus our own Beda was given over when only seven years old to the monks at Wearmouth and Jarrow, and the good Orderic, the historian of Normandy, was committed by his father in his tenth year to the kind hands of the monks of St. Evroult, and saw his native land no more. Out of this practice of offering young boys to the monasteries a great system of monastic schools naturally arose.

St. Maur, a disciple of St. Benedict, founded the first Benedictine monastery in France, in his master's lifetime, at Glanfeuil, near Angers. In Spain they were introduced about 633. We in England have special cause to be grateful to the Benedictine order, for it was by it that Christianity was first taught to our Saxon forefathers. The monastery on Monte Cassino was destroyed by the Lombards towards the end of the sixth century, but the monks took refuge at Rome, where Pope Gregory gave them St. Andrew's Church. The Benedictine abbot of St. Andrew's was the person chosen by the Pope to head the mission which he sent to the Court of Ethelbert, and he will be remembered through all time as St. Augustin, the Apostle of England. Benedictine monks from England—St. Willibrord (699) and St. Boniface (750)—introduced Christianity in the Low Countries and the Rhineland. Volumes might be written on the manifold services which the German Benedictines, going forth from the tomb of St. Boniface at Fulda, and settling themselves down as welcome guests at numberless points in the forests which then covered the Teutonic land, rendered to their half-savage countrymen, accustoming them by degrees to the restraints of religion and law, and training and cultivating both the land and the people. But all human institutions are liable to change, and even this famous order, chiefly through the intrusion of ambitious laymen into the office of abbot, witnessed before the end of the eighth century a great decline of monastic virtue. St. Benedict of Anian then appeared as a reformer and restorer. So, when the fierce Danish and Norman barbarians in the ninth and tenth centuries had destroyed many monasteries in France and England, and murdered great numbers of monks, while those who were spared lived with little regularity, the reformation of Cluny by St. Peter the Venerable, and that carried on by our own St. Dunstan in England, caused the old life, in its lovely peace and fruitfulness, to flourish again. It is said that, a calculation being made in the first half of the fourteenth century, it was found that up to that time twenty-four Popes, two hundred cardinals, seven thousand archbishops, fifteen thousand bishops, and a still greater number of saints, had been given to the Church by the Benedictine order.

In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries many relaxations and corruptions crept into the Benedictine monasteries in various parts of Europe. In France the reaction against these led to the foundation of the reformed congregation of St. Vanne, in which the rigid observance of the rule was revived (1550); and out of this proceeded the yet more celebrated congregation of St. Maur (1618), to which a great number of French monasteries adhered. This congregation, by its colossal patristic and historical labours, directed by such men as Mabillon, Martène, Ruinart, Rivet, and D'Achéry, rendered incalculable services to the learned world. Two such works as the "France Littéraire" and the "Recueil des Historiens," if they had accomplished nothing else, would entitle the congregation to the gratitude of all men of letters. At the Revolution the order was entirely suppressed in France. In the present century it has again taken root, and begun to bear fruit of the old kind; witness the new foundation at Solesmes, the residence of the pious and gifted Dom Guéranger; the community at Pierre-qui-Vire (founded by the Père Muard, who died in 1854); and the Benedictine nunneries of Pradines and Flavigny. In Spain and Germany also the order was suppressed during the revolutionary troubles; in the former country it has not yet been re-introduced; in Germany it has reappeared at Munich.

In England, at the dissolution, there were one hundred and eighty-six Benedictine abbeys, priories, and nunneries, the revenues of which appear in the "Valor Ecclesiasticus," and about a hundred other cells and priories of less importance, besides those previously suppressed by Wolsey (twenty-nine, of which the majority were Benedictine) and the "alien" priories—that is, those which were cells of foreign abbeys. All these were suppressed, with what ruinous results to education, art, and learning, all the world knows. Dom Feckenham, the last abbot of Westminster, made a noble speech in the House of Lords against the change of religion in the first year of Elizabeth; it may be read in the Somers Tracts. Feckenham was thrown into prison and kept there for the rest of his life. One of his monks, Dom Sigebert Buckley, after forty years' imprisonment, died at a great age in 1610; before dying he gave the habit to two English Benedictines who had been professed abroad, and was thus the link between the monks of old and those of modern times. For several generations the English Benedictines were obliged on account of persecution to have their houses abroad, whence they sent men to the English mission. Mr. Law's "Calendar of English Martyrs" (1876) contains the names of nine or ten Benedictine missioners hanged, drawn, and quartered between 1558 and 1681. The old titles, abbot of Westminster, Glastonbury, &c., are still kept up. At the present time the Benedictines have ten or eleven houses in England, the chief of which are Downside, Belmont, and Ampleforth. The English college at Douai is also an English Benedictine monastery. By recent Apostolic Letters (October 31, 1890) the Benedictine missions are placed under three abbeys, Downside, Ampleforth, and Douai, and various changes are made in the constitutions. The abbey at Fort Augustus (in Scotland) is an offshoot from the English province. There is a monastery at Ramsgate belonging to the Cassinese branch of the order. An English colony, Western Australia, furnishes a noble example of the old civilising and colonising energy of the order. Two Spanish Benedictines, Dom Serrano and Dom Serra, driven by the Revolution from their own country, emigrated with Bishop Brady to Perth; about five-and-forty years ago they formed a settlement on the Moore river, sixty miles to the north of Perth; where they gathered the natives round them, learned their language, instructed them in the truths of salvation, and taught them how to till the ground and to practise many useful arts. They have changed hundreds of these wild blacks from barbarous nomads into civilised, God-fearing, home-loving men. The name of their colony is New Nursia. By a special Papal indult, the head of their abbey is an abbot-bishop, like St. Columba and his successors at Iona.

BENEDICTION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT. A rite which has now become very common in the Catholic Church. The priest takes the Host from the tabernacle, places it in the monstrance, and then puts the monstrance containing the Host on a throne above the tabernacle. The priest then incenses the Blessed Sacrament, while the choir (at least in England) usually sing the "O Salutaris Hostia."

Next the Te Deum, the Litany of the Blessed Virgin, or some other canticle or antiphon, is sung, followed by the "Tantum Ergo," during which the Blessed Sacrament is again incensed, and the prayer "Deus, qui nobis," &c., is recited. Finally, the priest, mantled with the veil, makes the sign of the cross with the monstrance over the people. The Congregation of Rites orders this Benediction to be given in silence; probably to show that it is not the earthly, but the Eternal Priest who in this rite blesses and sanctifies His people. If a bishop gives Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, he makes the sign of the cross over the people three times.

The rite is comparatively modern. Processions and expositions of the Blessed Sacrament date from the early part of the fourteenth century, but at first, apparently, the Host was replaced in the tabernacle, without any benediction being given to the people. "The custom" [of benediction], says the learned Thiers, in a treatise on the exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, published in 1673, "appears to me somewhat novel (assez nouvelle) for I have found no Ritual or Ceremonial older than about a hundred years which mentions it." The same author tells us, that the custom of singing the "O Salutaris Hostia"[1] at the Elevation in the Mass was introduced by Louis XII. of France, a little before his death, in 1515, at a time when he was harassed by various enemies. Thiers also mentions that the Carthusians still maintained the custom of replacing the Host, after exposition, without giving benediction.[2]

BENEDICTIONALE. A collection of forms of blessing, compiled for the convenience of priests, from the Roman Ritual, Pontifical, Missal, &c. Such books may be lawfully published with the approbation of the ordinary, but they possess no authority in themselves. "Those books only are to be employed, and those Benedictions only to be given which conform to the Roman Ritual." (Decree of S. Congreg. of Rites, April 7, 1882.)

BENEFICE. An ecclesiastical benefice is a perpetual right, established by the Church in favour of an ecclesiastical person, of receiving the profits of Church property, on account of the discharge, by such person, of a spiritual office.

The term had its origin in a special use of the Latin word beneficium which arose in the dark ages, and was connected with the difference between allodial and feudal property. The allodial estate of a Teuton was his absolute, hereditary, freehold property, which royal favour had not given, and royal rapacity seldom dared to deprive him of. But a king could reward a faithful follower by the grant, usually for life, of lands belonging to the crown; and estates so granted were called beneficia, as being pure emanations of the king's grace and favour, though it is true that military service was always an implied condition of the tenure. As the landed possessions of the Church increased, usurpations of them by unscrupulous laymen became frequent. The clergy found that, practically, they had no other defence against this species of rapine but by granting portions of Church property to lay lords, on condition of military service against those who might disturb them in the quiet possession of the rest. The tenure being much the same, Church lands thus came to be called beneficia; and this name was gradually transferred to the beneficial enjoyment of all Church property, after the lands above described had been, with the advent of more peaceful times, restored to ecclesiastical hands.

According to the canonists, six things are required in a benefice. First, that it should be established by episcopal authority. Secondly, that it should have some spiritual work annexed to it—thus the function of an organist, or a verger, being merely temporal, is incompatible with the possession of a benefice. Thirdly, that it should be conferred by an ecclesiastical person. (Lay patrons are not properly said to confer, but to present to, a benefice.) Fourthly, that it should be conferred on a clerk who has at least received the tonsure. Fifthly, that it should be for life. Sixthly, that whoever has the right of conferring it should not keep it for himself, but give it to another. Ferraris, Beneficium.

BENEFIT OF CLERGY. By this was originally meant the privilege enjoyed by persons in holy orders of claiming, if charged with any felony (unless it were high treason, or arson), to be tried in the bishop's instead of the king's court. The ancient usage was, says Blackstone, "for the bishop, or ordinary, to demand his clerks to be remitted out of the king's courts as soon as they were indicted." Henry II. endeavoured to do away with the exemption, and to subject clerks charged with felony to the jurisdiction of his own court; but the reaction in popular feeling which followed the murder of St. Thomas à Becket prevented the realisation of his intention. After much conflict between the secular and ecclesiastical courts, it was settled, in the time of Henry VI., that a clerk charged with felony should first be arraigned in the king's court, after which he might either plead his benefit of clergy at once, declining the jurisdiction, or, after conviction, by way of arresting judgment. Originally, only persons who had the clerical dress and tonsure were entitled to the privilege; but a laxer test was gradually accepted, until it came to be a settled thing that every prisoner who could read should be allowed the benefit of clergy, even though neither ordained nor tonsured. It was found that too many laymen were thus let in, and by a statute of 1487 it was enacted that a layman might not claim the privilege more than once, and, when allowed it, he was to be burnt with a hot iron "on the brawn of the left thumb" —an effectual, if barbarous, mode of identification—so that he should not illegally claim it a second time.

[1] Traité de l'exposition du Saint Sacrement de l'autel. iii. ch. 5.
[2] Ibid. iii. 7.

After benefit of clergy had been claimed and allowed, the culprit was remitted to the bishop's court, and there tried. An elaborate procedure was followed, of which the ordinary result is said to have been an acquittal. If, however, the temporal courts surrendered the accused to the ordinary absque purgatione facienda, he had to be imprisoned for life.

The later history of benefit of clergy turns upon a statute of 1576. The government of Elizabeth were resolved to take away all criminal jurisdiction from the bishops, but the principle of immunity to the educated classes as compared with the uneducated was inwoven by so long a usage into judicial practice, and was so convenient for the former, that it is easy to understand why it should not readily be relinquished. By the statute above mentioned, it was forbidden to surrender any prisoner to the ordinary; but when benefit of clergy had been allowed, and burning inflicted in the usual way, the prisoner was to undergo no further punishment—except that the judge might, at his discretion, order him to be kept in gaol for any period within a year. Acts were afterwards passed, allowing Peers, even though they could not read, to claim benefit of clergy, and extending the statute to female defendants, on their being burnt and imprisoned for less than a year. But "those men who could not read, if under the degree of peerage, were hanged." It should be understood that not all felonies were within benefit of clergy. High treason and arson, as already mentioned, were always excluded from it; and other crimes, such as murder, burglary, unnatural crime, &c., were expressly withdrawn from it by different statutes.

As more and more criminals were found able to read, the state of the law was thought to tend too much to laxity. Acts of 1718 and 1720 provided that any person convicted who was entitled to benefit of clergy, with consequent burning and short imprisonment, might be, in substitution for such burning, &c., sentenced to transportation to America for seven years. Benefit of clergy was finally abolished in 1827. (Blackstone's "Commentaries," book iv.)

BERENGARIUS. A writer of the eleventh century, celebrated for having anticipated the Sacramentarians of a later age in assailing the mystery of the Eucharist. He was born, probably at Tours, about A.D. 1000, and was about forty years of age when he was made Archdeacon of Angers. At this period of his life he gave vent to the crude and novel theory on the sacrament of the altar which an inquisitive intellect, joined to a vain and unstable character, suggested to him. His former friends, Adelmann of Liège, and Hugh, bishop of Langres, wrote to him letters of earnest remonstrance; but being at this time supported by the king of France, Bruno, bishop of Angers, and other persons of influence, he disregarded their admonitions. The French king, Henry I., seeing that a line of German Popes was apparently firmly fixed in the chair of Peter, and apprehensive lest the Papal influence should be used to further imperial designs against France, is said [1] to have meditated the formation of a Gallican schism, and in pursuance of this design to have encouraged Berengarius to resist the authority of Rome. The treatise in which he set forth his peculiar teaching has been lately discovered and printed. In the judgment even of those who would be most inclined to take a favourable view,[2] it is described as "hard, harsh, and obscure." It is certain that he denied any real or objective change, any transubstantiation of the bread and wine; with Erigena he held that the presence of the body of Christ in the Sacrament was only real in so far as it was spiritually conceived, and rejected the opposite tenet of Paschasius Radbert. A letter of his to Lanfranc, then Prior of Bec, referring to these views, found its way to Rome; the matter was immediately taken up, and in a council held at Rome in 1050, the ancient faith of the Church was emphatically reasserted, and the tenets of Berengarius and Erigena condemned. Again, in the Synod of Vercelli (Sept. 1050), and shortly afterwards at Paris, Berengarius was condemned. For some time, so long as he was able to avoid attendance at any of these synods, he treated their decisions with contempt. But the King of France, who had now learned to form a truer estimate of the great character and apostolic aims of Leo IX., withdrew his support of Berengarius, who was consequently compelled to appear at a synod held at Tours in 1054, over which the legate Hildebrand (afterwards Gregory VII.) presided. Berengarius made and signed the recantation required of him, but not long afterwards he reasserted the condemned error. This happened several times over, Berengarius subscribing whatever orthodox formulary might be set before him, and then, in some fresh publication, giving an inadmissible turn to the subscription which he had made. The last of his retractations —from which he does not seem to have subsequently receded—was pronounced at the Council of Bordeaux, in 1080. Malmesbury [1] declares that he changed his views before his death (in 1088), and lamented that he could not effect the like change in all who had espoused his opinions. The same writer—the passage has been often quoted—professes to give us his dying words. It should be mentioned that he died on the feast of the Epiphany. "To-day, being the day of his manifestation, my Lord Jesus Christ will appear to me, either, as I hope, to raise me to glory for my repentance, or, as I fear, to punish me for the heresy which I have been instrumental in spreading."

It should be added that William of Malmesbury quotes a long passage from a Latin poem by Hildebert, bishop of Le Mans, a former pupil of Berengarius, in which he warmly eulogises the temperance, charity, and self-denial of his departed master, and that Malmesbury himself writes of him in the same strain, though, whether he is merely echoing the encomiums of Hildebert, or speaking from some independent source of information, there are no means of ascertaining.

BERRETTA. A square cap with three or sometimes four prominences or projecting corners rising from its crown. There is usually a tassel in the middle where the corners meet. It is worn by a priest as he approaches the altar to say Mass, by ecclesiastics in choir, &c. The berretta worn by the Pope is white; that of a cardinal is red. Leo XIII. granted to bishops the privilege of wearing a purple berretta (Feb. 3rd, 1888). All other clerics wear a black one. A four-cornered berretta belongs to Doctors of Divinity,[1] though Benedict XIV. mentions that in his time Spanish ecclesiastics generally wore a berretta of this kind.

The word is derived from birrus, a mantle with a hood, and that again from πυρρός, flame-coloured. "At Rome," says Benedict XIV., "and in most churches, the berretta was unknown as late as the ninth century. Its ecclesiastical use began when priests gave up the ancient custom of covering their heads with the amice till the actual beginning of the Mass." (Benedict XIV. "De Miss." i. 9.)

BETHLEHEMITES. 1. Matthew Paris speaks of some "fratres Bethleemitæ" to whom a house was granted at Cambridge, on the way leading to Trumpington, in 1257; their habit, he says, was like that of the Friars Preachers, with the addition of a red and blue star on the breast. Of this foundation nothing further is known.

2. An order bearing the same name was founded by a noble Spanish gentleman of Teneriffe, Peter of Bétencourt, at Guatemala, in Central America, about the year 1600. He founded a hospital, convent, and school under the patronage of Our Lady of Bethlehem, with an order of monks to attend the sick and teach in the school. The Bethlehemites were rapidly propagated through every part of Spanish America. In 1687 Innocent XI. placed them under the rule of St. Augustine. They are said to possess some forty houses even now, the chief establishment being at Guatemala.

BIBLE (from βιβλίον, a letter or paper, and that from βίβλος, the inner bark of papyrus). A name given to the sacred books of the Jews and the Christians. In itself "Bible" might mean a book of whatever kind, just as its synonym "Scriptures" (γραφαί) means originally writings of any sort. Gradually the Jews who spoke Greek employed the word "Bible" as a convenient name for their sacred books. Thus the Greek translator of Ecclesiasticus, writing soon after 132 A.C., mentions the law and the prophets and the rest of the Bible (τὰ λοιπὰ τῶν βιβλίων); and a similar instance might be quoted from first Machabees.[1] Our Lord and His disciples received the Jewish collection of the sacred books with the same reverence as the Jews themselves, and gave it the title usual at the time—viz. "the Scriptures." But after an interval there came a change. The Apostles and their disciples wrote books professing sacred authority. These writings appeared in the latter half of the first century, and were quoted within the Church with the same formulas—"it is written," &c.—which had been used before to introduce citations from the law and the prophets. These books of Christian authorship were called, first of all, "the books" or "scriptures of the new covenant," and from the beginning of the third century, the shorter expression "new covenant" came into vogue. In Chrysostom and succeeding writers we find "bible" (βιβλία) as the familiar term for the whole collection contained in either "covenant," or, as we should now say, in the Old and New Testaments.[2]

Under the article CANON OF THE SCRIPTURE the reader will find some account of the way in which and the authority by which the list of sacred books has been made, while the nature of their inspiration is also treated in a separate article. Here we take for granted that the Bible consists of a number of inspired books, contained in the Vulgate translation and enumerated by the Council of Trent; and we proceed to treat of its authority, its interpretation, and of its use among the faithful.

1. The Church holds that the sacred Scripture is the written word of God. The Council of Trent, "following the example of the orthodox Fathers, receives with piety and reverence all the books of the Old and New Testament, since one God is the author of each." These words of the council, which are an almost verbal repetition of many early definitions, separate the Bible utterly from all other books. Of no human composition, however excellent, can it be said that God is its author. And the divine origin of Scripture implies its perfect truth. We know for certain, St. Irenæus argues, that the Scriptures are perfect, since they are spoken by the Word of God and by the Spirit.[1] Some few Catholic theologians have, indeed, maintained that the Scriptures may err in minimis—i.e. in small matters of historical detail which in no way affect faith or morals. Nor in doing so do they contradict any express definition of Pope or council, though such an opinion has never obtained any currency in the Church. But of course the modern Protestant theories which reduce the historical accounts of the Bible to mere myths, or again which, while they allow that the Scripture contains the word of God, deny that it is the written word of God, are in sharp and obvious contradiction to the decrees of the Church.

2. The Church, then, affirms that all Scripture is the word of God, but at the same time it maintains that there is an unwritten word of God over and above Scripture. Just as Catholics are bound to defend the authority of the Bible against the new school of Protestants who have come to treat it as an ordinary book, so they are compelled to withstand that Protestant exaggeration, on the other side, according to which the word of God is contained in Scripture and in Scripture alone. The word of God (so the Council of Trent teaches) is contained both in the Bible and in Apostolical tradition, and it is the duty of a Christian to receive the one and the other with equal veneration and respect. The whole history and the whole structure of the New Testament witness to the truth and reasonableness of the Catholic view. If our Lord had meant His Church to be guided by a book and by a book alone, He would have taken care that Christians should be at once provided with sacred books. As a matter of fact He did nothing of the kind. He refers those who were to embrace His doctrine, not to a book, but to the living voice of His apostles and of His Church. "He who heareth you," He said to the apostles, "heareth me." For twenty years after our Lord's ascension, not a single book of the New Testament was written, and all that time no Christian could appeal, as many Protestants do now, to the Bible and the Bible only, for the simple reason that the New Testament did not exist, and the faithful were evidently called upon to believe many truths for which no strict and cogent proofs could be brought from the pages of the Jewish Scriptures. Further, when the writings of the New Testament were issued, they appeared one by one, in order to meet special exigencies, nor is the least hint given that the Apostles or their disciples provided that their writings should contain the whole sum of Christian truth. St Paul wrote to various churches in order to give them instruction on particular points, and in order to preserve them from moral or doctrinal errors to which they were exposed at the moment. Far from professing to communicate the whole circle of doctrine in a written form, he exhorts his converts in one of his earliest epistles, to "hold the traditions which" they "had learned, whether by word or by" his "epistle;" a few years later he praises the Corinthians for keeping the traditions (παραδόσεις) as he delivered them, and towards the close of his life, he warns St. Timothy to keep the "deposit" of the faith (παραθήκην) without a syllable to imply that this deposit had been committed to writing.[1] So, with regard to the Gospel records, St. John expressly declares that they were from the necessity of the case an incomplete account of Christ's life.[2] The Christians who lived nearest to Apostolic times believed, as the Apostles themselves had done, that Scripture is a source, but by no means the only source, of Christian doctrine. Tertullian constantly appeals to the tradition of the Apostolic Churches, and lays down the principle on which all his arguments against heresy turn—viz. that the Apostles taught both by word and by letter.[3] A little before Tertullian's time, St. Irenæus actually put the imaginary case that the Apostles had left no Scripture at all. In this case, he says, we should still be able to follow the order of tradition, which [the Apostles] handed down to those into whose hands they committed the Churches.[4]

3. There is a controversy no less vital between Catholics and Protestants as to the interpretation of Scripture. A popular Protestant theory makes it the right and the duty of each individual to interpret the Bible for himself and to frame his own religion accordingly; the Catholic, on the contrary, maintains that it belongs to the Church, and to the Church alone, to determine the true sense of the Scripture, and that we cannot interpret contrary to the Church's decision, or to "the unanimous consent of the Fathers," without making shipwreck of the faith. The Catholic is fully justified in believing with perfect confidence that the Church cannot teach any doctrine contrary to the Scripture, for our Lord has promised that the gates of hell will not prevail against His Church. On the other hand, Christ has made no promise of infallibility to those who expound Scripture by the light of private judgment. St. Peter tells us distinctly that some parts of the New Testament are hard to understand. Moreover, the experience of centuries has abundantly confirmed the Catholic and disproved the Protestant rule of interpretation. Unity is the test of truth. If each man received the Holy Ghost, enabling him to ascertain the sense of the Bible, then pious Protestants would be at one as to its meaning and the doctrines which it contains, whereas it is notorious that they have differed from the first on every point of doctrine. The principle of private judgment has been from the time it was first applied a principle of division and of confusion, and has led only to the multiplication of heresies and sects, agreed in nothing except in their common disagreement with the Church. Nor does the authority of the Church in any way interfere with the scientific exposition of Scripture. A Catholic commentator is in no way limited to a servile repetition of the interpretation already given by the Fathers. He is not, indeed, permitted to give to any passage in Scripture a meaning which is at variance with the faith, as attested by the decision of the Church or the unanimous consent of the Fathers. But he may differ as to the meaning of passages in Scripture, even from the greatest of the Fathers; he is not bound to consider that these passages necessarily bear the meaning given them by general councils in the preambles to their decrees; he may even advance interpretations entirely new and unknown before. When for example, God is said to have hardened Pharao's heart, a Catholic commentator cannot infer from this that the book of Exodus makes God the author of sin, but he may, if he sees cause, give an explanation of the words which differs from that of St. Augustin or St. Thomas, or, indeed, from that of all the Fathers and Doctors of the Church taken together.[1]

4. We now come to the use of the Bible, and the Catholic principles on this head follow from what has been already said. It is not necessary for all Christians to read the Bible. Many nations, St Irenæus tells us, were converted and received the faith without being able to read.[2] Without knowledge of letters, without a Bible in their own tongue, they received from the Church teaching which was quite sufficient for the salvation of their souls. Indeed, if the study of the Bible had been an indispensable requisite, a great part of the human race would have been left without the means of grace till the invention of printing. More than this, parts of the Bible are evidently unsuited to the very young or to the ignorant, and hence Clement XI. condemned the proposition that "the reading of Scripture is for all." These principles are fixed and invariable, but the discipline of the Church with regard to the reading of the Bible in the vulgar tongue has varied with varying circumstances. In early times, the Bible was read freely by the lay people, and the Fathers constantly encourage them to do so, although they also insist on the obscurity of the sacred text. No prohibitions were issued against the popular reading of the Bible. New dangers came in during the middle ages. When the heresy of the Albigenses arose there was a danger from corrupt translations, and also from the fact that the heretics tried to make the faithful judge the Church by their own interpretation of the Bible. To meet these evils, the Councils of Toulouse (1229) and Tarragona (1234) forbade the laity to read the vernacular translations of the Bible. Pius IV. required the bishops to refuse lay persons leave to read even Catholic versions of Scripture unless their confessors or parish priests judged that such reading was likely to prove beneficial. During this century, Leo XII., Pius VIII., and Pius IX. have warned Catholics against the Protestant Bible Societies, which distribute versions (mostly corrupt versions) of the Bible with the avowed purpose of perverting simple Catholics. It is only surprising that any rational being could have thought it possible for the Holy See to assume any other attitude towards such proceedings. It is right, however, to observe that the Church displays the greatest anxiety that her children should read the Scriptures, if they possess the necessary dispositions. "You judge exceedingly well," says Pius VI., in his letter to Martini, the author of a translation of the Bible into Italian, "that the faithful should be excited to the reading of holy Scriptures: for these are the most abundant sources, which ought to be left open to everyone, to draw from them purity of morals and of doctrine. This you have seasonably effected . . . . by publishing the sacred Scriptures in the language of your country, ... especially when you show that you have added explanatory notes, which being extracted from the holy Fathers preclude every possible danger of abuse."

BIBLIA PAUPERUM (the Bible of the poor). A representation in between forty and fifty pictures of events in the Old and New Testaments, with short explanations and Scriptural texts appended in Latin or German. The redemption by Christ is the central idea of the collection, so that the Old Testament subjects are chosen for their typical significance. The paintings were often copied from the MSS. and represented in sculpture, or on walls, glass, the antipendia of altars, &c. At Vienna there is an antipendium thus adorned which dates from the twelfth century. The Court library of the same city contains two copies of the "Biblia Pauperum," both of the year 1430. They are block books. Copies printed on movable types soon followed, but owing to the popularity of the book, copies were soon worn out, and are now very rare.

BISHOP. I. Meaning of the Name and Divine Institution of the Office.—The word bishop is derived from the Greek ἐπίσκοπος, which latter occurs in writers of the earliest age in the general sense of "overseer," and was specially applied in later Greek to the officers whom the Athenians sent to subject states. In the [1] Pallavicini, Hist. Concil. Trident. in Möhler's Symbolik, p. 386.

[2] Iren. iii. 4, 2.

LXX[1] ἐπίσκοπος is used for an officer or prefect of any kind. The Christians adopted the word as the title of an ecclesiastical dignitary who has received the highest of the sacred orders and is invested with authority to rule a diocese as its chief pastor.

A bishop, therefore, is superior to simple priests, and the Council of Trent defines that this superiority is of divine institution. "If anyone deny," says the council, "that there is in the Church a hierarchy instituted by divine ordinance, which consists of bishops, presbyters, and ministers, let him be anathema;" and again, "if anyone affirm that bishops are not superior to presbyters, or that they have not the power of confirming and ordaining, or that the power which they have is common to presbyters also, let him be anathema."[2]

The Anglican Church, as is well known, did not, at least formally, cast off belief in the divine institution of episcopacy, and learned Anglican divines, among whom Pearson is the most celebrated, have strenuously vindicated the episcopal authority. With most of the Protestant bodies it has been otherwise. They do not pretend to have bishops, or if they have superintendents whom they call by that name, they attribute to them no authority except such as has been bestowed upon them by the Church. They deny, in other words, that the episcopate is of divine institution, and directly impugn the definitions of Trent on this subject. They admit, of course, that bishops (ἐπίσκοποι) are frequently mentioned in the New Testament, but they urge that in the Acts and the Epistles bishop and presbyter are two names for the same office. They suppose that originally there were three grades in the hierarchy—viz. the Apostles, whose office ended with their life-time, and who left no successors; the bishops or presbyters, corresponding to the ministers or clergymen of the present day; and deacons. They defend their position chiefly on the following grounds:—

We first find the word ἐπίσκοπος in the Acts of the Apostles, xx. 28. "Take heed," St. Paul says, to the clergy of Ephesus, "take heed to yourselves and to the whole flock, in which the Holy Ghost made you bishops." It is plain, however (so it is urged), that these "bishops" were mere presbyters, so that "bishop" and presbyter in New Testament language are synonymous, for St. Luke tells us at the beginning of the same chapter that the Apostle was addressing "the presbyters of the Church" whom he had summoned to Miletus. Towards the close of the Apostle's life the Church was still without bishops in the modern sense, for St. Paul addressed an epistle to the faithful at Philippi "with the bishops and the deacons." Here the plural number and the fact that no allusion is made to presbyters as distinct from the "bishops" are said to prove that in that age ἐπίσκοπος or "bishop" meant presbyter. Later still, St. Paul writes to Titus that he had left him in Crete to "appoint presbyters in every city," and continues—"for the bishop must be irreproachable," &c. Presbyterian writers also allege certain confirmatory evidence from antiquity—some words of St. Jerome (who, however, anxious as he was to exalt the priestly dignity, expressly mentions the power of conferring orders as marking the distinction between bishop and priest), and the supposed tradition of the Alexandrian Church. The reader who is curious on this latter point will find a full discussion of it in Pearson's "Vindiciæ Ignatianæ." But Presbyterian arguments from antiquity need not detain us here. Even on their own showing, Presbyterians can but produce one or two doubtful testimonies, and they have against them a cloud of witnesses dating from the sub-Apostolic age. One additional remark, however, must be made before we end our statement of the Presbyterian case. We have seen that there are plausible reasons for holding that the words presbyter and bishop are synonymous in the New Testament. It is right to add that Clement of Rome, writing towards the end of the first century, does not seem to recognise any distinction in meaning between the two words.[1]

In spite of the objections just stated, the arguments for the divine institution of episcopacy are clear and cogent. We need not deny that the same persons were at first called indifferently bishops and presbyters. It is possible, as some ancient writers suppose, that at Philippi and other places, a number of persons received episcopal consecration; that they were occupied for a time in administering the sacraments and preaching at the place of their consecration, and ready, as convenience required, to be removed to such other Churches as the Apostles should empower them to govern with proper episcopal jurisdiction. Or again, we may suppose, with other great authorities, that the Apostles did not at once provide the newly-founded Churches with bishops, but left them for a season under clergy of the second order, who at that time were called indifferently "bishops" and presbyters.[1] Whatever theory we adopt as to the early use of the word "bishop," it is certain that there are clear traces of the episcopal office, as we now understand it, within the lifetime of the Apostles, and with the sanction of their authority.

For, first, St. James the Less was beyond reasonable doubt bishop of Jerusalem. Thus, in the year 44, when St. Peter was released from prison he desired information to be given to James and the brethren. At the Apostolic Council James delivers judgment ("wherefore I judge"). St. Paul in his Epistle to the Galatians describes Judaisers from Jerusalem as "certain who came from James," thus naming the Church by its bishop; in Acts xxi. 18, St Paul is said to have made a formal visit to St. James and to his presbyters. Moreover, in the middle of the second century all parties were agreed in regarding St. James as bishop of Jerusalem.[2] This is clearly proved by Bishop Lightfoot, who rightly describes St. James as "the precedent and pattern of the later episcopate." We refer to Dr. Lightfoot for this admission, not only because of his great learning and high ability, but also because he is perhaps the very ablest writer who has ever written against the Apostolic origin of episcopacy.

Next, St. Paul gave Titus power to ordain presbyters; he gives St. Timothy directions for the way in which he is to receive accusations against presbyters. Clearly then both Timothy and Titus were ecclesiastical officers superior to the clergy of the second order.

Thirdly, the Angels of the Churches in the Apocalypse cannot possibly be angels in the ordinary sense, for some of them are charged with serious faults. Nor can the Angels be identified with the Churches, since both Angels and Churches are represented by distinct symbols. "The seven stars," St. John says, "are the angels of the seven churches, and the seven candlesticks are the seven churches." What, then, were the Angels of the Churches? Each of them represents the Church of a city, and is responsible for the purity of its doctrine and its morals. They answer to the idea of diocesan bishops and to nothing else.[1]

This inference from Scripture rises to demonstration if considered in connection with the earliest tradition. Polycarp, the disciple of St. John, writes as a bishop and distinguishes himself from his presbyters. The Ignatian epistles notoriously exalt the episcopal office as the centre of unity, and insist on the necessity laid both on presbyters and laymen of submission to the bishop. St. Ignatius wrote only a few years after St. John's death, and his letters prove that episcopacy was established in his time, not only at Antioch, where he himself was bishop, but at each of the six Churches in Asia Minor to which he writes, nor does he hint that there was any Church with other than an episcopal organisation. True, the authenticity of these letters has been disputed, but this on most inadequate grounds. Indeed, many eminent German scholars, prejudiced as they are against the Ignatian teaching on episcopacy, have been compelled by the weight of evidence to admit the authenticity of these epistles. The Clementine homilies supply another important contribution to the evidence. Their witness is all the more valuable because they are deeply marked with heresy. Still the author of these homilies, differing as he does from Catholics on other points, agrees with them in affirming the Apostolic origin of the episcopal office.[2] These homilies come from early times: they cannot be placed later than the end, and should perhaps be placed at the beginning, of the second century. Now, if we allow the Apostolic institution, this ancient evidence presents no difficulty. It does but confirm the conclusion we had already reached from an examination of the New Testament records. If, on the other hand, it is maintained that bishops in the modern sense began to be after the death of the Apostles, or at least without their sanction, it is impossible to understand how in so brief a space Churches all over the world exchanged presbyterian for episcopal government. Nor is this all. We must suppose that in a very short time—within a century at the most—all recollection of the original state of things had perished. St. Irenæus cannot even understand that the name of "bishop"[1] had ever been given to mere presbyters. We say nothing of later Fathers, for in the Church of the fourth century it is admitted to have been a settled maxim that bishops only could ordain, and Epiphanius describes the doctrine of Aerius, the first presbyterian, as frantic.

[1] Petavius, De Eccles. Hierarch. lib. iv. ad init., gives both theories as probable, quoting Fathers of the Church for each. The latter seems much the more attractive on instrinsic grounds. The former is recommended by the language of the Council of Trent, where Acts xx. 28, is interpreted of bishops in the proper sense.

II. Nature of the Episcopal Office.—We may now dismiss the controversial part of the subject, and proceed to explain the duties, rights and position of a bishop in the Church. A bishop is, according to the Council of Trent, the successor of the Apostles. He has received the sacrament of order in all its fulness. He can, like the Apostles, confirm; he can ordain priests and consecrate other bishops. The Pope himself, so far as order goes, is simply a bishop. Moreover, the bishop is the member of a hierarchy which is divinely constituted, and which collectively represents the college of the Apostles. The Holy Ghost has appointed bishops "to rule the Church of God," and although the Pope can suppress sees or change their boundaries, he cannot do away, throughout the Church, with bishops governing their sees with ordinary jurisdiction, because this would involve a change in the divine constitution of the Church, which is inalterable. Again, even an individual bishop has certain duties to the whole Church. It is his duty to bear witness to the faith and tradition of his predecessors and of his flock, and he sits as a judge in general councils. Of course all these rights are held and duties exercised in union with and in submission to the see of Peter.

[1] iii. 14, 2. The passage is very instructive. St. Irenæus says St. Paul at Miletus "convoked the bishops and the presbyters." He is evidently unable to understand the interchange of names.

1. In his own diocese it is a bishop's duty (a) to teach. He himself is required by the Council of Trent to preach the word of God, unless he be lawfully hindered, nor can anyone, secular or regular, preach in the diocese without his leave. He must watch over purity of doctrine, especially in all schools public and private, and appoint professors in the seminary and clerical colleges. No book treating on religion (de rebus sacris) can be published till it has been examined by the bishop's orders and received his imprimatur.[1]

(b) To guard the morals of his flock, and especially to maintain discipline among his clergy; to take measures for the due performance of divine worship; to see that the people are provided with the sacraments, &c. He himself (or another bishop, with his leave) must confirm, ordain priests, consecrate the holy oils, churches, altars, chalices, &c. He must also approve priests, and give them their faculties to hear confessions, to administer the other sacraments, &c., &c.

(c) To reside.[2] (d) To make a visitation of all the churches in his diocese at least every two years.[3]

2. In order that he may perform these duties, a bishop possesses certain rights:—

(a) He may make laws for his diocese: not, however, such as are contrary to the law of the Church.

(b) He decides in the first instance all ecclesiastical causes. (c) He can inflict penalties, suspension, excommunication, and the like.

(d) He may dispense from the observance of his own laws, and although, generally speaking, a bishop cannot dispense in laws made by those who have power superior to his own, still the general law of the Church enables him to dispense in certain cases of irregularity, in the proclamation of banns, in oaths (unless the dispensation tends to the injury of a third party), and in simple vows, except vows of chastity and vows to enter religion, or to make pilgrimages to Rome, the Holy Land, or St. James of Compostella, &c., &c. Some bishops have additional power to dispense by virtue of lawful custom or by delegation from the Pope.

(e) Certain other rights of bishops are summed up under the general head of "administration." A bishop may erect or suppress churches or benefices, provided he observes the canonical regulation respecting such matters. He collates to all benefices, parish churches, prebends in his diocese, except such as are reserved to the Pope. He assigns their duties to his clergy, and determines the persons among his subjects who are to be admitted to the ecclesiastical state or to higher orders. He watches over the management of temporal goods pertaining to the Church or to pious places. As Apostolic Delegate, he becomes in certain cases mentioned by the law the executor to carry out the intentions of those who have given or left money for pious uses.[1]

III. Titles, Insignia, &c., of Bishops.—All priests saying Mass in the diocese pray for the bishop by name in the Canon. He is received by the priests and people at the door of the church when he comes on official visits. He receives certain titles of honour. In the first ages he was called Most Holy, Most Blessed, Lord (dominus), "Your Holiness" (sanctitas tua), &c., &c., some of which titles are now reserved to the Pope. Desiderius of Cators, about 650, calls himself servus servorum.[2] At present a bishop is called "most illustrious and most reverend Lord;" the Pope addresses him as "venerable brother," "your fraternity," &c., while the bishop speaks of himself as "N., by the grace of God and of the Apostolic See, Bishop of N." The insignia of his office are the pastoral staff (pedum, baculus), the ring, pectoral cross, episcopal throne, the mitre, pontifical vestments, gloves and sandals. In many countries the bishop has special rights and titles of honour accorded to him by the laws of the State.

IV. Election, &c., of Bishops.—Bishops were first of all chosen by the Apostles. St. Paul, for instance, left St. Titus at Crete, with authority to ordain priests, &c.

In the third century bishops were chosen, as Cyprian says, "by the vote of all the faithful and by the judgment of the bishops" of the province[3]—i.e. the people chose a bishop, but the bishops of the province could put a veto on this choice: nay, the bishops could in extreme cases actually choose the bishop. The fourth canon of Nicæa recommends (προσήκει) that a bishop be appointed (καθίστασθαι) by the bishops of the province. If this is impossible, three bishops are to consecrate him with the consent of the rest. The confirmation of the whole matter (τὸ κῦρος τῶν γινομένων) is to rest with the metropolitan. Two interpretations of this canon were current in the Church. The Greek canonists, following the lead of the Seventh General Council, understood the Nicene canon as reserving the choice of a new bishop to the bishops of the province, and so annulling the old form of election by clergy and people. In the West, the canon was interpreted as merely requiring the presence of the bishops of the province at the consecration. Hence in the Latin Church popular election continued, at least in form, till the eleventh century. After that, the bishop was elected by the clergy of the cathedral church, the confirmation resting, as before, with the metropolitan.[1] Gradually, from the eleventh century onwards, the right of confirmation passed from the metropolitan to the Pope.[2] Later on, from the time of Clement V., the Popes reserved the whole appointment of bishops in certain cases, and at last in all cases, to themselves. This last state of things, however, did not continue. The Popes restored in some countries the right of electing bishops to the chapters,[3] and the right is still continued in Germany (except Bavaria and part of Austria) and in Switzerland. In other countries the Pope has given to Catholic sovereigns the right of nominating to vacant bishoprics. Such rights have been conceded to the Kings of France, Portugal, Spain, Naples and Sicily, Sardinia, to the Emperor of Austria with certain exceptions, and by the Concordat of 1817 to the King of Bavaria. Even Protestant Governments in Germany are permitted to inspect a list of names proposed provisionally by the chapters and to exclude such names as are displeasing to them. In England the choice of bishops belongs simply and exclusively to the Pope. At the same time certain privileges have been granted in this respect to the English Church by Pius IX. A week after the see is vacant the canons are required to elect a vicar capitular. A month later, under the presidency of the metropolitan, or, failing him, of the senior bishop, they by their separate votes recommend three persons for the vacant see. Each of these persons must have obtained an absolute majority of the votes of the chapter.

The names are given or sent in alphabetical order to the metropolitan. The bishops of the province (i.e. of England) examine the names, annex their judgment upon each of them, and transmit them to the Congregation of Propaganda. It need scarcely be said that this recommendation is wholly different from true and canonical election.[1] The person thus elected, nominated or recommended must be thirty years of age, in holy orders, of Catholic parentage, of good fame, able to produce the public testimony of some university or academy to his learning.[2] If the person elected accepts, he must within a fixed time ask for the Papal confirmation, by which the person elected is approved and made bishop of the see. This confirmation is given by the Pope in a consistory of Cardinals, and in virtue of it the bishop designate contracts spiritual marriage with his see and receives full jurisdiction within it. He cannot, of course, previous to his consecration, confirm, ordain, &c., but he can delegate power for the performance of these and other acts of episcopal order to another bishop.

It is evident from what has been said that the discipline of the Church with regard to the appointment of bishops has varied from age to age, and that the Holy See now exercises a more immediate control over the matter than was usual in the primitive or even the mediæval Church. From the first, however, the Pope possessed the full power of governing the whole Church. No one is, and no one ever could be, a Catholic bishop, unless either expressly or tacitly recognised as such by the Pope. Varying circumstances made it prudent for the Pope to exercise his control in a less or in a greater degree, but the principle of government has remained the same. The Pope, by the law of Christ, is the head of the Church. On the other hand, patriarchs and metropolitans are of ecclesiastical institution; they could therefore possess no inherent right to confirm bishops, and they suffered no wrong when the Pope withdrew it from them.

V. Consecration of Bishops.—The consecration of bishops used to be performed by the metropolitan and two other bishops. According to the present discipline, the consecration of bishops is reserved to the Pope, or to a bishop specially commissioned by him. The consecrator is assisted by two other bishops, for which latter the Pope sometimes permits mitred abbots, or even simple priests, to be substituted. The consecration should take place within three months of confirmation, and on a Sunday, or feast of an Apostle. The bishop-elect, who must already have been ordained priest, takes an oath before the bishop who is to consecrate him, that he will be faithful to the Holy See, that he will promote its authority, and that he will, at stated intervals prescribed by law, and different for different countries, visit the city of Rome, and give an account to the Pope of his whole pastoral office. Afterwards, the elect is consecrated bishop by imposition of hands, the tradition of staff and ring, the unction with the chrism, the imposition of the book of the Gospels on his shoulders, and other rites prescribed in the Pontifical. Thus the fulness of the priesthood is received, and the person consecrated acquires episcopal order in addition to episcopal jurisdiction, which he already held. [See also ORDER, HOLY.]

VI. Translation, Resignation, Deposition of Bishops.—So sacred is the connection between a bishop and his see, that, as Innocent III. declares, the power to sever it belongs, "not so much by canonical legislation, as by divine institution, to the Roman Pontiff, and to him alone." This follows from principles already stated. The Pope alone can make a bishop; and therefore the Pope alone can unmake him.

Translation from one see to another was absolutely forbidden by the Nicene Council (Can. 15), and by the Council of Antioch, which met in 341. This prohibition was, however, modified by the 14th of the Apostolic Canons, which permits translation if the reasons are very urgent and approved by the judgment of "many bishops."[1] At first, such translation was effected by provincial councils. In the ninth century, Hincmar of Rheims says a bishop might be translated "by the ordinance of a synod, or by the consent of the Apostolic See;" but by the law which has prevailed from the twelfth century the consent of the Pope is always required. The Pope's leave is also required for resignation. Finally, the "grave causes" against bishops such as deserve deposition or privation can only be examined and terminated by the definitive sentence of the Pope.[1] Less serious charges may be examined and decided in a provincial council.

BISHOP AUXILIARY. When a bishop is unable, for various reasons, to perform all the functions required by his office, it is usual to assign to him a titular bishop to assist him. This auxiliary bishop, as such, has no jurisdiction; he only performs those things which belong to the episcopal office and order. He may, however, be nominated by the bishop as vicar general; in which case he has the right to exercise jurisdiction. Another name for an auxiliary is Bishop Suffragan q.v.].

BISHOP, COADJUTOR. [See Coadjutor.]

BISHOP IN PARTIBUS INFIDELIUM. A bishop consecrated to a see which formerly existed, but which has been, chiefly through the devastations of the followers of Mahomet, lost to Christendom. Such a bishop may also be described as a "Titular" bishop.

The creation of such titular bishops dates only from the pontificate of Leo X., but they existed de facto from the time when the first Christian see was widowed by the attacks of a foreign enemy or the action of a hostile government. Gregory the Great provided for several Illyrian bishops, whom an inroad of the Avars had driven from their sees, by appointing them to vacant sees in Italy, till they should be able to return home. The Moorish conquest of Spain widowed a great number of sees, the prelates of which fled to the parts still unconquered, chiefly settling at Oviedo, which thence had the name of "the City of Bishops." But it was the progress of Mohammedan arms in the East, devastating numberless Churches in Asia Minor, Syria, and Africa, which, till then, had been flourishing bishoprics, that caused a great and sudden rise in the number of titular bishops, attached to no special sphere of duty, but wandering from place to place, some hoping one day to return, others seeking for suitable work wherever it might be offered. This state of things led to great abuses; for a bishop whose see was in partibus would often enter some remote portion of the diocese of a more fortunate brother further west, and there exercise in various ways, without the permission of the bishop of the diocese, his episcopal office. Clerks whom their own bishop would not have promoted to priest's orders often received through the agency of these wandering bishops the ordination which they desired. This abuse was condemned by a decree of the Council of Trent,[1] which expressly forbids these wandering bishops—"clero carentes et populo Christiano"—to promote candidates for ordination to any orders whatever, without the consent of the bishop of the diocese.

With the increasing complication of political affairs in Europe, circumstances could not but arise which should induce the Popes, while providing for Catholic populations more or less at the mercy of Protestant Governments pastors armed with full episcopal powers, to prefer investing them with the titles of ancient sees, now extinct, to asserting their claim to local titles and thus arousing the hostility or suspicion of unfriendly Governments. Considerations of this nature were the cause why Catholic affairs in our own country were committed to the administration of bishops in partibus, from the appointment of the first Vicar Apostolic (1623) to the creation of a new hierarchy in 1850. Besides the Vicars Apostolic in a non-Catholic country, the Vicars of Cardinal-bishops, auxiliary bishops in countries where it is usual to appoint them, and Papal Nuncios, usually have their sees in partibus infidelium.

Bishops in partibus can attend general councils. They are considered as truly wedded to the Churches of which they bear the titles, so that they cannot be appointed to other sees except upon the conditions common to all episcopal translations. They are not obliged, like other bishops, to make periodical visits ad limina apostolorum, because they have no dioceses to report of. They are, however, expected to inform themselves, so far as they may have opportunity, of the condition of affairs in their titular dioceses, and work actively for their restoration to Christendom, if any favourable opening should present itself.

The political condition of the eastern and southern shores of the Mediterranean has for some time been such as to allow of the existence of flourishing Christian communities in many places where formerly Mussulman bigotry would have rendered it impossible. These countries are no longer "partes infidelium," in the full sense of the words. His Holiness Leo XIII. has therefore, by a recent decision, substituted the phrase "Titular

Bishop" for "Bishop in Partibus Infidelium."

BISHOP, SUFFRAGAN (Lat. suffragari, to support.) This name is given to a bishop in an ecclesiastical province, relatively to the metropolitan [q.v.] in whose province he is. Also to a titular bishop or bishop in partibus who is exercising the pontifical functions and ordinations for the ordinary bishop whom he has been invited to assist.

BLACK FRIARS. [See DOMINICANS.]

BLASPHEMY (Gr. βλασφημία; etymol. uncertain). Originally, injurious and opprobrious words generally; afterwards it was restricted to language dishonouring to God—contumeliosa in Deum locutio—but yet so that the offence committed against those known to be God's servants was held to be committed against God Himself; as when Stephen was charged by the Pharisees with speaking "blasphemous words against Moses;" finally, and in modern use, the employment of such language against, or concerning, God only. In Matt. xii. 31, we read that, while every other sin and blasphemy are pardonable, "the blasphemy of the Spirit" shall not be forgiven. Various explanations of this passage have been given by theologians. There is a chapter on "Blasphemy" in the body of the Canon Law, which prescribes the penalties to be awarded to the various persons who may be guilty of it. In England the statute 10 William III. ch. 32, modified by 52 George III. ch. 160, contains the existing law in respect of blasphemy. The code of Wurtemberg punishes outrageous and offensive words or acts against the customs, rites, &c., of any recognised religion; but the pain inflicted on the feelings of men, not the dishonour to God, seems to be the motive of such legislation. Similarly the French code, while not punishing blasphemy, as such, restrains it indirectly by severe regulations repressive of anything like what we should consider "brawling" in church.

Protestant divines have often stigmatised the rapturous language in which Catholics indulge in praise of the Blessed Virgin as "blasphemous," on the ground that God is indirectly dishonoured when His creature is thus exalted. But this seems to involve a misuse of the term "blasphemy," which implies a conscious and intentional use of language which the speaker knows to be injurious to the Being of whom it is uttered. No excess of "profane swearing," culpable as it may be, can amount to blasphemy, because the intentional contempt of God is not there. In the same way, to speak of Mary as "negotiating our peace," not only is not "blasphemous," but conveys an important truth; while to deny that her Son "negotiated our peace" in a higher sense would, of course, be blasphemous in the highest degree.

BLESSING, in its most general sense, a form of prayer begging the favour of God for the persons blessed. God is the source of all His blessing, but certain persons have special authority to bless in His name, so that this blessing is more than a mere prayer; it actually conveys God's blessing to those who are fit to receive it. Thus in the old law God said of the sons of Aaron, "They shall invoke my name on the children of Israel, and I will bless them;"[1] and Christ said to his disciples, "Into whatsoever house you enter, first say: Peace be to this house: and, if the son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon him."[2] Accordingly, the Church provides for the solemn blessing of her children by the hands of her ministers. Such blessings are given,

(1) By priests. "It is the part of a priest to bless," the Pontifical says, in the office for their ordination. This blessing may be given privately, at discretion. It is given by a form tolerated in England to the penitent before confession; to those who have received communion out of Mass; on many other occasions, some of which are determined by custom, but above all at the end of all Masses except those for the dead. The priest raises his right hand and makes the sign of the cross once over the people. This custom of priests blessing at Mass is not very ancient. The older writers on ritual make no mention of it, and although it was known to the author of the "Micrologus," a contemporary of Gregory VII., the custom does not seem to have been universally received even then. At one time priests used to make the sign of the cross three times over the people. Pius V. restricted them to a blessing with a single sign of the cross, except in solemn Masses; Clement VIII. made the rule, which forbids a priest to bless with the triple sign of the cross, absolute.

[1] Num. vi. 27.
[2] Luc. x. 5.

(2) By bishops. A bishop immediately after his consecration is conducted round the church, blessing the people; and afterwards, returning to the altar, blesses them solemnly, making the triple sign of the cross. He uses the same rite of blessing whenever he says Mass. An abbot, according to the decrees of Alexander VII., can give the blessing with the triple sign of the cross only when he celebrates Mass pontifically. (See Benedict XIV. "De Miss." ii. 24.)

(3) By the Pope. The Pope blesses the people solemnly at Easter, on the feast of St. Peter and St. Paul, and also on other special occasions. To this papal blessing (Benedictio Pontificia seu Apostolica) a plenary indulgence is attached, to be gained by the faithful on certain conditions. Bishops in virtue of a special indult sometimes receive the privilege of bestowing the Papal blessing at stated times. The bishop gives it after Mass, first causing the Apostolic letters, which confer the plenary indulgence, to be read. The power of bestowing it is also sometimes communicated to simple priests—e.g. to regulars, at the conclusion of a mission, &c.

Hitherto we have been occupied with blessings bestowed upon the faithful in general. But there are also blessings reserved for special persons or for special objects. Gavantus and other writers on ritual divide blessings of this kind [1] into two classes—viz. into benedictiones invocativæ, or blessings which merely invoke the blessing of God upon persons or things; and benedictiones constitutivæ, or blessings which set apart a person or thing for the service of God. To the former class belongs the blessing of houses, fields, ships, candles, food, &c., &c.; to the latter the blessing of sacerdotal vestments, corporals, altar-cloths, &c. It is impossible to distinguish accurately between the use of the word consecration and blessing when it is used in the sense of benedictio constitutiva; but consecration denotes a more solemn form of blessing, so that we speak of blessing an abbot or a bell, but of consecrating a chalice or an altar. Of these blessings some (such as that of the Agnus Dei, and the rose sent to sovereigns) are reserved to the Pope; others (e.g. the blessing of a king or queen at their coronation, of bells, vestments, &c.) are proper to bishops; others (such as the blessing of houses, fields, medals, crosses, &c.) may be given by simple priests, though, of course, for many blessings special faculties are required.

With regard to the rite employed, the more ordinary blessings are given by the priest in surplice and stole, with prayer, accompanied by the sign of the cross and very often by the use of holy water. In other more solemn blessings other rites are added, such as exorcisms, incensation and anointing with the holy oils. The principles on which these special blessings rest are very simple. God made all things good, but although matter still remains good, it has been marred, and is constantly abused by the spirits of evil. Hence the Church, in the power and name of Christ, rescues persons and things from the power of the devil. Further, she prays that the things which she blesses may avail to the spiritual and bodily health of her children. It may be asked, how water, or medals, or candles, can possibly help us on the way to heaven. In themselves plainly they have no such power. But they tend to excite good dispositions in those who use them aright, not only because they remind us of holy things, but also because they have been blessed for our use by the prayers of the Church. There is surely no superstition in believing that if the Church prays that the sight or use of pious objects may excite good desires in her children, God will listen to these prayers and touch in a special way the hearts of those who use them aright.

BLOOD. [See Baptism, § III. See also Precious Blood.]

BOHEMIAN BRETHREN. The gentleness with which the Council of Basle dealt with the Hussites, and the evident desire of the majority of the prelates to go to the verge of lawful concession in order to restore them to the unity of the Church, deprived the schism of much of its raison d'être. The moderate party (Calixtines) were disposed to be satisfied with the concession as to communion under both species, joined to a promise that clerical abuses should be reformed; while the violent section (Taborites), after a long succession of victories over their German foes, were signally defeated at Laban (1434), and after that found it necessary to abate their pretensions. Some years passed; a Taborite remnant which had found shelter at Lititz, on the frontiers of Moravia and [1] This division really includes all blessings, for such as are given to the faithful generally fall under the head of Benedictiones invocativæ.

Silesia, throve unmolested; its leaders plunged anew into the dreamy mysticism which has such charms for the Slavonian mind; they fraternised with some scattered Calixtine pastors, who were discontented with what they regarded as the undue pliability of the mass of their party, and the "Union of the Bohemian Brothers' (1457) was the result. Three of their leading men, Kunwald, Prelautsch, and Krenov, were ordained (1467) by a Vaudois bishop. Under the Bohemian prince George Podiebrad (died 1471) they were subjected to much persecution. Wladislav, his successor, left them undisturbed, and in his long reign they grew greatly in numbers and solidity; about 1500, they possessed two hundred churches in Bohemia and Moravia. When the Reformation came, the brethren, after vainly endeavouring to extract an approval of the "Apology" for their system which they had drawn up from the wary Erasmus, made overtures to Luther. These were well received; but the brethren were scandalised at the lack of discipline which prevailed among Luther's followers, and for a long time there was a coolness; ultimately, however, something like a cordial understanding was established. The toleration which the brethren had long enjoyed was withdrawn, about the middle of the sixteenth century, by Ferdinand, brother to Charles V.; and many of them emigrated in consequence to Prussia and Poland. The Emperors Maximilian and Rodolph (1564–1612) were favourable to them; the latter gave them permission to found an Academy and a Consistory, to hold churches and found new ones on the estates of their adherents. With prosperity, says their historian, Comenius, came the relaxation of their peculiar discipline. They joined the general rising of the Bohemian Protestants against Ferdinand II., and after the battle of the White Hill (1620) were implicated in the consequences of their defeat. Many thousands of them abandoned their native soil; and of those who remained, hoping against hope that the old state of things would one day be restored, the greater number, at last renouncing that hope, quitted Bohemia in 1721 and found a refuge on the estate of Count Zinzendorf, in Lusatia. Under the name Herrn-huters or Moravians, the new organisation which these refugees, aided by their patron Zinzendorf (who to a mystical and imaginative turn united much quiet power and practical sagacity), succeeded in forming, has gained a world-wide notoriety. The Brethren who still lingered on in Bohemia adhered under Joseph II. (1780–1790) to the Helvetic Confession, because that Emperor would tolerate in his dominions no other Protestant doctrine but either that or the Confession of Augsburg. As a distinct sect the Bohemian Brethren no longer exist.

With regard to their doctrine and discipline, it is unnecessary to say that they neither admitted the authority of the chair of Peter, nor the unity of the visible Church. After the Reformation period they adopted Luther's opinions on most other points, but would not follow him in embracing the tenet of consubstantiation: they would only allow of a mystical union of the body and blood of Christ with the elements, and denied anything like a real presence. Their organisation was the most remarkable thing about them. They divided themselves into three classes, the Beginners, the Proficients, and the Perfect (incipientes, proficientes, perfecti). From the ranks of the Perfect were chosen the ministers, who were also of three kinds, acolytes or deacons, pastors or priests, and bishops or presidents. They had four fast days of obligation in the year. In relation to sin, the laity (if their offences were of an open nature—for such only, in the absence of confession, could the system reach) were subjected to three degrees of discipline: warning, public reproof, and excommunication. (Ginzel's article in Wetzer and Welte.)

BOLLANDISTS. A name given to the Jesuit editors of the great "Acta Sanctorum," or Lives of the Saints. The first plan of the work came from the Flemish Jesuit Rosweid, who calculated the size of the whole work at eighteen volumes. He, however, died in 1629, without actually beginning the work. His papers were entrusted to another Jesuit, John Bolland (born in the Netherlands, 1596—died 1665), who settled at Antwerp and opened a correspondence with learned men over Europe, in order to procure the documents useful for his purpose. The plan grew in the hands of Bollandus, and in 1635 his brother-Jesuit George Henschen (born 1600—died 1681) was appointed to help him. In 1643, two large folios appeared, containing the lives of the Saints who are commemorated in January; they were followed in 1658 by three more folios, containing the Saints for February. Two years later a new labourer was secured, the Jesuit Daniel Papebrock (born 1628—died 1714), and, at the wish of Pope Alexander VII., Henschen and Papebrock travelled through France, Germany, and Italy, where they found many precious MSS. A little later Bolland died, but the number of those who laboured at the work was continually recruited from the society; indeed, even after the suppression of the Jesuits, the Bollandist Lives were still continued by ex-Jesuits, until in 1794 the French Revolutionary troops entered the Netherlands, and put an end for the time to this great undertaking. At that date the Lives had reached the 53rd volume, which was printed at Tongerloo in the very year the French troops entered, and contained Lives of the Saints from the 12th to the 15th October. The papers of the Jesuit fathers were scattered, some perishing entirely, others being preserved in the Royal Library at Haag, and in the Burgundian Library at Brussels. Napoleon desired in vain to procure a continuation of the work. At last, in 1837, the Belgian Government entrusted the prosecution of the work to the Society of Jesus, and next year a prospectus was published, "De Prosecutione Operis Bollandiani." The first volume of the new series was published about nine years later. A new edition in sixty-one vols. folio—viz. down to the last volume published—has been issued at Paris by Palmé, 1863–1875.

BOLSENA, MASS or MIRACLE OF. A portent which is said to have happened at Bolsena (the ancient Volsinium) in the reign of Urban IV. This Pope was still in doubt whether he should cause the feast of Corpus Christi to be kept throughout the Church. While he held his court at Orvieto in the year 1264, a priest in the neighbouring city of Bolsena spilt a drop of the Precious Blood from the chalice with which he was saying Mass, and tried to conceal the accident by covering the spot where the consecrated wine had fallen, with the corporal. Suddenly the corporal was covered with red spots in the shape of a host. This miracle led the Pope to delay the institution of the feast no longer. The corporal is still preserved at Orvieto, and the event is commemorated in a famous picture of Raphael's in the Vatican. (See Hefele in Wetzer and Welte, and Benedict XIV. "De Festis," De Festo Corporis Christi, where another account is also given, according to which the miracle happened to remove the priest's doubts in transubstantiation.)

BONI HOMINES. Several monastic brotherhoods have borne this name. (1) The order founded in the eleventh century by St. Stephen Grandmont was once so called. A house of theirs at Vincennes having been transferred by Henry III. in 1584 to the Minims, a branch of the Franciscans, these (2) came to be called in France Bons hommes. (3) A Portuguese order of Canons, founded in the fifteenth century by John Vicenza, Bishop of Lamego, had the same appellation. After a time they had fourteen houses in Portugal, and we read of their sending missionaries to the Indies and to Ethiopia. (4) Matthew Paris describes the arrival in England in 1257 of some friars of an order previously unknown, whom he calls fratres saccati. Comparing this with a passage in Polydore Vergil referring to the same year, we find that these unknown religious professed the rule of St. Austin, and were called in England "Boni Homines."

Roger de Hoveden, under the year 1176, gives an abstract of the proceedings of a council held at Lombers, near Toulouse, which examined and condemned some heretics calling themselves Boni Homines, whose tenets seem to have closely resembled those of the Cathari and Paulicians. [ALBIGENSES.]

BRASSES. Engraved sepulchral memorials on brass are so called, which began to a large extent to supersede stone tombs and effigies in the course of the thirteenth century. One great advantage of their use was that they could be let into the pavement: they took up no room in the church. Once introduced, the fashion spread rapidly; improvements and developments appeared; and during three centuries brasses may be said to have been in general use. The material employed was hard latten or sheet brass. The Reformation brought in a period of plunder and destruction, from which (especially the former, because of the intrinsic value of the metal) our brasses suffered enormously. Their number must have been very great, if it be true that four thousand are still preserved in various parts of England. They were once equally common in France, Germany, and Holland: in France, however, all that escaped the Huguenots were purloined by the revolutionists. There are fine brasses at Meissen and Freiberg in Saxony, at Werden and Paderborn in Westphalia, and at Bruges in Flanders. The greater number of those preserved in England are in the eastern counties; the churches of Ipswich, Norwich, Lynn, and Lincoln, are exceptionally rich in them. The chapel of Merton College, Oxford, once possessed a large number; but many have disappeared, and of those that remain some have been sadly mutilated. The earliest English brass now in existence is said to be that of Sir Roger de Trumpington, at Trumpington, near Cambridge; its date is 1289. That of Sir John d'Abernon, at Stoke d'Abernon in Surrey (1327), is exceedingly fine; the effigy is the size of life. In Acton Burnell church there is a well-known one of a Lord Burnell, dating from the same century. In the fifteenth century this art, in respect both of design and of execution, reached its acme. In the cathedral of Constance there is a fine brass of English workmanship commemorating a bishop of Salisbury, Robert Hallam, who died during the council held at that city (1414–17). In the sixteenth century the figures become portraits. "The incised lines were filled up with some black resinous substance, and the armorial decorations and back-ground with mastic, or coarse enamel of various colours." (Parker's "Gloss. of Arch."). The subject of English brasses is exhaustively treated in the work of Cotman.

BREVIARY. The word Breviary, or compendium, is of mediæval origin, and Fleury could find no example of its use before the year 1099.[1] But the recitation of the Breviary is the continuation of a practice which was in use from the infancy of the Church, nay, which the Church herself received from the Synagogue. We may divide the history of the Breviary prayer into four periods: the first from the beginning of Church history down to Pope Damasus in the fourth century; the second extending to the reign of Gregory VII. in the eleventh; the third to that of Pius V. in the sixteenth; while the fourth period stretches from Pius V. to our own day. In these periods we propose to trace the history of the hours of prayer, the origin, the completion, and the final revisions of the Breviary. We shall treat in conclusion of its component parts, of the obligation of reciting it, and of the authority which belongs to its teaching.

I. The Hours of Prayer in the first Four Centuries.—Even in the Acts of the Apostles we find the third, sixth, and ninth hours specially mentioned. From Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Cyprian,[1] and others, we learn that the observance of these hours was general among Christians, and that mystic significations were attached to them. In the eighth book of the Apostolic Constitutions[2] morning and evening prayer are mentioned in addition to the three hours already named, and all five hours are regarded as times of public prayer. To these five hours we must add the nocturnal prayers on the vigils of feasts. This last became more prominent when the times of persecution passed away, and the cœnobitical or monastic life grew and flourished. Cassian tells us that the monks divided the nocturnal office into three nocturns. Thus, counting the nocturnal office as one, we get six hours, corresponding to matins with lauds, prime, tierce, sext, none and vespers, in the present Breviary. We may mention here, for the sake of convenience, though the fact belongs to our second period, that St. Benedict, in the sixth century, added compline to the hours, and so completed the number seven, answering to the praises "seven times a day" of which the psalmist speaks.[3] The service at these hours consisted of psalms, lections, and prayers. As early at least as the time of Athanasius,[4] it was the custom in the East to have the alternate verses of the psalm intoned by different choirs, and this practice was introduced at Milan under St. Ambrose.[5] The lections were usually from Scripture, but on the feasts of the Martyrs their Acts were also read. Much was left to free choice in the selection of the Scriptural lessons.[6] The prayers were recited after each psalm, and the office concluded with the blessing of the celebrant.[7]

[3] Some liturgical writers make seven hours, counting matins and lauds as one. Bona counts seven day hours, and makes matins correspond to the "midnight praise" spoken of in the Psalms.

[7] The Council of Laodicea, canon 17, orders a lection after each psalm.

to Gregory VII.—Great changes occurred during this second period. According to a tradition which is not well attested, but which is most likely correct in substance, St. Jerome, at the request of Pope Damasus, arranged the psalms for the different hours and put the lections together in books called Lectionaries, and these Lectionaries were provided with indices marking the beginning and end of the lections. Later on, in the middle ages, we find the word Breviary used for a collection of rubrics, pointing out the way in which the office was to be said on each day, and sometimes these rubrics were united with the office itself so as to form one book, which was called Plenarium, and answers to our present Breviary.[1] Further, hymns were added to the office as early as the sixth century,[2] although particular churches varied in this respect, and the Roman Church did not adopt them till our third period.[3] At the same time lections were introduced from the writings of the Fathers, and these as well as the psalms and responsories were adapted to the different feasts. Lastly, the influence of the Roman Church introduced uniformity throughout the West. We find an English council in the year 748 passing a decree that the feasts should be kept "in all things pertaining to them . . . in celebration of Masses, in mode of singing, according to the written copy which we have from the Roman Church." Charlemagne introduced the Roman office throughout most of his vast empire, and at last, in 1048, the Council of Burgos ordered its use in Spain.[4]

III. The Completion of the Breviary. Gregory VII. to Pius V.—Hitherto we have traced the origin of the Breviary offices; we now find the word "Breviary" in its modern sense. "A certain shortening of the office," says Merati, "was made by Gregory VII., and the office so shortened was called Breviary." Under Innocent III. the office was abbreviated still further. Next, changes were made in its arrangements by the Franciscan General Haymo, and Nicholas III. prescribed the use of the Breviary thus modified in the churches of Rome. Cardinal Quignon made additional and radical alterations. In his Breviary the Psalms were recited every week; nearly the whole of the New Testament and a great part of the Old were read in the course of the year; the chapters, responsories, and versicles were excluded. The use of this Breviary was permitted from the time of Paul III. to that of Pius V.—viz. for about forty years.[1]

IV. Final Revisions of the Breviary. Pius V. to the present day.—The Council of Trent, finding that the commission which it had appointed to revise the Breviary had not time to complete their work, left the matter in the Pope's hands.[2] Pius V., with the assistance of the Barnabite Fathers, effected the desired revision, and imposed the new Breviary on the whole Latin Church, permitting, however, churches to retain a special Breviary of their own, if they could allege a prescription of 200 years on its behalf. Additional improvements were effected by a commission under Clement VIII. Bellarmine and Baronius were members of it, and to them we owe great ameliorations in the lections of the second nocturn which contain the history of the Saints. The finishing touches were added by Urban VIII.: once more the lections were revised, and with the help of three learned Jesuits many barbarisms and false quantities were removed from the hymns. Since the time of this Pope the Breviary has remained unaltered, except that of course offices for saints canonised since that time, and for new feasts, have been added by the authority of different Popes. It is true that new Breviaries were constructed in France during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries; but the bishops who brought them into use had no power to do so lawfully, and these new Breviaries are now entirely or almost entirely abandoned. These modern Gallican Breviaries must not be confused with the ancient Gallican office, current in France before Charlemagne's time.

V. The Arrangement of the Breviary.—The Breviary is divided into four parts: viz. a winter, spring, summer, and autumn quarter. Each part contains (a) the psalter—i.e. the psalms arranged for each day of the week. (β) The proper of the season—i.e. hymns, antiphons, chapters, and lessons, with responsories and versicles, for each day of the Church year, including the movable feasts. (γ) The proper of the saints—i.e. prayers, lessons, responsories, &c., for the immovable feasts. (δ) The common of the saints—i.e. psalms, with antiphons, lections, &c., for feasts of a particular class, e.g.

of the Blessed Virgin, of a Martyr, &c. To this division the Little Office of the Blessed Virgin, the office of the dead, the penitential and gradual psalms are added. (ε) A supplement containing offices which do not bind the whole Church, but are recited only in particular countries, &c. Besides this, a diocese, province or county, &c., or, again, an order or congregation, may have a special supplement with offices approved for use in that district. This second supplement forms no part of the Breviary. It is printed separately for the persons who are to use it, and then, usually, for the sake of convenience, bound into the Breviary. Every day the office is composed of matins and lauds, prime, tierce, sext, none, vespers and compline; but the rules which determine the mode of their recitation are too elaborate to be given here.

VI. The Obligation of Reciting Office. —At first all the faithful were accustomed to assist at the canonical hours. "The piety of the lay-people," says Thomassin, "cooled: the clergy did not relax their primitive fervour." From the sixth century downwards, many councils speak of this obligation on the part of clerics, but they do not so much enforce it as take for granted a law already enforced by the custom of the Church. The present discipline of the Church imposes the obligation (α) on all clerics, even if not in holy orders, who hold a benefice. By omitting their duty they forfeit the fruits of their benefice and must make restitution (so the Fifth Lateran Council, session ix.); (β) on all persons in Holy Orders, i.e. on subdeacons, deacons, priests; (γ) on religious men and women, professed for the duties of the choir. In the two last cases Billuart considers that the obligation cannot be proved by any positive law, but is founded on custom which has the force of precept.[1] All these persons are required under pain of mortal sin to recite the office at least in private.

VII. The Authority of Statements in the Breviary.—As the Church herself imposes the recitation of the Breviary, it cannot contain anything contrary to faith or morals; otherwise the Church herself would be leading her children into error. But no Catholic is obliged to believe historical statements merely because they are found in the Breviary, and as a matter of fact many of them have been questioned and denied by Catholic critics and historians.

The principal books on the Breviary are:—in the middle ages, Amalarius of Metz, who wrote four books "De Ecclesiastico Officio," in the year 820; the author of a work called "Micrologus de Ecclesiasticis Observationibus," written in the time of Gregory VII.; John Beleth, a Paris theologian, who wrote, about the middle of the twelfth century, "De Divinis Officiis;" the abbot Rupert, "De Divinis Officiis libri xii." (died 1135), and Durandus, "Rationale Divinorum Officiorum" (about 1286). In modern times the principal authors are:—Grancolas, "Commentarius historicus in Romanum Breviarium;" Bona, "De Divina Psalmodia;" but above all Gavantus, who published "Commentaria in Rubricas Missalis et Breviarii," in 1628, and Merati, who edited the work of Gavantus with elaborate notes. (From Gavantus, with Merati's notes, and from Probst, "Brevier und Breviergebet.")

BRIDAL WREATH. [See MARRIAGE.]

BRIEF. A papal Brief is a letter issuing from the Court of Rome, written on fine parchment in modern characters, subscribed by the Pope's Secretary of Briefs, dated "a die Nativitatis," and sealed with the Pope's signet-ring, the seal of the Fisherman. [See BULL.]

BRIGITTINES. This order was founded about 1344 by St. Brigit of Sweden, author of the "Revelations" so well known and so greatly esteemed by persons aspiring to perfection. Each monastery is double, for nuns and for monks; but the foundation of the nunneries, which were to contain on the average sixty inmates, was the principal object of the founder; the related houses of monks were to have thirteen inmates each, priests, besides four deacons. The constitutions of the order, which took the name of the Order of the Saviour, were said to have been communicated to St. Brigit by divine revelation; the rule was that of St. Austin. The first monastery was built on the saint's estate of Wastein, in the diocese of Lincopen. The order spread through all the northern countries of Europe, and was of notable service to the Church. The convent of Wastein, partly through the extraordinary constancy of the nuns, partly from their finding friends where they could have least expected them, survived the change of religion in Sweden for many years, and was only suppressed in 1595. In England

[1] Billuart, De Relig ii. 8. 3, where he says that the canons speak "either of priests only, or of beneficed clerks, or of the public office," &c. See also Liguor. Theol. Moral. v. § 140.

there was one great and wealthy Brigittine house, Sion Convent, near Brentford. This was one of the few monasteries restored by Queen Mary; but being again suppressed under Elizabeth, the nuns, that they might be free to observe their rule, took refuge at Lisbon. They have had a perpetual succession in Portugal down to our own day; and in 1861 some of them came to England and founded the Brigittine convent of Sion House, Spettisbury, in Dorsetshire, afterwards (1887) removed to Chudleigh, Devon.

BRITISH CHURCH, ANCIENT. "In the year 156 from our Lord's Incarnation, whilst Eleutherius, a holy man, was vested with the pontificate of the Roman Church, Lucius, king of Britain, sent him a letter praying to be made a Christian by an act of his authority—the object of which pious request he soon after obtained—and the Britons having received the faith kept it whole and undefiled, and in peace and quiet till the days of the Emperor Diocletian" (Beda, "Eccl. Hist." i. 4). During the persecution St. Alban and many others suffered martyrdom in Britain. After the elevation of Constantine to the purple (which took place at York, where his father Constantius died, in the year 306) we find the British Church in communion of faith and discipline with the rest of Christendom. Contemporary documents tell us of British bishops sitting in the Councils of Arles (314), Sardica (347), and Rimini (359). The Arian and Pelagian heresies both found favour in Britain—indeed, the latter is said to have had a British origin (see PELAGIANISM). It was expelled by St. Germanus of Auxerre, assisted by Lupus of Troyes, and Severus of Treves. From the moment that the Romans withdrew from Britain we are left in darkness as to the fate of the British Church, until, about 559, we meet with the writings of the Briton Gildas. From these we gather the following information as to the worship and doctrine of the Britons. 1. They believed in one God in three Persons; in the Divine and human natures of Christ, in the redemption of mankind through His death, and in the eternity of heaven and hell. 2. Their hierarchy consisted of bishops, priests, and other ministers; a particular service was employed at their ordination; the hands of the bishops and priests were anointed and blessed; these were looked upon as successors of St. Peter, the prince of the Apostles and bearer of the keys of the kingdom of heaven; they sate in his seat, and inherited his power of binding and loosing; it was their duty to teach the people, and to offer sacrifice. 3. The Britons had monasteries of monks, presided over by abbots; the monks made the usual vows of obedience, poverty, and chastity; and widows often bound themselves by vows to a life of continence. 4. They built churches in honour of the martyrs; there were several altars, the seats of the heavenly sacrifice, in the same church; the service was chanted by the clergy in the churches; oaths of mutual forgiveness and peace were taken by adverse parties on the altar. 5. Their liturgical language was Latin; their translation of the Bible the Vetus Itala; they sang the Psalms from a translation of the Septuagint, the same as that used in the Latin Church; they quoted the Books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus as of equal authority with the other canonical books. Gildas rebukes both clergy and laity alike for their unchristian lives. Murder, rapine, gross immorality, simony, ambition, are some of the crimes to which he attributes the downfall of Britain. The deplorable state of the British Church as described by Gildas was probably the motive which, 40 years later, induced Pope Gregory to place the British bishops under the superintendence of St. Augustin. "Your brotherhood," says the Papal mandate, "will moreover have subject to you . . . all the bishops of Britain, by authority of God and our Lord Jesus Christ; that from your instruction they may learn to believe correctly and from your example to live religiously, and thus, by the discharge of their duty, obtain the reward of the heavenly kingdom" (Beda, i. 29). In the course of time Augustin had a meeting with the Britons. He requested them to join in fellowship with him, to help him in the conversion of the idolaters, and to conform to the usages of the universal Church, especially in the celebration of Easter [see EASTER] and in completing baptism after the Roman manner, viz. by adding Confirmation to it. These demands clearly show that there was no difference of doctrine between the British and the Roman Church, nor respecting the authority claimed and exercised by the Bishop of Rome. Had the Britons differed from Augustin on these points he would never have invited them to become his fellow-missionaries. The meetings and conferences however, led to no practical results, on account, we may safely assume, of the hatred of the Britons for the Saxon invaders. The British Church naturally met with the same fate as the British race. The Saxon conquest was one of ruthless extermination. Some of the unfortunate natives escaped into the western portions of the island, and there the British Church long survived, until it was ultimately absorbed into the English Church. Attempts have lately been made to trace the origin of the Anglican Protestant Church to the ancient British Church. But, as we have already seen, the British Christians agreed with the Roman Augustin on every substantial point, and held doctrines now repudiated by Anglicans. "Those who study the learned work of the late Mr. Haddon and Bishop Stubbs ('Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents,' &c., vol. i.) will find in the materials collected (from which alone it is possible to obtain any knowledge of the ancient Welsh Church) nothing to justify the statement that the disappearance of differences or the establishment of practical unity between the Church of England and that of the Principality was the result of Norman wars or conquests, or of the interference of Norman kings, barons, or bishops. The differences were of a trivial kind, quite unworthy to divide Churches; they disappeared (as much under native Welsh as under Saxon influence) during the Anglo-Saxon period,[1] about the end of the eighth century. Full intercommunion, and close ecclesiastical relations between the Churches followed. During the reign of Edward the Confessor, the English diocese of Hereford was administered by one of the Welsh bishops" ("A Defence of the Church of England against Disestablishment," by the Earl of Selborne, 4th ed. p. 335). Besides, if anything is certain in English history it is that the great bulk of our institutions and especially the Church, had a Saxon and not a British origin. The philological argument which proves so convincingly the extermination of the Britons tells strongly in our favour. No Anglican prelate can style himself a "bishop," or speak of West-"minster," or exhort his flock to give "alms," or "preach," or "ordain" without admitting the Roman origin of the English Church. "The introduction of Christianity about the end of the sixth century brought England into connection with Rome, and during the four following centuries a large number of Latin words became familiar to educated Englishmen. The words introduced into the language were for the most part connected with the Church, its services and observances" (Morris' "Historical English Grammar," p. 11). BULGARIANS. This was another name for the Paulician heretics (q. v.) owing to their long sojourn in Bulgaria. Constantine Copronymus, about A.D. 750, transplanted great numbers of Paulicians from the banks of the upper Euphrates to Constantinople and Thrace; whence their preachers passed into Bulgaria and obtained many followers. Another powerful colony of these sectaries was brought to the valleys of the Balkans in 970, by John Zimisces, with the view of detaching them from the Moslem alliance, and employing them as a barrier against the barbarians of Scythia. They occupied Philippopolis, and soon gained great influence in Bulgaria. About 1200 their Primate lived at or near that city, and governed by his vicars affiliated bodies in France and Italy. By three channels they obtained access to Western countries —the trade of Venice, the military service of the Byzantine emperors, and the pilgrim track to Jerusalem along the valley of the Danube. Mingled with the Cathari and other heretics, they were found in considerable numbers in the south of France at the time of the Albigensian Crusade. [ALBIGENSES.] (Gibbon, "Decline and Fall," ch. liv.)

BULL. A Papal Bull is so named from the bulla (or round leaden seal, having on one side a representation of SS. Peter and Paul, and on the other the name of the reigning Pope), which is attached to the document (by a silken cord, if it be a "Bull of Grace," and by one of hemp if a "Bull of Justice") and gives authenticity to it. Bulls are engrossed on strong rough parchment, and begin "[Leo] Episcopus servus servorum Dei ad perpetuam rei memoriam."[1] A

[1] Or "ad futuram rei memoriam;" or, if the bull relates to doctrine, the words "ad . . . . memoriam" are omitted, and the style usually is, "universis Christi fidelibus salutem et apostolicam benedictionem."

Bull is dated "a die Incarnationis," and signed by the functionaries of the Papal Chancery. It is a document of a more formal and weighty character than a Brief, and many memorable Papal decisions and condemnations have been given in this form, such as the bull Unam Sanctam of Boniface VIII., the bull Unigenitus of Clement XI., &c. &c.

BULL IN CŒNA DOMINI. This was a Papal sentence of excommunication formerly published against heretics every Maundy Thursday. The latest form which it assumed was given to it by Urban VIII. in 1627. It excommunicates all heretics, mentioning the chief modern sects and heresiarchs by name, as well as those who aid and abet them, or read their works; all those who appeal from the Pope [Appeal] to a future general council; pirates and wreckers; Christians who ally themselves with the Turks; those who maltreat Papal officials or falsify Papal bulls, and many others. By degrees a spirit of marked opposition to the publication of the bull in their dominions displayed itself on the part of many Catholic sovereigns; Pope Clement XIV. yielded to their wishes, and after 1773 the periodical publication of the bull was discontinued.

BULLARIUM. A collection of Papal bulls is so called. That of Cocquelines (Rom. 1737) containing the bulls of all the Popes from Leo the Great to Benedict XII. is one of the most celebrated.

BURIAL. See Funeral.

BURSE (BURSA, also PERA). A square case into which the priest puts the corporal which is to be used in Mass. It was introduced in the fourteenth century. It should be of the same colour as the vestments of the day. Usually it has a cross in the middle. The priest places it above the chalice, with the open side towards his own breast. When he reaches the altar, he extracts the corporal and places the burse on the Gospel side. Pius V. allowed the Spanish priests to carry the corporal outside the burse. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss." i. 5.)

BY THE GRACE OF GOD AND FAVOUR OF THE APOSTOLIC SEE. Bishops and archbishops now use this formula ("Dei et Apostolicæ Sedis Gratia") at the beginning of their pastorals and instructions. Something resembling it came in very early; thus St. Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, called himself the Servus apostolicæ sedis, and an archbishop of Cologne in the eleventh century took the appellation of Christi et Clavigeri ejus servus. But there was for a long time no uniformity; in Hoveden's "Chronicle" may be read a brief of Geoffrey, Archbishop of York, in which there is no reference whatever to the Holy See, while not many pages further on is a series of decrees of Archbishop Hubert, each of which ends with the words "Salvo in omnibus sacrosanctæ Romanæ ecclesiæ honore et privilegio." In some European countries, the sovereigns evincing a desire to appropriate for use in their own proclamations the phrase Dei Gratia, the bishops have used instead the formula divina gratia. In 1209, Otho IV., one of the candidates for the Imperial crown, adopted the style of "Roman Emperor by the grace of God and favour of the Holy Apostolic See."

C

CÆREMONIALE EPISCOPORUM. A book containing the ceremonies to be observed by bishops and other ecclesiastics, in the performance of episcopal acts. An edition "emended and reformed" was published by authority of Clement VIII. In the bull Cum novissime the Pope strictly requires all whom it concerns to follow the prescriptions of this Cæremoniale, and several of the subsequent Popes have renewed and confirmed the same law. ("Manuale Decret. SS. Rit. Congr." n. 94 seq.)

CÆREMONIARIUS. A name given to the ecclesiastic who superintends the ceremonies in solemn offices. In cathedral churches one such master of ceremonies should be chosen by the bishop, another, with the approval of the bishop, by the chapter. In episcopal functions he may wear a violet cassock and hold a ferule in his hand. The dignitaries even of the chapter are bound to obey him during the functions, for he is their director, not their servant. Besides the income which may belong to him as canon, &c., he has a right to the offerings made by clergy and people on Good Friday after the adoration of the cross. ("Manuale Decret. SS. Rit. Congr.")

CÆSARIANS. The adherents of a pious German friar of the order of St. Francis, Cæsar of Spires, were so called. Cæsar was one of those who, when Elias of Cortona, the general of the order after St. Francis, attempted to introduce relaxations of the rule, resisted him; in consequence of which Elias, having deceived the Pope, threw Cæsar into prison. After having been in confinement more than two years, the poor friar, finding one day the door of his dungeon open, went out to warm himself in the sun's rays. His gaoler, a rough unfeeling lay brother, coming in and thinking that Cæsar meditated escape, struck him on the head with a bludgeon with such violence that he died of the effects of the blow. This was in 1239. Under the generals Crescenzio and John of Parma, who in various ways incurred the disapproval of the stricter Franciscans, the party of Cæsar lingered on; but after the glorious St. Bonaventure became general (1256) and the rule and spirit of St. Francis were restored in their first purity, the name of Cæsarians was soon forgotten. (Fleury, "Hist. Eccl." xxxi.)

CAGOTS. The name given to a race of Christian Pariahs who first came into notice in the South of France about the tenth century. The term has been thought to be derived from caas-Goth, dog of a Goth, as if they were a remnant of the Visigoths who occupied Aquitaine till they were expelled by the Franks; but this derivation is quite uncertain. The Cagots were not allowed to live in towns or villages, but in groups of dwellings set apart for them, called cagoteries. Like the Swiss crétins, they were looked down upon as an inferior race; yet this inferiority was not apparent: in physical development and intelligence they seem to have been on a par with their neighbours; their skin, however, was said to emit a peculiar odour, by which they could always be recognised. They were required to go into church by a separate door, to use a special bénitier, and to sit only on benches set apart for them. No trades but those of butcher and carpenter were open to them. They are said still to be numerous in the valleys of the western Pyrenees.

CALATRAVA, ORDER OF. One of the three great military orders of Spain; the other two were the knights of Santiago and those of Alcantara. The Templars in Spain had had immense estates conferred upon them, and corresponding services in the unremitting war against the Moors were expected from them. Calatrava, a town on the upper Guadiana, on the borders of Andalusia and Castile, was a post of great military importance to the sovereigns of the latter country, whether for offensive or defensive purposes. In the twelfth century it was entrusted to the guardianship of the Templars; but these, finding the charge embarrassing, abandoned the place after eight years. Sancho III., King of Castile, desired to find a body of knights who would undertake its defence; and his wishes were soon fully met by the energy and ability of a Spanish Cistercian monk, Velasquez by name, who with the concurrence of his order founded, in 1258, a chivalrous institute, the knights of which were to live under a strict rule and devote themselves to the protection and extension of the Christian kingdom to which they belonged. A knight of Calatrava bound himself to perpetual chastity, and this obligation was only relaxed in the sixteenth century, when permission was granted to the knights to marry once. He was enjoined to have his sword ready to his hand while he slept and also while he prayed. Silence was prescribed at meals; the fare was plain, meat not being allowed more than thrice a week. The chaplains of the order were at first allowed to take the field in expeditions against the Moors; but this was afterwards forbidden. In 1197 Calatrava was taken by the Moslems, and the knights retired to Salvatierra, in the north of Spain, and took the name of that city till their former home was recovered. The order soon became very rich, and the extensive influence and patronage which its wealth placed in the hands of the grand-masters caused the office to be eagerly sought by ambitious men. Such violent quarrels and animosities arose from this cause (which was similarly operative in the case of the other military orders) that Ferdinand and Isabella in the fifteenth century wisely procured the Papal sanction to the annexation of the grand-mastership of all three orders to the crown of Castile. In the general suppression of the monastic orders which the present century has witnessed in Spain, the knights of Calatrava have lost all their property, but as a source of honorary distinction the order still survives. CALENDAR, ECCLESIASTICAL. An arrangement, founded on the Julian-Gregorian determinations of the civil year, marking the days set apart for particular religious celebration.

The Diocletian persecution made havoc among Christian records and writings of every kind, and for this reason but few calendars of great antiquity have been preserved. One of the earliest, dated about 350, is little more than a list of holy days; it places Christmas Day on December 25, and the Feast of St. Peter's Chair on February 22. In a calendar prefixed to the "Responsoriale" of Gregory the Great, there is no mention of the Circumcision, nor of Ash Wednesday, but in other respects it closely resembles the present Roman Calendar. The various scientific and historical questions involved in the determination of Easter attracted the earnest attention of the Church from an early period. The Venerable Beda wrote an elaborate work "De Computo;" he is also thought by many to have been the real author of the essay on the true calculation of Easter, given in the form of a letter of the Abbot Ceolfrid to Naiton, King of the Picts, which he has inserted in the fifth book of his "Ecclesiastical History." A treatise "De Computo" is also among the works of Rabanus Maurus, the great Archbishop of Mayence, in the early part of the ninth century. It was ordered by the Council of Orleans (541) that bishops should every year announce the date of Easter on the festival of the Epiphany.

Since Easter varies every year, the liturgical arrangements of the Church, which depend on Easter, must vary in like manner; and the calendar, which notifies those arrangements, can only be good for the year to which it refers. From the first Sunday after Epiphany to Advent Sunday—that is, from about the middle of January to the end of November—there is not a single Sunday of which the ritual observance is not liable to variation from year to year, according to the varying date of Easter. The calendar which announces the actual course of the liturgy for every day of the year, may be called the liturgical calendar. It takes into account the relative importance of the celebrations which come into competition on the same day, in accordance with canon law and the decrees of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, and shows which celebration is to prevail and be had in use. A glance at this calendar will show that many saints are transferred in it, as to the celebration of their festivals, and that Masses in their honour cannot be said on their own proper days; but a little further search will generally show that the festival has only been transferred a few days later—that is, to the first vacant day. Owing to the different dignity of feast (see DOUBLE, SEMI-DOUBLE, FEASTS), their priority, and the extent to which they may be transferred are often difficult matters to decide. In general outline this liturgical calendar is the same for the whole Church: the feasts of our Lord and of his Blessed Mother are observed by all Catholics on the same days; so also are the principal feasts of the Apostles, and of some of the more eminent martyrs and saints. But special circumstances, arising out of the history of each Christian nation, affect its liturgical calendar to a certain extent; St. Patrick's day, which is a holiday of obligation in Ireland, is not so in England; and the octave assigned to the feast of St. Edward, king and confessor, in the province of Westminster, is not observed in Ireland. Many other modifications more or less important might be mentioned, in virtue of which not only each Christian nation, but every religious order, every ecclesiastical province, every diocese—one might almost say every city, at least in a Catholic land, for the "fête patronale" of Cambray is not that of Douay, and each causes a slight disturbance of the general Ordo in its own favour—may be said to have a liturgical calendar of its own.

In the common ecclesiastical calendar prefixed to Catholic directories, the "Proprium de Tempore" (that is, the arrangement of feasts and offices, most of which depend on Easter, from Advent to Pentecost) is given in the liturgical directory, but the feasts of saints are assigned to their fixed days.

Still more general is that description of ecclesiastical calendar in which the "Proprium de Tempore" is omitted, and only the fixed festivals retained. This, if we exclude from it the festivals of our Lord and the Blessed Virgin, is little more than a calendar of saints' days, and would tend to pass into a Martyrology. The "Acta Sanctorum" of the Bollandists may be regarded as a colossal calendar of saints, arranged according to the successive occurrence of their festivals in the civil year, and enriched with biographies and collateral information. A Greek Menology is something between a calendar and a Martyrology.

CALENDAR, JULIAN-GREGORIAN, THE. Julius Cæsar, in the year 708 of the city, caused the civil calendar, which had fallen into confusion, to be reformed by dividing the year into twelve months, each with the same number of days as at present, and providing that an additional day should be given to February in every fourth year, in order that the natural year, which was believed to be 365 days 6 hours in length, might keep even pace with the legal year. But as the real excess of the time taken in the solar revolution over 365 days does not amount to six hours, but only to five hours and forty-nine minutes (nearly), it was an inevitable consequence of the disregard of this fact that the addition of nearly forty-four minutes too much every leap-year should again in course of time make the natural and civil years disagree. The accumulated error caused the difference of a day in about 134 years; thus the vernal equinox, which in the year of the Council of Nicæa (325) fell, as it ought to fall, on March 21, in 1582 occurred ten days earlier. But since Easter ought to be kept on the Sunday after the first full-moon following the vernal equinox, it is obvious that, with so serious a difference between the real equinox and the equinox of the Calendar, Easter might easily be kept a month too late; the Paschal full-moon might have occurred on some day between March 11 (the date of the real equinox) and March 21, but be disregarded in favour of the next full-moon, which fell after the equinox of the calendar. Gregory XIII., consulting with men of science, effectually remedied the evil, and provided against its recurrence. He ordered that the days between October 4 and October 15 in the current year (1582) should be suppressed, and that, beginning with 1700, three out of every four centesimal leap-years—1700, 1800, 1900, but not 2000—should be omitted, so that those years should have only 365, not 366 days. This change, having originated at Rome, was long resisted in Protestant countries. In England it was only adopted in 1751, by which time the accumulated error amounted to eleven days; these days were suppressed between September 2 and 14, 1752. In Russia the Julian Calendar is still adhered to, with the result that their computation of time is now twelve days in arrear of the rest of Europe.

CALIXTINES. A section of the followers of John Huss, who were so called because they demanded the cup or chalice (calix)—that is, Holy Communion under the form of wine as well as under the form of bread. They were also called Utraquists (sub utraque specie). [See HUSSITES; COMMUNION (6).]

CALVARIANS. On the steep commanding hill known as Mont Valérien, looking down upon the Bois de Boulogne and famous in connection with many remarkable incidents in the siege of Paris some years ago, a priest of the diocese of Auch established, about 1635, an institute to which he gave the name of Calvary. The name of the priest was Hubert Charpentier, and the object of the association of priests which he founded was to honour the Passion of Jesus Christ and labour for the promotion of Catholicism in Béarn, where the Protestants were then working with considerable success. It would appear that this institute of Calvarians disappeared during the Revolution.

A congregation of Calvarian nuns, founded at Poitiers in 1617 by the Père Joseph, a Capuchin and intimate friend of Cardinal Richelieu, aided by the high-born Antoinette d'Orléans, still flourishes in France.

There is also a congregation of Calvarian sisters, established by Virginia Braccelli at Genoa in 1619 for the purpose of supporting and educating destitute and homeless girls, which has received many favours from successive Popes.

CALVIN AND CALVINISM. Calvin was born in 1509 at Noyon in Picardy. His father (Chauvin), who was an episcopal fiscal-procurator, secured a good education for his son in the noble family of Montmor. Young Calvin was provided with a benefice, though he never received more than the tonsure, and went to study theology at Paris. There, however, the influence of Olivetan and Farel won him over to the heresy of the Reformers; he gave up all idea of the priesthood, and went to study law at Bourges. The change which had begun at Paris was made complete. The Lutheran Wolmar persuaded him to give up the law and to devote himself entirely to theology. Later, when it was no longer safe for him to remain in France, he fled to Basle, went afterwards to Ferrara, and finally settled at Geneva in 1536, as professor of theology and preacher. However, in 1538, he was driven from the town, and remained for three years at Strasburg, where he married and formed intimate connections with the German Reformers. In 1541 he was recalled to Geneva, and here he organised his Consistory, through which till his death, in 1564, he exercised an absolute power in temporal as well as in spiritual matters. Calvin brooked no contradiction. Castellio had to leave Geneva for attacking the doctrine of predestination, and the Spaniard Michael Servetus (Servede), who attacked the doctrine of the Trinity, was burnt alive, an auto-da-fè which was approved by Melanchthon and Bucer.

As to Calvin's extraordinary talents, there can be no doubt. Both in Latin and French, his writings are a model of clear, concise, nervous language; he had great stores of varied learning at his command; his commentaries on Scripture still hold a very high place in the esteem of Protestant scholars, and his subtlety and power of reasoning fitted him to become the great theologian of the Reformed sects. With a vast section of Protestants in Switzerland, Holland, England, Scotland, &c., his Institutes (Institutio Religionis Christianæ) possessed almost unlimited authority, and were esteemed as the greatest work which had appeared since the days of the Apostles. It is this book which contains the methodical exposition of his doctrinal system. It affords abundant proof, not only of Calvin's exalted talents, but also of the gulf which separated him from the tradition of the Church. Its peculiar doctrines have long since lost their hold on Protestants of the better sort, and his system outrages the principles of natural as well as of revealed religion. It is important, however, to remember what the system was which so many found purer and more attractive than that of the Church.

According to Calvin, God ordains some to everlasting life, others to everlasting punishment. God does not choose the elect for any good He sees in them, or which He sees they will do; nor does He select some for eternal reprobation because of their evil deeds foreseen by Him. Indeed, as the whole nature of fallen man, in Calvin's view, is "utterly devoid of goodness; is a seed-bed of sin," which "cannot but be odious and abominable to God;" as man has no free-will, and as God's grace is absolutely irresistible; it follows that there can be no question of merits foreseen, on account of which God chooses the elect, or of demerits, because of which the reprobate are rejected. Calvin's words are explicit on this point. "If," he writes, "we cannot assign any reason for His [God's] bestowing mercy on His people, but just that it pleases Him, neither can He have any reason for reprobating others but His will."[1] Here of course Calvinist heresy is in sharp antagonism to Catholic doctrine, according to which God by His eternal decree condemns none, except for their sins foreseen by Him and of course freely committed.

As to the means by which the elect actually enter into a state of salvation Calvin was at one with the rest of the Reformers. He taught that justification is effected by faith and by faith alone. Calvin's doctrine on the sacraments—of which he only recognised Baptism and the Eucharist—stands midway between that of Luther and Zwingli. He considered the doctrine of the latter (which made the sacraments mere signs of Christian profession, tokens by which a man is known as such among his fellow-Christians) to be erroneous and even profane. He speaks of the sacraments as mystical signs instituted by God, who through them, not only reminds men of past benefits, but also renews these benefits, seals His promises, strengthens and increases the faith of the recipient by the operation of the Holy Ghost. Thus to Calvin the sacraments were not bare signs, but real channels of grace. But it was to the elect only that they conveyed this grace. To others they were bare and inoperative symbols.[2]

The Calvinistic worship was much more bare and simple than the Lutheran, and the constitution of the Calvinistic sects was rigidly Presbyterian. But Calvin had higher notions of Church freedom and independence than Luther. He maintained that the Church was altogether independent of the State, and the government which he established at Geneva was theocratic in its character. The influence, however, of Calvin's doctrine was not confined to sects with Presbyterian constitution. His Institutio represented the dominant theology in the Anglican Church down to the time of Laud.

of Camaldoli was founded by St. Romuald in 1012 on a small plain among the Apennines bearing that name, about thirty miles east of Florence. He had previously been abbot of several Benedictine monasteries, the monks of which, unable to bear the rigorous penitential life which he wished them to practise, had all after a time expelled him. The foundation of 1012 has always been known as the Hermitage of Camaldoli. Romuald built separate cells for his disciples, most of whom had to repair to the chapel at the canonical hours, but there was a class among them called recluses who were exempted from this obligation. He gave a white habit to his hermits, whom he obliged to fast during two Lents in the year, and to abstain perpetually from meat; moreover, during the rest of the year they had to fast on bread and water on three days in the week. After some time a monastery was built at the foot of the mountains, at a place called Fontebuono, and peopled by monks under a prior; these, however, wore the same habit as the hermits, and were bound to the same rule of life. Alban Butler, who seems to have visited Camaldoli about the middle of the last century, thus writes of it.[1] "The hermitage is two short miles distant from the monastery [Fontebuono]. It is a mountain quite overshaded by a dark wood of fir-trees. In it are seven clear springs of water. The very sight of this solitude in the midst of the forest helps to fill the mind with compunction, and a love of heavenly contemplation. On entering it we meet with a chapel of St. Antony for travellers to pray in before they advance any further. Next are the cells and lodgings for the porters. Somewhat further is the church, which is large, well built, and richly adorned. Over the door is a clock which strikes so loud that it may be heard all over the desert. On the left side of the church is the cell in which St. Romuald lived, when he first established these hermits. . . . The whole hermitage is now enclosed with a wall; none are allowed to go out of it; but they may walk in the woods and alleys within the inclosure at discretion. Everything is sent them from the monastery in the valley; their food is every day brought to each cell, and all are supplied with wood and necessaries, that they may have no dissipation or hindrance in their contemplation. . . . No rain or snow stops anyone from meeting in the church to assist at the divine office. They are obliged to strict silence in all public common places, and everywhere during their Lents, also on Sundays, holy days, Fridays, and other days of abstinence, and always from compline till prime the next day."

[1] Lives of the Saints, Feb. 7.

The order became very wealthy, and many of its hermitages were after a time changed into monasteries. It was agreed that the general of the order, who was also ex officio prior of Camaldoli, should be taken from among the hermits and the monks. Rudolph, the fourth general, drew up, in 1102, the first written constitutions of the order, in which he slightly mitigated the severity of the original rule. In process of time the order was separated into five provinces or congregations: that of Camaldoli, or the Holy Hermitage; that of St. Michael at Murano, near Venice; that of the hermits of Monte Corona near Perugia, a reformation founded by Paul Giustiniani early in the sixteenth century; that of Turin; and that of France.

The Camaldolesi, if the vandalism of the present Government of Italy has not yet destroyed their monasteries, have still a famous house near Rome, besides several in other parts of Italy. Pope Gregory XVI. belonged to this order. (Hélyot.)

CANDLES and LIGHTS. St Luke, in Acts xx. 7, mentions the "great number of lamps" which burnt in "the upper chamber," while St. Paul "continued his speech until midnight." The fact that Christian assemblies during the times of persecution were held before dawn made a similar employment of lights necessary, but we may well believe that the Christians, familiar as they were with the symbolical meaning of the candlestick in the tabernacle and temple, also attached a symbolical significance to the lights which they burned during the holy mysteries. This conjecture is confirmed by the fact that the Church of the fourth century still continued the religious use of lights when they were no longer needed to dispel the darkness. "Throughout the churches of the East," says Jerome, writing against Vigilantius, "lights are kindled when the gospel is to be read, although the sun is shining: not, indeed, to drive away the darkness but as a sign of spiritual joy." So Paulinus of Nola speaks of "altars crowned with a forest of lights," and similar language might be quoted from Prudentius. The use of lights at Mass is mentioned in all the Oriental liturgies.

With regard to the West, a very ancient African canon makes mention of the candle handed to the acolyte at his ordination;[1] while the mediæval author of the "Micrologus" says: "According to the Roman order we never celebrate Mass without lights . . . . using them as a type of that light . . . . without which even in mid-day we grope as in the night." Nor was the use of lights confined to Mass. St. Gregory Nazianzen speaks of the lights borne by the neophytes at baptism, "emblems," he says, "of those lamps of faith with which radiant souls shall hasten forth to meet the bridegroom;" and our custom of carrying lights at funerals can be traced back to the fourth century.

The present custom of the Church requires that candles should be lighted on the altar from the beginning to the end of Mass, nor can lighted candles be dispensed with on any consideration. A parish priest, for instance, must not say Mass for his flock, even on a Sunday, unless candles can be procured. The candles must be of pure wax and of white colour, except in Masses for the dead, when the S. Cong. Rit. prescribes candles "de communi cera"—i.e. of yellow wax. Two, and not more than two, may be lighted at a priest's low Mass, unless the Mass be said for the parish, or for a convent, or on one of the greater solemnities, when four candles may be used.[2] Six candles are lighted at High Mass, seven at the Mass of a Bishop. Twelve candles at least should be lighted at Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, or six if Benediction is given with the pyx.[3] Candles must also be lighted when Communion is given, whether in the church or in private houses; and one lighted candle is required in the administration of Extreme Unction. (See Rock, "Hierurgia," On the Use of Lights.)

CANON (member of a chapter). The clergy of every large church in ancient times were termed canonici, as being entered on the list (for this is one of the meanings of κανών) of ecclesiastics serving the church. A more definite meaning was attached to the word in consequence of the labours of Chrodegang, Bishop of Metz, in the eighth century, to revive a stricter discipline among his clergy, and give scope for the exhibition among them of shining examples of virtuous living. He formed the clergy of his cathedral into a community, bound by a rule (κανών in the common sense, under which they lived in common, on the proceeds of an undivided property, and recited the divine office in choir with the same regularity as monks. Many other cathedrals and large churches, thence named collegiate, organised themselves in the same way. In the course of ages, the obligation of living in common was abandoned, and the common property was divided into portions or prebends [PREBEND], one for each canon; yet still the clergy of each cathedral formed a united body [see CHAPTER] which the Council of Trent calls an "ecclesiastical senate,"[1] declaring that those who were called to fill places in it ought—inasmuch as cathedral dignities were originally instituted in order to preserve and increase discipline, supply society with examples of pious life, and assist the bishops—to be chosen with extreme care and circumspection. In some cathedrals the community life instituted by Chrodegang was retained, and other separate institutions similarly ordered arose [see AUGUSTINIAN CANONS; PREMONSTRATENSIANS]. The secular canons, with whom we are at present concerned, having the administration of large properties, and holding in cathedrals, relatively to bishops, a position which might be one of willing subordination, yet might easily become one of antagonism, form the subject of numerous chapters of the canon law. A canonry is defined as a spiritual right—arising out of election or reception into the chapter—first, to a stall in choir and a voice in chapter; next, to a prebend or competent portion of the chapter revenues, on the earliest possible opportunity. Till the acquisition of a prebend, the holder of a canonry is a minor canon (canonicus minor); after it, a major or full canon. The Council of Trent (loc. cit.) ordered that no one should be appointed to a canonry with cure of souls attached, under twenty-four years of age. When there is no cure of souls, a person may receive a canonry in a collegiate church at as low an age as fourteen; in a cathedral where the prebends are distributed among canons with different orders, the recipient of a subdiaconal canonry must be twenty-one; of a diaconal, twenty-two; of a sacerdotal, twenty-four years of age. In a cathedral where the canonries are not distributed, he must be at least twenty-two. The Council ordered that all cathedral canons should possess a grade of orders not lower than the subdiaconate, and recommended that at least half of them should be in priest's orders; it also obliged them to reside not less than nine months in the year. With regard to their duties, it says:—"Let all be bound to attend the divine offices in person and not by substitutes, and to assist and serve the bishop when celebrating Mass, or pontificating in any other manner, and to praise the name of God reverently, distinctly, and devoutly in hymns and canticles in the choir appointed for psalmody."

Chapters were established in England at the restoration of the Hierarchy (1850); but, as there are no revenues attached to them, the canons are exempt from residence and attendance at the divine offices in the cathedral. They are bound, however, to be present once a month.

CANON LAW. From the earliest times the determinations of the Church received the name of Canons—that is, rules directory in matters of faith and conduct. Thus we read of the Apostolic Canons, the Canons of the Council of Nice, or of Chalcedon, &c. A tendency afterwards appeared to restrict the term Canon to matters of discipline, and to give the name of dogma to decisions bearing on faith. But the Council of Trent confirmed the ancient use of the word, calling its determinations "canons," whether they bore on points of belief or were directed to the reformation of discipline.

Canon Law is the assemblage of rules or laws relating to faith, morals, and discipline, prescribed or propounded to Christians by ecclesiastical authority. The words "or laws" are added to the definition, lest it be thought that these rules are only matters of publication and persuasion, and not binding laws, liable to be enforced by penalties. The definition shows that the object of canon law is "faith, morals, and discipline;" and nothing but these is its object. "To Christians"—that is, baptised persons are the subject of canon law; and that without reference to the question whether they are or are not obedient to the Church and within her pale. For theologians teach that the character imprinted by baptism on the soul is ineffaceable; and in virtue of this character the baptised are Christ's soldiers, and subject of right to those whom He appointed to rule in His fold. The unbaptised (Turks, Pagans, &c.), speaking generally, are not the subjects of canon law. Yet it must not be supposed that the Church has no rights and no duties in regard to such persons; by the commission of Christ she has the right of visiting, teaching, and then baptising them ("euntes docete omnes gentes, baptizando," &c.). "Propounded"—for some of these rules belong to the natural or to the divine law, and as such are not originally imposed by the Church, but proposed and explained by her. "By ecclesiastical authority"—hence canon law is distinguished from systems of law imposed by the civil authority of States, as being prescribed by the power with which Jesus Christ endowed the Church which He founded ("qui vos audit, me audit; pasce oves meas," &c.).

Before we proceed to give a brief sketch of the history of canon law, to notice its parts, ascertain its sources, and describe its principal collections, a preliminary objection, striking at the root of its authority, and almost at its existence, must be examined. It is, that the consent of the civil power in any country is necessary to give validity to the determinations of the canon law in that country. This is the doctrine of the "placitum regium," or "royal assent;" it implies, whatever may be the form of the government, that State authorisation is necessary before it can become the duty of a Christian to obey the ecclesiastical authority. On this Cardinal Soglia writes as follows:—"If we inquire into the origin of the 'placitum,' we shall find it in the terrible and prolonged schism which lasted from the election of Urban VI. to the Council of Constance. For Urban, lest the schism should give occasion to an improper use of Papal authority, granted to certain prelates that there should be no execution of any apostolic letters in their cities and dioceses, unless such letters were first shown to and approved by those prelates, or their officials. The rulers of European States also began carefully to examine all bulls and constitutions, in order that their subjects might not be deceived by pseudo-pontiffs. But these measures, it is evident, were of a precautionary and temporary character. However, when the cause ceased, the effect did not also cease; on the extinction of the schism, the Placitum did not disappear, but was retained by the civil power in many countries, and gradually extended. At first, says Oliva, the Placitum was applied to Papal rescripts of grace and justice given to individuals; afterwards it was extended to decrees of discipline, and in the end even to dogmatic bulls." The Cardinal explains in what sense the celebrated canonist Van Espen, who was prone unduly to magnify the civil power, understood the application of the Placitum to dogmatic rescripts, and proceeds:—"It is evident that this theory" (of possible danger or inconvenience to the State if Papal bulls were published without restraint) "arose out of the suggestions of statesmen and politicians, who, as Zallwein says, out of a wish to flatter and please the princes whom they serve, and to enlarge their own and their masters' jurisdiction, as well as out of the hatred of the ecclesiastical power by which they are often animated, invent all kinds of dangers, harms, and losses, by which they pretend the public welfare is threatened, and artfully bring these views under the notice of their masters. . . . 'If,' proceeds the same Zallwein, 'the ecclesiastical sovereigns whom Christ hath set to rule over the Church of God, were to urge their "placitum" also, whenever political edicts are issued which, as often happens, are prejudicial to the ecclesiastical state, hostile to ecclesiastical liberties, opposed to the jurisdiction of the Pontiff and bishops, and aggressive against the very holy of holies, what would the civil rulers say?' Following up the argument, Govart says, 'If a prince could not be said to have full power and jurisdiction in temporals, were his edicts to depend on the "placitum" of the Pope and bishops, and could their publication be hindered by others; so neither would the Pope have full power in spirituals, if his constitutions depended on the "placitum" of princes, and could be suppressed by them. Wherefore, if, in the former case, whoever should maintain the affirmative might justly be said to impugn the authority of the prince, so and a fortiori in the second case must the supporter of such an opinion be said to undermine with sinister intention the Papal authority, or rather to destroy it altogether.' The sum of the argument is, that 'by the "placitum regium" the liberty of the ecclesiastical "magisterium" and government divinely entrusted to the Church is seriously impaired, the independence of the divinely appointed primacy destroyed, and the mutual intercourse between the head and the members intercepted. Therefore, if the Church, to guard against still greater evils, endures and puts up with the "placitum," she never consents to or approves of it.'"

From the point of view of the interest of the laity, and the Christian people generally, it is obvious that the lovers of true liberty must disapprove of the "placitum." It is impossible that the Church, or the Roman Pontiff as the mouth-piece of the Church, should issue any decree or have any interest inimical to the welfare of the general Christian population in any State. Any obstacles, therefore, which governments may interpose to the free publication and execution of ecclesiastical rescripts cannot arise from solicitude for the public welfare. Whence, then, do they arise, or have they arisen? Evidently from the arbitrary temper of kings, the jealousies of nobles, and the desire of bureaucrats to extend their power. These two latter classes, at least all but the noblest individuals among them, are usually predisposed to hamper the action of the Church and the clergy, lest their own social influence should be diminished relatively to that of the latter. This is no interest which deserves to engage popular sympathies, but rather the contrary.

Historical.—Jurisdiction is implied in the terms of the commission of binding and loosing which Christ gave to the Apostles, and especially to Peter. While Christians were few and apostles and others who had "seen the Lord" were still alive, the apostolic authority could be exercised with little help from written documents or rigid rules. As these early conditions passed away, the necessity of a system of law, in order to ensure uniformity, equity, and perspicuity in the exercise of the Church's jurisdiction, could not but become increasingly manifest. After the Apostles had passed away, having devolved upon the bishops all of their authority which was not limited to them in their apostolic character, each bishop became a centre of jurisdiction. In deciding any cases that might be brought before him, he had three things to guide him—Scripture, tradition, and the "holy canons"—that is, the disciplinary rules which Church synods, beginning with the Council of Jerusalem, had established. Many of these primitive canons are still preserved for us in the collection known as the Apostolical Canons [see that article], although, taken as a whole, they are of no authority. Till Christianity conquered the imperial throne, questions of jurisdiction and law did not come into prominence; after Constantine the case was very different. The Council of Nice, besides its dogmatic utterances, framed a quantity of canons for the regulation of Church discipline, which, along with those of Sardica, were soon translated into Latin, and widely circulated in the West. An important step towards codification and uniformity of procedure was taken at the end of the fifth or early in the sixth century, when Dionysius Exiguus, under the direction of Popes Anastasius and Symmachus, made a large compilation of canons for the use of the Latin Church. In this he included fifty of the Apostolic canons, translated from the Greek, considering the rest to be of doubtful authority; the canons of Chalcedon, with those of which that council had made use; the canons of Sardica, and a large number promulgated by African councils; lastly, the decretal letters of the Popes from Siricius to Anastasius II. The next collection is that supposed to have been made by St. Isidore of Seville, early in the seventh century. About A.D. 850, a collection of canons and decretals appeared, seemingly at Mayence, which were ostensibly the compilation of Isidore of Seville. In an age of great ignorance, when criticism was neither in favour nor provided with means, it is not wonderful that this collection, which invested with the spurious authority of recorded decisions a system of things existing traditionally, indeed, but liable to constant opposition, passed speedily into general recognition and acceptance. Six centuries passed before it was discovered that these pseudo-Isidorian or False Decretals, as they are now called, were to a great extent a forgery. [False Decretals.] Nevertheless, as Cardinal Soglia remarks, the collection contains in it nothing contrary to faith or sound morals; otherwise its long reception would have been impossible; nor does the discipline which it enjoins depend for its authority upon this collection, but either upon constitutions of earlier and later date, or upon custom, "quæ in rebus disciplinaribus multum valet."

Many collections of canons were made and used in national churches between the date of Dionysius Exiguus and that of the author of the "Decretum." In Africa there was the Codex Africanus (547) and the "Concordantia Canonum" of Bishop Cresconius (697); in Spain the chapters of Martin, bishop of Braga (572), besides the work of Isidore of Seville already mentioned; in France, a Codex Canonum, besides the capitularies of the Merovingian and Carlovingian kings. [Capitulary.] Passing over these, we come to the celebrated compilation by Gratian, a Benedictine monk (1151), which the compiler, whose main purpose was to reconcile the inconsistencies among canons of different age and authorship bearing on the same subject, entitled "Concordantia discordantium Canonum," but which is generally known as the "Decretum of Gratian." Having brought our historical sketch to the point where ecclesiastical law, no longer perplexed by the multiplicity of canons of various date and place and more or less limited application, begins to provide herself with a general code—a "corpus juris"—applicable to the whole Catholic world, we drop the historical method and turn to the remaining heads of the inquiry.

Canon law consists of precepts of different kinds. Hence it is divided into four parts—precepts of the natural law, positive divine precepts, directions left by the Apostles, and ecclesiastical constitutions. Upon each of these Cardinal Soglia discourses solidly and lucidly in the second chapter of his Prolegomena.

With regard to the sources whence these precepts flow, they might, strictly speaking, be reduced to three—God, who impresses the natural law upon the conscience, and reveals the truths which men are to believe; the Apostles; and the Supreme Pontiffs, either alone or in conjunction with the bishops in general councils. Canonists, however, find it more convenient to define the sources of canon law in the following manner: 1. Holy Scripture; 2. Ecclesiastical tradition; 3. The decrees of councils; 4. Papal constitutions and rescripts; 5. The writings of the Fathers; 6. The civil law. On this last head Soglia remarks that "many things relating to the external polity of the Church have been borrowed from the imperial enactments of Rome, and incorporated in the canon law."

The Collections of canon law, considering it as a system in present force and obligation, commence with the "Decretum of Gratian" already mentioned. This great work is divided into three parts. The first part, in 101 "Distinctions," treats of ecclesiastical law, its origin, principles, and authority, and then of the different ranks and duties of the clergy. The second part, in thirty-six "Causes," treats of ecclesiastical courts, and their forms of procedure. The third part, usually called "De Consecratione," treats of things and rites employed in the service of religion. From its first appearance the Decretum obtained a wide popularity, but it was soon discovered that it contained numerous errors, which were corrected under the directions of successive Popes down to Gregory XIII. Nor, although every subsquent generation has resorted to its pages, is the Decretum an authority to this day—that is, whatever canons or maxims of law are found in it possess only that degree of legality which they would possess if they existed separately; their being in the Decretum gives them no binding force. In the century after Gratian several supplementary collections of Decretals appeared. These, with many of his own, were collected by the orders of Gregory IX.—who employed in the work the extraordinary learning and acumen of St. Raymond of Pennafort—into five books, known as the Decretals of Gregory IX. These are in the fullest sense authoritative, having been deliberately ratified and published by that Pope (1234). The Sext, or sixth book of the Decretals, was added by Boniface VIII. (1289). The Clementines are named after Clement V., who compiled them out of the canons of the Council of Vienne (1316) and some of his own constitutions. The Extravagantes of John XXII., who succeeded Clement V., and the Extravagantes Communes, containing the Decretals of twenty-five Popes ending with Sixtus IV. (1484), complete the list. Of these five collections—namely, the Decretals, the Sext, the Clementines, the Extravagants of John XXII., and the Extravagants Common—the "Corpus Juris Ecclesiastici" is made up.

To these a very important addition has to be made in "Jus novissimum"—modern law. Under this head are comprised the canons of general councils since that of Vienne, contained in great compilations such as those of Labbe and Harduin, and the Decretal Letters of Popes, published in the form of Bullaria, and coming down (in the case of the great Turin Bullarium of 1857) to the pontificate of Pius IX. The decisions of Roman congregations and of the tribunal of the Rota [ROTA] also form part of this modern law. The rules of the Roman Chancery, first formulated by John XXII. and now numbering seventy-two, are everywhere of authority, provided that they do not conflict with a contrary law, a clause in a Concordat, or a legitimate custom. Lastly, the Concordats, or treaties entered into by the Holy See with various countries for the regulation of ecclesiastical affairs, constitute special systems of law for those countries. [CONCORDAT.]

In England, as in other European countries, the canon and civil law were studied together before the Reformation, and formed a code, applicable not only to spiritual suits but to the large class of mixed cases, which was enforced in the Church courts. Provincial constitutions were passed from time to time by different archbishops of Canterbury, but from their increasing number and the want of a methodical arrangement, many of them were gradually forgotten or neglected. A great service, therefore, was rendered to the English Church of his day by William Lyndewode, chaplain to Archbishop Chicheley and official of the Court of Arches, who collected and arranged (about 1425), under the title of "Provinciale," the constitutions of fourteen archbishops of Canterbury, from Stephen Langton to Chicheley, classifying them according to their subjects in five books, in imitation of the Decretals of Gregory IX. To this collection the constitutions of the legates Otho (1237) and Othobon (1262) were subsequently appended. These English constitutions, and canon law generally (except so far as modified by the statutes and canons which consummated the Anglican schism, and raised the reigning sovereign—being an Anglican Protestant, 1702—to the headship of the national church), are still recognised as authoritative in Anglican ecclesiastical courts.

CANON OF THE MASS. That part of the Mass which begins after the "Sanctus" with the prayer "Te igitur," and ends, according to some, just before the "Pater noster," according to others, with the consumption of the Sacred Species. The name Canon is given to this part of the Mass because it contains the fixed rule according to which the Sacrifice of the New Testament is to be offered. Other names are given to it by early writers. Thus St. Gregory calls it "the prayer;" Vigilius, "the text of the canonical prayer;" Walafrid and others, "the action," the last of these names being still used in the Missal, as well as the word Canon. The Canon consists, according to the Council of Trent, "of our Lord's very words, and of prayers received from apostolical tradition or piously ordained by holy Pontiffs."[1] That the Canon of the Roman Mass comes in its substance from very ancient times is clearly shown, (1) by the fact that Pope Vigilius, in the sixth century, attributes it to the tradition of the Apostles; (2) because the words of consecration, with those which immediately precede them, do not exactly correspond to the Scriptural narrative, and seem to represent an independent apostolical tradition; (3) because the list of saints mentioned consists merely of Apostles and martyrs, a mark that the Canon is earlier than the fourth century, coming from an age before the cultus of confessors had been introduced in addition to the earlier cultus of martyrs.

The words "a holy sacrifice, a spotless victim," were added by St. Leo the Great. Pope St. Gregory the Great added the words "and dispose our days in thy peace, and bid us be saved from eternal damnation, and to be numbered in the flock of thy elect." Since Gregory's time no change has been made in the Canon. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss." 11, 12.)

CANON OF THE SCRIPTURE. The word canon (κανών) signifies a rod, and then specially a measuring-rule. It was used by a natural metaphor for a rule in ethics, art, &c., and by the Alexandrian writers it was applied to the standard or classical authors who furnished the model or rule of correct writing. In Gal. vi. 16, 2 Cor. x. 13–16, the word bears the general sense (1) of a rule by which Christians should walk; (2) of a measure of attainments assigned or permitted to an individual.

As applied to Scripture, the original sense of the word is hard to determine. We first find the derivatives of Canon used with regard to the Bible. Thus Origen speaks of "canonical scriptures," "canonised books." The actual word canon, according to Credner,[2] first occurs after the middle of the fourth century.[1] It may, as Credner thinks, have been given to the list of Scriptural books because they were a rule for the faith, or, again, as Dr. Westcott argues with great show of reason, it may mean that these books were "admitted by the rule" of the Church. In other words, the canon of Scripture may have an active or a passive sense.

The object of this article is to sketch the history of the canon or list of sacred books, among Jews and Christians, and then to explain Catholic as contrasted with heretical principles on this matter.

I. The Canon of the Old Testament.—For the sake of clearness we begin with the list of Old Testament books as given by the Council of Trent, "lest any doubt might arise concerning those that are approved of" as inspired Scripture. They are the following:—Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Josue, Judges, Ruth, four books of Kings (the first two being also known as 1 and 2 Samuel), 1 and 2 Paralipomenon (or Chronicles), 1 and 2 Esdras (the second being otherwise called Nehemias), Tobias, Judith, Esther, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Isaias, Jeremias with Baruch, Ezechiel, Daniel, the twelve minor prophets, 1 and 2 Machabees. The books marked in italics are generally known among Catholic critics as deutero-canonical,[2] not because their authority is at all inferior to that of the other Scriptures, but because their place in the canon was established after that of the other books. We shall call them henceforth, then, by this name. Their inspiration is denied by the Protestant churches, and the charge of having added apocryphal books to the Bible is often brought against the Church. Hence special attention must be paid to the history of their reception among Jews and Christians. We may now proceed to consider the history of the canon of the Old Testament.

(a) Among the Jews.

This part of the subject is wrapped in

[1] Sess. xxii. cap. 4, De Sacrific. Miss.

[2] Geschichte des N. T. Kanon, Volkmar's ed. 1863, p. 103.

[1] It occurs, indeed, in Origen, but only in the Latin version.

[2] If we look at the reception of the Old Testament books among Christians, Esther should be reckoned as deutero-canonical, for in the time of St. Athanasius, and even as late as the sixth century, its canonicity was still an open question in the Church. As, however, it was probably always received by the Jews (see the introduction to Keil's Commentary on Esther), and has been generally acknowledged by the Protestant Churches, it is counted here as proto-canonical.

great obscurity. At present, indeed, the Jews accept only such books as actually exist in Hebrew and Chaldee, and are bound up in the modern Hebrew Bibles, to the exclusion of all the deutero-canonical books. It has often been asserted that this canon, as at present recognised by them, was fixed probably by Esdras, and in any case long before our Lord's time; that it was recognised by Him and by His apostles, so that Catholics in maintaining the authority of the deutero-canonical books are guilty of innovation. We shall see that each one of these statements is contrary to fact.

The Jewish collection seems to have begun with the five books of Moses. They were placed "in the side of the ark of the covenant."[1] A collection of Solomon's proverbs copied out by the men of Ezechias is mentioned in Proverbs xxv. 1. Daniel ix. 2 mentions "the books" (not "books" as in the Douay translation) in which he observed the seventy years of desolation prophesied by Jeremias. Daniel may refer here to some collection of prophetic writings already made; and Zacharias vii. 12 puts the "former prophets" in juxtaposition with the law. With regard to the popular opinion that Esdras collected the sacred books and closed the Jewish canon, it is to be observed that this supposed fact rests upon the authority of a chapter in the Mishna (viz. Pirke Avoth), and that the tradition is admitted by all modern scholars to contain fabulous details. It may contain this element of truth, that Esdras did collect the Scriptural books written up to his day, but as to closing the Scriptural canon, nothing like historical proof can be adduced for it, and it is itself utterly improbable. "We do not even know," writes a learned Protestant, "whether Esdras died before or after the last prophet. But how could he close the canon unless he knew for certain that the spirit of prophecy was extinct? Even if Malachias did die before Esdras, how did Esdras know that the Lord would never raise up another ἀνὴρ θεόπνευστος to his people?"[2] In 2 Mach. ii. 13, Nehemias is recorded to have founded a library "and gathered into it the [writings] about the kings and prophets and the [writings] of David and letters of kings concerning offerings." The passage is most obscure, and in any case says nothing about the completion of the canon. In the later times, however, of the Jewish commonwealth, a distinct step in advance seems to have been made. We find the sacred books regarded as a whole with certain recognised divisions. In the prologue to the book of Ecclesiasticus mention is made of "the law, the prophets, and the rest of the books;" and a similar division into the law, prophets, and psalms, appears in Luke xxiv. 44.

A little later we meet with what may fairly be taken as proof for the existence of a Hebrew canon. Josephus enumerates twenty-two books of the Hebrew canon: viz. five books of the law, thirteen books of the prophets, and four which contain hymns and moral precepts. We cannot be quite certain what the books are to which Josephus refers, but undoubtedly the list which he received is almost, and probably it is quite, the same as that contained in our present Hebrew Bibles and accepted by Protestants. Reusch suggests the following as the list of books intended:—five books of Moses, thirteen books of the prophets [viz.: (1) Josue, (2) Judges and Ruth, (3) Samuel, (4) Kings, (5) Chronicles, (6) Esdras and Nehemias, (7) Esther, (8) Job, (9) Isaias, (10) Jeremias with Lamentations, (11) Ezechiel, (12) Daniel, (13) the minor prophets], and, lastly, Psalms, Proverbs, Canticles, and Ecclesiastes. Melito (c. 179) made inquiries about the books received in the Hebrew canon, and his list corresponds to that conjecturally attributed to Josephus, except that he omits Esther. In the next century, Origen, in enumerating the twenty-two books which the Hebrews hand down, mentions not only the Lamentations, but also the letter of the prophet under the one head Jeremias.

So far Jewish tradition seems to agree, at least very nearly, with the Protestant canon of the Old Testament; but it only seems. Up to this point we have given no more than the tradition of the Palestinian Jews. The Alexandrian Jews—or, as it would perhaps be more correct to say, the Hellenistic Jews—possessed Greek copies of the Scriptures known as the LXX, and these copies contained all the books of the Old Testament which Catholics acknowledge. Obviously it cannot have been without strong reason that such a book as that of Wisdom or Ecclesiasticus was put in the same volume with Job or Proverbs. Among the Jews of Alexandria, as Dr. Westcott, one of the highest Protestant authorities on the subject admits, translations were made of later books (1 Machab. Ecclus. Baruch, &c.), and new ones were written (Wisdom and 2 Mach.), and these "were reckoned in the sum of their religious literature and probably placed on an equal footing with the Hagiographa (i.e. Psalms, Proverbs, Job, &c.) in common esteem."[1] Nor is this all. As many Jews went beyond the Palestinian and Babylonish canon, so some great and orthodox Jewish teachers fell short of it. During the first century A.D. the canonicity of Canticles and Ecclesiastes was still disputed in the Jewish schools. The school of Schammai denied the canonicity of the latter, and in a Jewish council about the year 90 A.D. discussed freely the canonicity of each of these books, and finally decided it in the affirmative.[2] If the Jews did at last decidedly reject the books which they did not find in their Hebrew Bible, but which were contained in the LXX, this may reasonably be attributed to the growing aversion which they felt to Greek literature in general and to the LXX in particular. In any case, the Christian Church never received the canon of Scripture from the Jews, because till long after the Jews had rejected Christ they had no fixed canon. Nor can any Protestant consistently accept the canon of the Old Testament on Jewish authority, unless he attributes infallibility to the bitterest enemies of the Christian name.[3] The Palestinian canon, so far as it can be said to have existed in the time of Christ and His Apostles, did not receive any distinct approval from them. No doubt the deutero-canonical books (Wisdom, Machabees, &c.), are not expressly quoted as Scripture in the New Testament, though the New Testament does contain a good many allusions to them; but precisely the same may be said of several Old Testament books accepted by Protestants—e.g. of Judges, Ecclesiastes, Canticles. Moreover, out of, say, 350 quotations of the Old Testament in the New, about 300 are from the LXX, which contain the deutero-canonical books; so that Augustine speaks of the LXX as "approved by the Apostles."[1]

(3) In the Christian Church.

We have seen that when Christianity began to be, a definite canon of the Old Testament was not yet established among the Jews, and further that the New Testament does not furnish any list of Old Testament books received by Christ and His Apostles. It can, however, be proved from tradition, that the full list of Old Testament books (including Wisdom, Machabees, &c.) was authorised by the Apostles. The testimony of the Christian writers during the first three centuries is unanimous on this point. We can trace the reception of these books from the very time of the Apostles. Clement of Rome, Polycarp, Irenæus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and others quote them, and many early writers quote them as Scripture. To this unanimity among the Christians of the first three centuries there is one exception and only one. Julius Africanus, in a letter to Origen, refused to accept the history of Susanna as canonical. But this exception proves how strong was the tradition of the Church; for Julius Africanus objects to the history of Susanna merely on critical grounds, and Origen expressly receives it (although well aware that it was not to be found in the Hebrew text of Daniel) because it was held as canonical in the churches—"quia in ecclesiis tenetur." Nothing, then, can be more complete than the Ante-Nicene tradition for the Catholic canon of the Old Testament. For the deutero-canonical books, we have the witness of Father after Father; we find them placed in every MS. of the LXX, translated in the old Latin version,[2] and quoted in controversy against heretics.

Still, among the Fathers of the fourth century there was serious doubt concerning the authority of the deutero-canonical books. Jerome and Rufinus follow the canon of the Hebrew Bible, and declare that the deutero-canonical books are not "canonical," but "ecclesiastical"—i.e. they were read in church, but did not possess full, dogmatic authority. St. Athanasius excludes Esther from the canon and all the deutero-canonical books except Baruch and the letter of Jeremias. With him agrees St. Cyril of Jerusalem, except that he does not exclude Esther. Gregory Nazianzen and Amphilochius exclude all the deutero-canonical books and also Esther, though the latter speaks doubtfully about Esther. On the other hand, St. Augustine gives a list of the canonical books which is precisely the same as that now accepted in the Church. A multitude of Fathers—Basil, Chrysostom, Ambrose, Leo, &c.—quote the deutero-canonical books just as they quote the other books of the Old Testament. Nay, so strong was the feeling within the Church in favour of the extended canon, that even Fathers who in theory rejected the deutero-canonical books, in practice quote them as Scripture. Thus the witness of the Church in the fourth century, though less strong than that of the Ante-Nicene Fathers, is still strong in favour of the deutero-canonical books. The Church as a whole received them, though individual Fathers of great name rejected them.

[3] Prof. Robertson Smith, in his recent lectures on the Old Testament in the Jewish church, admits that the Jewish canon was not definitely fixed in Christ's time, but tries to justify the Protestant rejection of the deutero-canonical books on the ground that these books do not contribute to the development of revelation. But, in fact, the book of Wisdom does develop the religious ideas of Israel, and prepare the way for New Testament doctrine on the Λόγος, and this has been repeatedly urged by theologians, in defence of the Catholic canon.

[2] Clem. Rom. (1 Cor. iii. 27, 55), Polyc. (Ep. 10), quote deutero-canonical books of Old Testament; Iren. (iv. 5, 2; iv. 26, 3), Tertull. (Præscript. 7; Scorp. 8), Clem. Al. (Strom. iv. 23, &c.), quote them as Scripture. The letter of Julius Africanus is edited by Routh, Rell. Sacr. tom. ii. The opinion of Origen is given in his Comm. in Matth. 61, apud Reusch.

It was probably this divergence of opinion which had arisen which led to conciliar decisions; and here, too, we see the greater weight of authority and tradition enlisted on the side of the deutero-canonical books. There is no reason to believe that the Council of Nicæa made any list of canonical books, though St. Jerome says he had read that that council "reckoned Judith" as part of Scripture.[1] A little later, however, the Council of Laodicea (between 343 and 381), canon 60, rejected all the deutero-canonical books except Baruch.[2] But in 393 all these books were accepted by the Council of Hippo, and again approved as canonical in a letter of Pope Innocent to Exsuperius of Toulouse. From this time the reception of the deutero-canonical books became more and more established, though as yet there was no binding decision of the Church upon the point. Even late in the middle ages, the authority of Jerome, whose "Prologus Galeatus" was widely known, made even orthodox teachers speak doubtfully about the canonicity of [1] Hefele, Concil. i. p. 371.

Judith, &c. In 1442 the matter came before the General Council of Florence, which represented the East as well as the West, and in the decree of union for the Jacobites the full list of Old Testament books was approved.[1] Finally, the Council of Trent (Sess. iv. Decret. de Canon. Scriptur.) gives the list of Old Testament books with which we began, defining under anathema that all of them, with all their parts, as contained in the Vulgate translation, were "sacred and canonical."

A few words may now be added on the canon of the Old Testament outside the Church. The schismatical Greeks appear to have followed faithfully their ancient traditions and the teaching of Florence. The schismatical Council of Jerusalem, which met in 1672, gives a list of sacred books which agrees with that of Trent, and accepts the deutero-canonical books on the authority of tradition and the Church. With Protestants it has been otherwise. All Protestant sects, so far as we know, reject the canonical authority of the deutero-canonical books. Some, however, are more peremptory in their rejection than others. Lutherans and Anglicans treat these books with a certain special reverence, and as a matter of fact they have been retained in almost all Protestant translations of the Bible. On the other hand, the Scotch Presbyterians in their Confession of Faith place the deutero-canonical books on a level with any other human writings, and since 1825 there have been in Germany and elsewhere fierce discussions, whether or no the "Apocrypha" should still be bound up with the Bible (or, as a Catholic would say, with the rest of the Bible). The question, however, is no longer so important to Protestants as it used to be. The denial of all supernatural inspiration has become common among their theologians, so that for this large and influential section of Protestants, discussion about the list of inspired books is altogether idle or can have at most only an historical value.

II. Canon of the New Testament.—Like the Old, the New Testament contains a certain number of deutero-canonical books, though the fact for long received comparatively very little attention in modern times, because the Protestant confessional standards, while they reject the deutero-canonical books of the Old Testament, inconsistently enough accept those of the New. The Council of Trent gives the following list of New Testament books (those which are deutero-canonical are printed in italics):—four Gospels, the Acts, the Epistles of St. Paul (viz. to the Romans, two to the Corinthians, to the Galatians, to the Ephesians, to the Philippians, to the Colossians, two to Timothy, to Titus, to Philemon, to the Hebrews), first and second Epistles of St. Peter, first, second, and third Epistles of St. John, the Epistle of St. James, the Epistle of St. Jude, the Apocalypse of St John.

[1] Hefele, Concil. vii. p. 796.

With regard to all these books, except such as are deutero-canonical, there is no reason to believe that their authority was ever doubted in the Church, although the distinct reference to New Testament Scriptures becomes much marked and frequent in Christian writers only after the immediate disciples of the Apostles had passed away and the need of written records became more urgent. Still, from very early times we obtain testimonies to the existence of Scriptures besides those which the Christian inherited from the Jewish Church. Thus St. Peter classes St. Paul's letters with "the rest of the Scriptures," and the epistle which is ascribed to St. Barnabas, and which belongs to a very early period, makes a quotation from St. Matthew, with the formula "it is written." About the middle of the second century Justin Martyr tells us that "Memoirs" written "by the Apostles and by those who followed them" were read in the religious assemblies of the Christians. The description which Justin gives of his "Memoirs" answers exactly to our four Gospels, and he mentions the Apocalypse by name. Shortly after Justin's time (about 180), the famous Muratorian Canon offers the earliest formal list of New Testament books. This precious relic exists only in a mutilated form and in a text which is often so corrupt that it is difficult to divine its meaning. According to Dr. Westcott, the Muratorian Canon contained all the New Testament books at present received, except "the Epistle of James, the Epistle to the Hebrews, and 2 Peter, while it notices the partial reception of the [spurious] Apocalypse of Peter," and his words express the general opinion of scholars except that many with very strong reasons add 1 Peter also to the list of omitted books.[1] The Peshito or Syriac translation, which belongs to the third century, omits Jude,

[1] Hilgenfeld, Kanon des N. T. p. 43.

2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and the Apocalypse. Eusebius sums up the opinions which prevailed in the Ante-Nicene age as follows: he divides the books of the New Testament into such as are "acknowledged" (ὁμολογούμενα), viz. the four Gospels, Acts, &c., and those which were "disputed" (ἀντιλεγόμενα) embracing the deutero-canonical books. He himself was evidently accustomed to see the Epistle to the Hebrews treated as canonical, but, he says, "Some have denied its authority, asserting that it is disputed by the Roman Church as not being the Apostle's work." Finally, it is clear from Eusebius that there were certain uninspired and unapostolic books which he himself pronounces spurious, but which were not yet clearly separated from those in the canon.[1]

From the middle of the fourth century the canon of the New Testament gradually became more settled. True, the Syrian church still clung to the canon of the Peshito, but in the Church at large the whole of the New Testament was received. Two books, however, were still regarded with partial suspicion. In the East, the Council of Laodicea, Cyril of Jerusalem, Gregory Nazianzen, definitely exclude or pass over in silence the Apocalypse of St. John; Amphilochius and Epiphanius mention the doubts entertained with regard to it. In the West, although the Council of Carthage in 397 and Pope Innocent ratified the full list of New Testament books, still even to a late period doubts existed in some parts of the Church as to the Epistle to the Hebrews. Even St. Isidore of Seville, writing early in the seventh century, says that most Latins were uncertain whether it was St. Paul's, "because of the discrepancy in the style."[2]

All doubts as to the canonical books of the New Testament were finally set at rest for Catholics by the Councils of Florence and Trent. Protestants, on the contrary, on their revolt from the Church, were utterly unable to find any rational principle on which they could determine the list of New Testament books. Luther

[1] The statement in the text is substantially true, but (1) the disputed books are subdivided "generally known" and "spurious;" (2) the Apocalypse is placed according to one opinion given, among the "acknowledged," according to another among the "spurious." Euseb. H.E. iii. 25.

[2] Apud Credner. p. 293. In the middle ages the spurious Epistle to the Laodiceans found wide acceptance, especially in the Frankish and English churches (Credner, p. 299).

accepted or rejected New Testament books, according as he found or did not find the "Gospel" in them. He called the Epistle of St. James "a letter of straw," which "attributes righteousness to works, dead against St. Paul." It was reason enough, he said, for him not to think highly of the Apocalypse "that Christ therein is neither taught nor acknowledged, although this above all was an Apostle's business"![1] He partly liked the Epistle to the Hebrews, because it enforced belief in the priesthood of Christ; partly disliked it, because of the doctrine contained in capp. 6 and 10.[2] This breach with tradition on the Scriptures of the New Testament as well as on the doctrine was healed for a time among Protestants, and for a long time the entire canon of the New Testament was generally accepted amongst them, although the Westminster Confession of 1648 contains the only list of New Testament writings drawn up by any of the older Protestant authorities. Of modern Protestant critics little need be said. The remarks made above on their treatment of the Old fully apply to their treatment of the New Testament. This method is widely different from that of Luther, but it is not without reason that they claim to inherit his spirit.

III. The Principles on which the Canon of Scripture rests.—Catholics, believing in the infallible authority of the Church, have full security that the books of the Catholic Bible are all true and inspired Scripture. Before the Scripture was written, or, again, the canon of Scripture was fixed, the faithful were guided by the infallible teaching of their pastors, and from this same teaching they receive with perfect confidence the written word of God in all its books and in all its parts. There are two other principles put forward as sufficient to determine the canon of Scripture—both of them, as may be briefly shewn, utterly inadequate.

According to a theory once popular among Protestants, Scripture attests itself by a "self-evidencing light." In other words, a pious person who peruses the Bible knows by the effect produced upon his conscience and feeling that the book he reads is the inspired word of God. This theory is abundantly refuted by the most obvious facts of history. The Fathers of the Church were not at one as to the canon, yet in charity we may believe that they read the books of the New Testament with pious feelings. Nay, the Reformers who are said to have restored "the Gospel" were not at one with regard to the books which make up the the New Testament. Besides, from the nature of the case, the moral good which we get or think we can get from a book cannot possibly assure us that it was all written under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost and contains nothing but the truth of God. Indeed, the bare statement of this theory suffices for its refutation.

Another theory, which we may call the literary, bases the authority of the Scriptural books and their title to a place in the canon, on a critical investigation of the internal and external evidence which can be produced in their behalf. This method is pursued by almost every learned Protestant at the present day—by extreme sceptics like Hilgenfeld and Keim, who examine tradition to undermine the authenticity of Scripture; and by sober and patient investigators like Dr. Westcott, who is a devout believer in the authority of Scripture. But to base the canon on critical investigations, however accurate and thorough, involves a misconception of the object for which Scripture was given. Scripture is given to the whole Church: it is meant for the guidance of all the faithful, and all, either directly, by reading it themselves, or indirectly, by hearing portions of it read or expounded by their pastors, have the right to benefit by its salutary lessons. Indeed, the argument tells yet more strongly against Protestants. If, as they hold, Scripture is the sole rule of faith, and if learning and critical training are needed to ascertain what the Scripture is, then one of two consequences necessarily follows. All, except an infinitesimal fraction of mankind must give up the attempt to secure a right rule of faith altogether, or else, instead of the infallibility of the Church, they must accept the infallibility of some particular school among learned men.

Protestants, when they appeal to Scripture against the Church, forget that it is only from this very Church, and on her authority, that Scripture is received; and we may conclude with the words of a Protestant scholar who has done more than any other to illustrate the history of the canon. Protestants, he says, have built a new Church on the foundation of Scripture, first without understanding, then without the will to understand, that

Scripture itself rests on nothing but tradition.[1]

CANON PENITENTIARY. The Council of Trent ordered [2] that in every cathedral church, if possible, a penitentiary, with a claim to hold the next vacant prebend should be appointed by the bishop; he was to be forty years of age, and either a master of arts, or doctor, or a licentiate in theology or canon law. His duty was to hear confessions, and by so doing he was considered to perform his choral duties.

CANON THEOLOGIAN. The Council of Trent directed [3] that in all churches where a prebendal provision was already made for lectures on Theology and Holy Scripture, the bishops should see that the foundation was not defeated of its purpose; and also that for the future, in all cathedral churches, or even collegiate churches, existing in large towns, and having a numerous body of clergy, a theologian with the above-mentioned duties should be appointed, and competently provided for out of the chapter funds. The office was usually conferred upon a member of the chapter, whence the name Canon Theologian. In England the theologian must be a canon.

CANONESS. Chapters of Canonesses are mentioned in the capitularies of Louis le Débonnaire, which allow them to possess property, both common and private, and only require that they should take the vows of chastity and obedience. In the following centuries these chapters, especially in France and Germany, became very numerous. They were distinguished from nunneries by the permission to the members to hold private property. The duties of the Canonesses were, to teach young girls, work at church embroidery, copy and illuminate service-books, &c. The right of holding property naturally introduced much laxity, and introduced into the order of Canonesses a class of wealthy and titled ladies, who were indisposed to submit to any severity of discipline. Hence a crisis arrived in the history of these chapters, similar to that which we have described with reference to Canons; and Regular Canonesses, bound by the vow of poverty and observing a strict rule of life, existed side by side with Secular Canonesses, to whom the chapter was little more than an agreeable retreat, enabling ladies who did not wish to marry, or had outlived their charms, to live in the society of persons of their own rank, much as they would have done in the world. At the Reformation, such being the character of these chapters, it caused no surprise that the members of several of them—ladies of princely or noble rank—followed the example of their male relatives and repudiated the Catholic faith. Some of these still exist: at Gandersheim, Herford, &c. Wilhelmina, sister of Frederick the Great, "Abbess of Quedlinburg," was the head of one of these Protestant chapters. If any of the Canonesses wish to marry, she must resign her canonry.

CANONISATION. To pay honour to the dead whom the general voice declares to have lived well is an instinct of human nature. Roman citizens brought the images of their distinguished ancestors into their villas; under the empire they recognised the far-reaching power and august majesty—sometimes the beneficence—of their rulers by deifying them after death; in China, the worship of ancestors is to this day the most living portion of the popular religion; among ourselves, the number of monuments in our public places everywhere, though in many cases rather attesting the vanity of the living than the merits of the dead, prove the universality of the impulse. A modern writer of note [1] has said that everything depends on how a people "does its Hero-worship." The Church, divinely founded and divinely guided as she is, so far recognises this view that she encourages us to distinguish with singular honour certain of her children who have gone before us in the Christian warfare, bids us reserve this honour for those whose virtue reached the "heroic" level, and, that we may not be deceived, establishes a careful and deliberate process whereby to test the truth of facts and probe the moral significance of actions. Her judgments and her processes need not fear a comparison with those of public opinion. The State, which modern irreligion invites us to regard as a moral agency the fiat of which is not to be appealed against, has also modes of conferring honour, and does not wait for their death before it rewards its servants. It has peerages, baronetcies, orders, stars, money, and offices. If we examine on what grounds these distinctions are dispensed, we find that it is for rare intellectual ability—usually attended by the gift of expression—for the capacity of amassing money, for courage with direction, and for simple courage; a certain degree of patriotic devotion being supposed to be present in each case. In this way, and on these grounds, the modern State honours its heroes. To the Church, the more or less of ability possessed by those whom she recommends for our veneration is a matter of no concern. She is as willing to raise a St. Isidore, the gardener of Madrid, to the ranks of the Blessed, as an Augustine of Hippo or a Thomas Aquinas. The proof of eminent virtue is all that she demands, and as a conclusive and compendious test of the presence of this high order of virtue, she requires the authentication of miracles wrought by, or through the intercession of, the person whose virtues are under debate. Such are, in her estimate, the only sound bases of a popular cultus, and when these conditions have been complied with, such a cultus has been never known to be discredited.

The possession of virtue rising to the heroic level, and the illustration of that virtue by miracles, are matters of fact, which must of course be established by testimony. The witnesses, in most cases, can be no other than the countrymen and countrywomen of the reputed saint, for only they can have seen his life from so near at hand as to be competent to speak with certitude respecting it. In the early times, individual bishops, and afterwards metropolitans, acting upon this local testimony, and sifting it in the best way they could, declared the blessedness of certain persons, and proposed their memories for the veneration of the faithful. But it is notorious that local testimony is rarely free from bias, that national and provincial sympathies, or even antipathies, are apt to disturb the judgment, and that for this reason the universal Church could not safely endorse without inquiry even the unanimous judgment of his own countrymen on the virtues of a reputed saint. Earl Waltheof, put to death by William the Conqueror, was regarded by the English as a martyr, and miracles were said to be worked at his tomb; the same thing happened in the case of Simon de Montfort; but it may reasonably be doubted whether antipathy to the Norman and the foreigner was not a substantial factor in these reputations for sanctity. Considerations of this kind prevailed, many centuries ago, to cause the inquiry into reputed sanctity to be reserved to the central authority in the Church, the Holy See, and to recommend the wisdom and necessity of the decision that without the sanction of that see no religious cultus may lawfully be paid to the memory of any holy person, however eminent for virtue or notorious for miracles. As early as the fourth century, in the case of Vigilius, bishop of Trent, we find the authority of Rome invoked to recognise a martyr or confessor as such, and sanction his being honoured in the liturgy. The procedure to be observed was gradually regularised, defects remedied, and safeguards supplied; and in the tenth century we meet with the complete process of a canonisation, of which the object was St. Ulrich, bishop of Augsburg. Still, however, through the inordinate fondness with which those of a particular country or religious order regarded holy persons of their own blood or profession, instances of abusive cultus sometimes occurred; and accordingly we find Alexander III., in 1170, publishing a decree in which it is declared unlawful to honour any person publicly as a saint, however celebrated for miracles, without the consent of the Roman Church. Still more important is the bull of Urban VIII. (1634), in which the form of procedure in cases of canonisation is minutely prescribed, and various abuses condemned. In this bull, however, the Pope declared "that he did not wish to prejudice the case of those [servants of God] who were the objects of a cultus arising either out of the general consent of the Church, or a custom of which the memory of man ran not to the contrary, or the writings of the Fathers, or the long and intentional tolerance of the Apostolic See or the Ordinary." (Ferraris, Cultus Sanctorum.)

It remains briefly to explain in what manner the duty, thus reserved to the Holy See, of testing the evidence offered in proof of sanctity is discharged. The celebrated treatise of Pope Benedict XIV. on Heroic Virtue (of which a translation was published some years ago by the English Oratorians) is the standard authority on the subject. There are properly only two recognised degrees of sanctity—that of Blessed, and that of Saint. The title Venerable is given to those whose case has passed through the preliminary processes and has reached the stage called "the introduction of the Apostolic process," as will be described below.[1] At the present time, Beatification is nearly always a stage on the road to Canonisation; the same rigorous proof of eminent virtue and the working of miracles is demanded in one case as in the other. But whereas the cultus of a canonised Saint belongs to the universal Church, and churches and altars can be freely erected in his or her honour, and images, pictures, or statues of him or her displayed without special permission, in the case of one of the Blessed it is otherwise. The honour and veneration which are authorised in their regard are limited and partial; and because the cultus of one of them is permitted to one country, or city, or order, or branch of an order, it does not follow that it should be practised elsewhere; and the attempt to extend it without special permission is condemned. Nor is it lawful, without such permission, to display their pictures or images in churches, nor, under any circumstances, can Mass be said or the breviary recited in their honour.

Beatification.—Thirteen or fourteen different steps may be distinguished in the process of Beatification; the general object of all these slow and lengthy inquiries—extending always over many years, and sometimes from one century to another—being to unite the credibility and authenticity which can only be founded on the reports of witnesses locally and personally cognisant of the facts to the authority of a juridical investigation conducted by trained and impartial intellects. It must be remembered that the character and behaviour of the reputed saint are subjected to the severest possible strain; that the "fierce light which beats upon a throne" is nothing to that which so minute and protracted an inquiry turns upon the everyday life of the person submitted to it. "The person who is to be beatified must have practised in the heroic degree chiefly the three theological virtues, Faith, Hope and Charity, and the four cardinal virtues, Prudence, Justice, Courage and Temperance, with all that these suppose and involve; nor is it enough to show that these have been practised to this degree of perfection under certain circumstances: numerous acts, a permanent and habitual practice, principally of charity, are required; and, with regard to the cardinal virtues, the habit of that virtue which was the proper and distinguishing excellence of the person's calling. Thus justice and temperance are required in statesmen and prelates; in Popes, zeal for the defence and propagation of the Catholic faith; in kings, loyal attachment to the Church and the Holy See; in married women, gentleness and devotion;" &c.[1]

The first step of the process is a formal inquiry instituted by the bishop of the diocese as to the fact of the reputation of the person whose beatification is demanded for virtue and miraculous power. This being accomplished, either the same bishop or a Roman official inquires into the fact of non-cultus—that is, whether the bull of Urban VIII. (supposing the case not to be included among the exceptions therein specified) has been hitherto scrupulously complied with. Thirdly, the acts or minutes resulting from these two inquiries are sent to Rome, to the secretary of the Congregation of Rites. [CONGREGATIONS, ROMAN.] Before this body the process is now opened, at the request of the postulators, or supporters of the beatification. The fifth step is the nomination of a promotor fidei (called in popular language the "devil's advocate"), whose duty it is to point out any flaws or weak points in the evidence adduced, and raise all kinds of objections. Sixthly, the Congregation examines, if the person were an author, all the works, printed or in manuscript, which were ascertained to be of his composition, and draws up a formal report on them. If this be favourable, the seventh stage is reached, that of the introduction of the Apostolic process; for Rome, so to speak, now makes the cause its own, and gives a commission to the Congregation of Rites to try it, investigating, not only the notoriety, but the reality and nature of the virtues and miracles ascribed to the beatificandus. This commission, without a special Papal dispensation, is never issued till at least ten years have passed since the first transmission of the acts to the Secretary of the Congregation. The holy person may now be styled "Venerable." The next step is the appointment by the Congregation, under what are called litteræ remissionales, of a delegation of three bishops, or other high functionaries, to deal with the case systematically, and examine witnesses in respect of the reputed virtues and miracles. The acts of this delegation, which are often extremely voluminous, are, as the ninth stage, sent to the Congregation, by which they are examined, and arguments heard, pro and contra, from the postulators and the promotor fidei. If the result is favourable to the beatificandus, a second and still more searching inquiry into the real and inmost nature of all that has been deposed respecting him is committed to a new delegation; this is the tenth stage. The process, being returned to the Congregation, is finally considered by them, both as to its form and as to its substance; and the virtues and miracles are separately the subject of debate in three successive assemblies or congregations, at the last of which the Pope himself is present. After having sought to know the will of God by prayer, the Pope makes known his judgment to the secretary of the Congregation. A new general congregation is then held, at which it is considered whether the beatification may be proceeded with without further delay; if the decision be favourable, the Pope appoints a day for the ceremony, and orders a brief, setting forth the Apostolic sentence, to be prepared. The final stage of this long process, the beatification itself takes place in the Vatican church; it includes the public reading of the brief, the chanting of the Te Deum, the unveiling of the image or picture of the newly-beatified on the altar, the incensing of the image, the reading of the new collect, &c.

[1] Venerable Bede is a canonised saint. The lessons from his writings which are read in the breviary are, however, always headed "De Sermone Venerabilis Bedæ," &c. This peculiarity is said to have arisen from the fact that his homilies were read in the office during his lifetime; and as he could not then be styled "Saint," the title "Venerable" was used.

By an "equipollent beatification" is meant the Papal authorisation of the public cultus of a confessor or martyr, founded on the proof of one or more of the exceptional conditions stated in the bull of Urban VIII.

Canonisation.—Before proceeding to canonisation, it must be proved that at least two miracles have been wrought through the intercession of the "Blessed" person since the beatification. This proof is attended with the same formalities, and surrounded by the same rigorous conditions, as in the case of the miracles proved before beatification. After it has been established, the three congregations (of which the last is public and in the presence of the Pope), which were requisite before beatification, are again convened; and upon the direction of the Pope, after the last congregation, the promoter of the faith and the secretary of the Congregation of Rites agree to a form of decree, declaring that no doubt exists relative to the miracles in question, and that there is no reason why the canonisation should not be proceeded with. This then takes place, usually in St. Peter's. After various ceremonies, the postulator of the cause (who is usually a person of high rank or distinction in the country or order to which the saint belonged) asks twice that the name of the servant of God whose cause he pleads may be enrolled in the catalogue of the Saints; the Pope replies each time that it is best to explore the will of God still further by prayer; litanies and the "Veni Creator" are chanted: at the third request the Pope declares and ordains, "in honour of the Holy Trinity, for the glory of the Catholic faith and the progress of the Christian religion, in virtue of the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ, of the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul, and of his own plenary and proper authority," that the servant of God in question shall be inscribed on the register of the Saints ("Canon Sanctorum"), and that his (or her) memory shall be celebrated on a given day, in every part of the Church. A solemn Mass, in which the Pope himself, unless disqualified by illness or old age, officiates, is then celebrated, in honour of the new Saint.

The actual procedure will be more clearly understood if we describe and partly translate some Papal Bull of Canonisation; and, for this purpose, we will take the Bull of Alexander VII. concerning St. Francis de Sales, dated April 19, 1665. After a brief sketch of his life, a specification of seven miracles proved to the satisfaction of the Congregation of Rites, a reference to his beatification in 1661, and a mention of the princes and others (including Henrietta Maria, Queen of England) by whom the cause had been zealously promoted, the bull proceeds:—

"At length, deeming it to be just and due that we should give glory, praise, and honour on earth to those whom God honours in heaven, we, with the cardinals of the holy Roman Church, the patriarchs, archbishops and bishops, our beloved sons the prelates of the Roman Curia, our officials and suite, the secular and regular clergy, and an immense multitude of people, have this day met together in the holy Vatican basilica; and after three petitions for the decree of canonisation, presented to us on the part of the Most Christian King by our beloved son, the illustrious Charles, Duke of Créquy, ambassador from the said king; after sacred hymns, litanies, and other prayers, duly imploring the grace of the Holy Spirit:—

"In honour of the most holy and undivided Trinity, for the exaltation of the Catholic faith and the increase of the Christian religion, by the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ, the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul, and ourselves, after mature deliberation, and having many times implored the divine aid, by the counsel of our venerable brothers, the cardinals of the holy Roman Church, and of the patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops met together in the city, we have decided and defined the Blessed Francis de Sales, Bishop of Geneva, to be a Saint, and have inscribed him on the catalogue of the Saints, as, by the tenor of these presents, we do decide, define, and inscribe him; appointing that his memory shall be cherished and honoured with pious devotion by the universal Church, as a holy confessor and bishop, on the 29th day of January in each year. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen." A grant of indulgences on the usual conditions to those who shall visit the Saint's tomb on his festival, follows; a plenary indulgence to all present at the canonisation is announced; and then the bull proceeds:—"We therefore bless God, who is wonderful in his saints, because we have received mercy in the midst of his temple, in that He hath granted to us in the Church a new patron and intercessor with His divine Majesty, for the greater tranquillity of the same Church, the spread of the Catholic faith, and the enlightenment and conversion of heretics and all who wander from the path of salvation." After clauses relating to the publication of the bull, and forbidding any infraction of it, the instrument ends with the date, and the signatures of the Pope and thirty-eight cardinals.

CANTATE SUNDAY. A name given to the fourth Sunday after Easter, from the introit of the Mass, which begins with the words "Sing to the Lord a new song." The name "Cantate Sunday" often appears during the middle ages as well known, and was used to mark the date, even in ordinary life. The name is probably as old as the twelfth century.

CANTICLES. [See HYMNS.]

CANTOR, also called "episcopus chori," "chori regens," was the official in a cathedral or collegiate church who instructed the choristers and younger clerics in music, and directed the singing of the office, &c. In many foundations, the office of cantor was raised to a dignity, in the canonical sense, and had a prebend of considerable value attached to it. A cantor thus provided for often appointed sub-cantors (succentores), who were selected from the choral-vicars, and entrusted with the teaching of the ecclesiastical chant, while the cantor himself exercised control over the choral-vicars and superintended the performance of the divine offices. [See PRECENTOR.]

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT. It is certain from Scripture that the magistrate may lawfully put malefactors to death. Capital punishment was enacted for certain grievous crimes in the old law, and the Christian dispensation made no essential change in this respect, for St. Paul, in Rom. xiii. 4, expressly says that the magistrate "beareth not the sword in vain; for he is a minister of God, an avenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil." The unanimous opinion of theologians is in favour of the lawfulness of capital punishment; and if the Church has given no formal decision on the matter, this probably is only because the question has never till of late years assumed any great importance. Argentré, however, in his "Collectio de Novis Erroribus," i. 86, mentions an erroneous proposition of the Waldenses, denying the lawfulness of capital punishment. The theologians of that time, a number of whom are quoted by Argentré, treated the proposition as heretical.

St. Thomas defends the lawfulness of capital punishment on the following principle. The State, he argues, is like a body, composed of many members, and as a surgeon may cut off one corrupt limb to save the others, so the magistrate may lawfully put a malefactor to death and thus provide for the common good.

It is only the magistrate who can inflict the penalty of death, because as the justification of the penalty is the common good, it can be imposed by him alone to whom the care of the common good belongs—viz. by the magistrate.

A parent has the power to impose remedial chastisements, but not to kill.

A private person may of course work for the common good, but if the good he would do involves the injury, above all if it involves the death, of another, he has no authority to decide that any member of the State is to be exterminated for the good of the whole.

As to outlaws, who may in certain cases be put to death by private persons, the sentence is really passed by the State, the individual who slays them being the mere executioner.

The magistrate derives this authority from God, and it is conveyed, not only by the positive law of God in Scripture, but also by the natural law written on the heart. The number of capital offences must be determined by the good of the community; so that laws are rightly more severe at one time or in one place than in another. The strange theory of Scotus that the positive law of God forbids homicide, and that therefore a magistrate can only put to death where God Himself has dispensed him from the observance of the law—viz. for murder, adultery, blasphemy, &c. and the other cases provided for in the Pentateuch—is generally rejected. This opinion errs in taking for granted that the magistrate's authority to slay is conveyed only through the positive law, and in assuming that the judicial precepts of the Jewish code are in force among Christians.

If a capital offence has been committed, the prince, even if certain of the prisoner's guilt, must not condemn him without fair trial, although here an exception may be made if the guilt is notorious and great evils would ensue from delay of execution. Time must be allowed the prisoner to prepare for death and receive the sacraments, and this time must be given even if there is danger of his escaping. Finally, the canon law strictly forbids ecclesiastics, even if they hold temporal jurisdiction, to take any part in passing or executing sentence of death. (St. Thomas, 2 2ndæ, lxiv.; Billuart, "De Justit." diss. x.; St. Liguori, "Theol. Moral." lib. iv. tract. iv. cap. 1. dub. 2.)

CAPITAL SINS (in English called deadly sins), so named because they are the fountain-heads from which all other sins proceed. St. Thomas, following St. Gregory the Great, enumerates seven—viz. vainglory, envy, anger, avarice, sloth (which he calls tristitia, "sadness," or distaste for labour in God's service, but which is generally known as acedia), gluttony, lust. Other writers substitute pride for vainglory; others, again, like Cassian, count both pride and vainglory, and so make eight capital sins. St Thomas divides them as follows. "Man," he says, "is led to sin by seeking that which is good inordinately, or by an unreasonable aversion from that which is good, because of incidental evil which is joined, or thought to be joined, with it. Man seeks inordinately the goods of the soul (pride), or of the body (gluttony and lust), or, lastly, external goods (avarice). He has an unreasonable aversion to his own good, because of the labour needed to secure it (sloth), or to another's good, because it seems to detract from his own (envy and anger)." (1 2ndæ, lxxxiv. 4.)

CAPITULARY. A set of capitula, or chapters, each of which was a special law, like the "chapters" in the annual volume of statutes passed by the British Parliament. The word has been extended to the ecclesiastical canons passed in provincial councils—e.g. to the chapters of Martin of Duma, passed at Braga in 572—but it is usually restricted to the legislation of the Frankish kings of the first and second dynasties.

These Capitularies have been published by Baluze, and more recently by Pertz; they have been carefully analysed by M. Guizot in his "Hist. de la Civilis. en France."

I. The Capitularies of the Merovingian kings begin with Childebert (554). Compiled as they were so soon after the conversion of the Salian Franks to Christianity, it is needless to say that ecclesiastical influence is apparent in every part of them. Among the more prominent matters of which they treat, are the right of sanctuary, the observance of the Sunday, the right to grant lands to the Church, &c.

II. The Capitularies of Pepin le Bref, the father of Charlemagne, are five in number, but only one of them can be called in the fullest sense a work of legislation, as having been framed "in generali populi conventu." They are much occupied with clerical discipline and the regulation of marriage.

III. The Capitularies of Charlemagne, sixty-five in number, contain 1,150 separate chapters. They range in date from 769 to 803. They are classified by M. Guizot, according to their subjects, into political (273), moral (87), penal (130), civil (110), religious (85), canonical (291), domestic (73), and miscellaneous or occasional (12). A large proportion of them can in no sense be called laws; so far from it that

M. Guizot distinguishes them into documents of twelve different kinds. These twelve classes include new laws (properly so called), ancient laws revived, instructions to the missi Dominici, circulars to the bishops and counts conveying admonitions or inviting opinions, answers of the emperor to questions put to him, judicial decrees, memoranda, &c. &c. In fact, this unwieldy collection faithfully represents the imperial system itself, which was a sort of hodge-podge of paternal government, flexible administration, and rigid law; each of these three being so far pressed as the Emperor, under the circumstances of each case, judged to be expedient.

IV. The Capitularies of Louis le Débonnaire, twenty in number, were added to those of Charlemagne, and the whole collection, digested into seven books, published between 820 and 842, by Ansegisus, Abbot of Fontenelle, and Benedict of Mayence—the same to whom many writers ascribe the fabrication of the False Decretals. Charles the Bald added fifty-two, and the succeeding Carlovingian kings, down to Charles the Simple inclusive, some ten or eleven more. After Charles the Simple, the laws of France ceased to be called Capitularies.

CAPPA MAGNA. The barbarous word "cappa," said to be derived from capere (quia capit totum hominem, "because it covers the whole person"), was originally used by ecclesiastical writers to denote the pluviale, or cope, as appears from Durandus and Honorius. The cappa magna is a long vestment, the hood of which is lined with silk or with fur, according to the season of the year at which it is to be worn. It is used by cardinals, bishops, and, in many churches, also by canons. It seems to have been at first the choir vestment of canons regular. (From Gavant. with Merati's notes.)

CAPUCHINS. A reform of the Franciscan order instituted by Matteo di Bassi of Urbino, who, being an Observantine Franciscan at Monte Falco, and having convinced himself that the capuche or cowl worn by St. Francis was different in shape from that worn by the friars of his own time, adopted a long pointed cowl, according to what he conceived to be the original form. In 1526 he obtained the consent of Pope Clement VII. to the wearing of this habit by himself and his companions, with the further permission to live the life of hermits, and preach the gospel in every country, on condition that once in each year they should present themselves at the general chapter, wherever it might be held, of the Observantine friars. Matteo began hereupon to preach publicly in the March of Ancona; but the provincial of the Observantines, hearing of it, treated him as an apostate friar [APOSTASY] and threw him into prison. He was released through the interference of the Duchess of Camerino, the Pope's niece; and he, with two zealous followers, Louis and Raphael of Fossombrone, took refuge for a time with the Camaldules in their convent at Massaccio. They were also kindly treated by the Conventual branch of their order [FRANCISCANS], and a bull was finally obtained from the Pope in 1528, authorising the union which Matteo and his companions had entered into with the Conventuals, sanctioning for them the hermit life, and allowing them to wear beards and to use the long-pointed capuche from which they have derived their name. After this the order grew with great rapidity, and it has produced down to the present time numbers of men eminent for every Christian virtue, great preachers, and accomplished scholars; yet, strange to say, the first projectors of the institute, unlike the great majority of founders of orders, did not persevere in the observance of its statutes. Matteo di Bassi, for whom independence of external control seems to have possessed an extraordinary attraction, finding that the Pope had forbidden Capuchins who did not remain in their monasteries and obey the vicar-general to wear the pointed cowl, immediately cut off the half of his, and quitted the order. Louis of Fossombrone was expelled from it on account of the violence of his language, when, by the Papal confirmation of another friar as vicar-general in 1536, his ambitious desire to be continued in the office was frustrated.

The statutes of the order were drawn up in 1529. The government was placed in the hands of a vicar-general, for they were at first subject to the general of the Conventuals, and only obtained exemption from this obedience in 1617. Matins were to be said at midnight, and the other canonical hours at the times originally assigned to them; hours for mental prayer, for silence, and for taking the discipline, were prescribed. They were to have no revenues, but to live by begging; everything about their churches and convents was to be poor and mean; the very chalices were to be of pewter, and in the decorations of the altars, gold, silver, and silk were excluded. They might eat one kind of meat in refectory, and wine was allowed; but if any Capuchin wished to diet himself more rigorously he was not to be prevented. In their begging rounds the friars were not to ask for either meat, eggs, or cheese, though they might accept them if offered. One of the most illustrious names in this order is that of St. Fidelis of Sigmaringen, a zealous and powerful preacher, martyred by the Calvinists of the Grisons in 1622 (see Alban Butler, April 24).

The third vicar-general, Bernardino Ochino, attained an unhappy notoriety through having adopted Lutheran opinions and married a young girl from Lucca. This was at Geneva, where he established himself in 1542. Ochino afterwards went to England, while Edward VI. was on the throne, and after having travelled through many parts of Germany, and become known as a gifted preacher of the new opinions, he settled at Zurich. But, like the late Rev. Blanco White, who deserted the Church for Anglicanism, but could not stop there, Ochino was compelled after a while by internal restlessness, against his own manifest interest, to seek to undermine the Lutheranism which he had embraced. In 1563 he printed a book called "Triginta Dialogi," in which it is intimated that if a man has an unsuitable wife, and feels quite certain that the impulse which moves him is from God, he may without sin take to himself a second wife. The leaders of the Reformed party at Zurich, such as Bullinger and Wolf, were scandalised at this apparent vindication of polygamy, and Ochino was driven by his Protestant friends out of Switzerland and sought refuge in Poland. Even here he was not suffered to rest, and on the forced journey to Moravia, where he hoped to find shelter, after losing three out of his four children by the plague, he died at Schlackau before the end of 1564, but in such isolation and obscurity that no particulars of his death were ever ascertained.

At the time when Hélyot wrote, near the beginning of the last century, the order of Capuchins was divided into more than fifty provinces and three "custodies," numbering sixteen hundred convents and twenty-five thousand friars, besides their missions in Brazil and various parts of Africa. The French Revolution—though there were a few who yielded—tempted with no other result than illustrating the serene and stable virtue of the great majority of the Capuchins. When Belgium was annexed to France in 1797, and soldiers were sent to turn out the friars at Louvain into the street, the guardian thus expelled cried out, "I protest in the sight of Heaven that it is only force which makes us go out of our house; that I and my brothers remain Capuchins; that we are suffering for religion, and are ready, if need be, to be martyrs in its cause." A large number of their convents were suppressed during the revolutionary troubles; in France, however, they had revived again to a considerable extent, but the persecuting "Liberalism" of the Third Republic ejected them anew from their convents (1880). They are at present most numerous in Austria; in Switzerland also there are many, and altogether they are said still to number several thousands. They are at present eight Capuchin convents in England and Wales — at Peckham, East Dulwich, Erith, Crawley, Chester, Pantasaph, Olton, and Pontypool—and three in Ireland—one at Kilkenny, and two (of which one is the noviciate) at Cork. CARDINAL (cardo, a hinge). Like most arrangements which, though made by man, carry out the Divine purpose, correspond to the wants of human society, and are destined to live, grow and endure, the great institution of the Cardinalate sprang from small and almost unnoticed beginnings. The words cardinalis, cardinare, incardinare, are found in ante-Nicene ecclesiastical writers, and are used to designate the fixed permanent clergy of any church—those who were so built into it and necessary to its being that it might be said to revolve round them as a door round its hinge.[1] They are thus distinguished from those bishops, or priests, or deacons, whose connection with a church was loose or temporary. In the Roman Church parish churches or Titles seem to have been first instituted in the time of Pope Marcellus (304), and the priests to whose charge they were permanently committed were styled cardinal priests. The deacons of the Roman

[1] It is interesting to observe that the use of this metaphor dates from the remotest antiquity. The five princes of the Philistines were called סַרְנִים, literally "axles" or "hinges" of the people. See Josue xiii. 3; Judges iii. 3.

Church, as of many other important Churches, were at first seven in number, in imitation of the original Apostolic institution. They were not at first assigned to particular districts; but as time went on, and various charitable institutions for the relief of the sick and poor, with chapels attached to them, arose here and there throughout the fourteen "regions" into which the city was divided under Augustus, each deacon came to have one or more regions, with the institutions locally contained in it, assigned to his care; and from the fixed character of their charge, they were called cardinal deacons. For a long time there was no such thing as a cardinal bishop, because the Roman Pontiff himself presided in the see in that capacity. But there were several bishoprics in the immediate neighbourhood of Rome—namely, Portus (at the mouth of the Tiber), Ostia (on the opposite side of the river), Prænestе, Sabina, Tusculum, Albano, and St. Rufina—the bishops of which appear from very early times to have sat in synod with the Bishop of Rome: a relation which, with increasing exercise and deepening comprehension of the Papal prerogatives, was naturally developed by degrees into a closer connection. History does not enable us to describe or date the stages of this change. In the eleventh century we find all the above-named sees (reduced now to six, for St. Rufina had been united to Portus) incorporated in the Roman Church, and their occupants holding their appointments directly and solely from the Pope. This is the picture which we derive from the writings of St. Peter Damian (d. 1071), who was himself Cardinal Bishop of Ostia. The council held at Rome in 1059, under Nicholas II., decreed that Popes should thenceforth be elected on the judgment of the six cardinal bishops, with the assent of the Roman clergy, the applause of the people, and the ratification of the Emperor. Of the Roman clergy, the cardinal priests and deacons were the most prominent and influential portion. Hence it is easy to understand, considering the instability of popular opinion, and the transitory character of human sovereignty, that the election of the Pope gradually came to be vested in the cardinals exclusively, who, in their grades of bishop, priest, and deacon, represented the ancient "presbyterium" of the Roman Church in the fullest and most satisfactory manner.

In the twelfth century the number of the cardinal bishops, as already stated, was six; that of the cardinal priests, twenty-eight; and about this time the number of the cardinal deacons was raised from seven to fourteen, one for each region, whence they were called "regionary" deacons. The dignity of their office grew, while its functions either dwindled or were otherwise discharged; and in process of time the cardinal deacons, still deriving their titles from the chapels formerly attached to the charitable institutions of which they had the charge (St. Hadrian, St. Theodore, &c.), ceased to have local duties, and, like the cardinals of higher rank, were drawn into the august circle of the immediate counsellors and assistants of the Roman Pontiffs. In the course of the twelfth century their number was further raised to eighteen, making a total of fifty-three cardinals; and this number remained fixed for a considerable time. Then a period of fluctuation ensued, during which the Sacred College was sometimes reduced to a mere handful of persons. The Council of Basle ordered that the number of cardinals should be fixed at twenty-four; but the decree was not ratified by the Pope, and no attention was paid to it. Leo X. raised the number to sixty-five. The final regulation, which prevails to this day, was contained in the constitution Postquam vetus of Sixtus V., published in 1586. By this it was ordered that the number of cardinals should never exceed seventy, thus composed: six of episcopal rank, holding the old suburban sees before mentioned; fifty described as priests, holding a corresponding number of "Titles" or parishes in Rome; and fourteen described as deacons. By a Constitution of St. Pius V. (1567), all customs or privileges in virtue of which the name of Cardinal had been assumed by the clergy of any other church (e.g. by the canons of Compostella, Milan, &c.) were abrogated, and it was forbidden to apply it in future to any but the senators of the Roman Church.

The cardinals owe their appointment solely to the Pope. They have for many centuries been taken in part from all the great Christian nations of Europe, though the number of Italian cardinals has always preponderated. The appointment of a future cardinal is announced by the Pope in consistory, but the name is reserved in petto. At a subsequent consistory it is made public. The actual appointment, in the case of ecclesiastics residing in Rome, proceeds as follows: On a day named, the candidate goes to the Papal palace, and receives from the Pope the red biretta; afterwards, in a public consistory, at the close of an imposing ceremonial, the Pope places upon his head the famous red hat. In a second consistory he "closes his mouth" (os claudit)—that is, forbids him for the present to speak at meetings of cardinals; in a third, he "opens his mouth"—that is, he removes the former prohibition, giving him at the same time a ring, and assigning to him his "Title." If the candidate is absent, being prevented by just cause from visiting Rome at that time, the red biretta is sent to him, and on receiving it he is bound to make oath that he will within a year visit the tombs of the Apostles.

The duties of cardinals are of two kinds—those which devolve on them while the Pope is living, and those which they have to discharge when the Holy See is vacant. As to the first, it may be briefly said that they consist in taking an active part in the government of the universal Church; for although the Pope is in no way bound to defer to the opinions of the Sacred College, in practice he seldom, if ever, takes an important step without their counsel and concurrence. Such a school in the science and art of government in all its forms as the College of Cardinals exists nowhere else in the world. They are brought into immediate contact with the various peculiarities of national character, the prejudices and cherished aims of dynasties, the conservatism that with more or less intelligence supports, and the communism that with more or less wickedness undermines, the fabric of Christian society. In consistory, where the cardinals all meet in a kind of senate under the presidency of the Pope, and discuss affairs "exclusa omni forma judiciali," the powers of statement and reply are cultivated; in the various Congregations [see CONGREGATION, ROMAN], they learn to manage in detail the vast and complicated concerns of a communion which with its one faith and, substantially, one ritual, is found congenial to every people and at home in every climate. Hence flow that largeness of temper, that breadth of view, that readiness to drop the accidental if only the essential be maintained, that conciliatory bearing, and that antique courtesy, by which the finest specimens of cardinal ambassadors have always been distinguished. History can show few nobler pictures than that of Cardinal Consalvi confronting the force and cunning of the First Napoleon in the zenith of his power, and compelling the drafting of the Concordat in the form that the Pope, not the First Consul, required.

All the cardinals now take precedence of bishops, archbishops, and even patriarchs. This was not so formerly; the change was gradually introduced. They have many other privileges, which canonists—who generally hold that the rank of cardinal, in its temporal aspect, is equivalent to that of a reigning prince—have elaborately defined in their treatises. On their seals they have their own arms, with the red hat as crest; they are styled Eminentissimi and Reverendissimi.

At a vacancy of the Holy See, the duties of the cardinals become confined to protecting the Church and maintaining all things in their due order, till a Conclave can be assembled for the election of a new Pope. [CONCLAVE.]

There are two English cardinals at the present time—Herbert Vaughan, Archbishop of Westminster, and Michael Logue, Archbishop of Armagh, Primate of all Ireland. The present archbishops of Sydney, Quebec, and Baltimore, are also cardinals. James Gibbons, Archbishop of Baltimore, is the only American cardinal.

The Sacred College numbers at present about sixty-four members.

CARDINAL LEGATE. [See LEGATE.]

CARDINAL PROTECTOR. A member of the Sacred College, belonging by birth to one of the more considerable Catholic nations, who has received the purple partly on that account. His local knowledge of his own people and their ways, through being "to the manner born," qualify him to be a trusted referee when any questions affecting the interests of the nation to which he belongs, or of individuals of that nation, are brought forward at Rome, and the name of "Cardinal Protector" has hence naturally been assigned to him. A remarkable instance, illustrating the representative weight which such cardinals often enjoy in the Sacred College, was that of the French Cardinal Maury, described by Consalvi in his powerful narrative of the Conclave which preceded the election of Pius VII. There are also Cardinal Protectors of religious orders, of colleges, &c.

CARDINAL VIRTUES. St. Ambrose ("In Luc." cap. vi. l. 5) is said to have been the first to call the four great moral virtues (prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance) the "cardinal" virtues. They are so named, according to St. Thomas, on account of their generality and importance. Prudence enables us to know what to desire or avoid; justice gives everyone his due; fortitude urges us on when difficulty stands in the way of our duty; temperance restrains us when passion excites us to what is wrong. All the moral virtues may be reduced to one or other of these headings. Thus religion belongs to justice because it gives God His due; chastity comes under temperance because it puts a restraint on certain passions [See VIRTUE, JUSTICE, TEMPERANCE]. (St. Thomas, 1ª 2æ, qu. lxi. for the cardinal virtues generally; and 2ª 2æ, qq. xlvii.–clxx. for the treatment of them in detail.)

CARMELITES, ORDER OF. In the middle of the twelfth century a crusader named Berthold vowed at the commencement of a battle that if by the mercy of God his side was victorious, he would embrace the religious life. The victory was won, and Berthold became a monk in Calabria. Soon after, the prophet Elias is said to have appeared to him and revealed something to him in consequence of which Berthold left Italy, and repairing to Mount Carmel (1156)—that mountain, so conspicuous and so beautiful, which juts out into the sea to the south of Acre—took up his abode there. Everyone knows the connection of Carmel with some of the leading incidents of the prophet's life (3 Kings xviii; 4 Kings iv). A cavern near the summit was then shown as the habitation of Elias, and the ruins of a spacious monastery, the history of which is unknown, covered the ground. An eyewitness, John Phocas, who visited the holy places in 1185, thus writes:—"Some years ago a white-haired monk, who was also a priest, came from Calabria, and through a revelation from the prophet Elias, established himself in this place. He enclosed a small portion of the ruins of the monastery, and built a tower and a little church, assembling in it about ten brothers, who, with him, inhabit at present this holy place." Berthold, therefore, may in one sense be considered as the founder of the Carmelite order, and its first general. On the other hand, it cannot be questioned that Berthold found hermits living on the mountain when he arrived there, attracted by the peculiar sanctity which the residence of the great prophet had conferred on the spot; these appear to have joined him, and to have accepted along with him and his immediate followers the rule which was framed for them in 1209 by Albert, patriarch of Jerusalem. These hermits may have had a long line of predecessors, nor is there any historical or moral impossibility in the assumption that holy men had lived on the mountain without interruption since the days of Elias, although positive evidence is wanting. This belief in the possible succession of a long line of saintly anchorites was gradually merged in the fixed persuasion that the very order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, such as it was in the thirteenth and following centuries, had existed there in unbroken continuity, keeping the three vows, and with hereditary succession, from the time of Elias. It was in this extreme form that the Carmelite view of the antiquity of their order was combated in the seventeenth century by the learned Papebroke, the Bollandist, who in the volumes of the "Acta Sanctorum" for March gave Lives of Berthold and Cyril, in which it was assumed that the former was the first, and the latter the third, general of the order. A violent controversy arose; several Carmelite writers published large treatises; other Jesuits came to the assistance of Papebroke; the Spanish Inquisition was induced to issue a decree censuring the published volumes of the "Acta Sanctorum;" and Rome, while refusing to adopt or ratify this censure, thought it expedient to impose silence on the disputants (1698).

The rule given to the order by the patriarch Albert was in sixteen articles. It forbade the possession of property; ordered that each hermit should live in a cell by himself; interdicted meat altogether; recommended manual labour and silence; and imposed a strict fast from the Exaltation of the Cross (Sept. 14) to Easter, Sundays being excepted.

The progress of the Mohammedan power in Palestine, after the illusory treaty entered into by the Emperor Frederic II. in 1229 with the Sultan Kameel, made it more and more difficult for Christians to live there in peace: and under their fifth general, Alan of Brittany, they abandoned Carmel and established themselves in Cyprus (1238) and other places. They held their first chapter at Aylesford in Hampshire, in 1245, and elected our countryman, St. Simon Stock, to the generalship. Under him the order was greatly extended, and entered upon a flourishing period. To this Saint Our Lady is said to have shown the Scapular in a vision. [See SCAPULAR.] After passing into Europe they found it necessary to live in common, and no longer as hermits. This, with other mitigations of the primitive rule, was sanctioned by Innocent IV., who confirmed them in 1247 under the title of Friars of Our Lady of Mount Carmel. Their habit was originally striped, but ultimately the dress by which they are so well known, the brown habit with white cloak and scapular, was adopted. They were recognised as one of the mendicant orders: our ancestors knew them as "the White Friars." Many distinguished men and eminent ecclesiastics have worn their habit. In our own country we can point to the vast and solid capacity of Thomas of Walden, confessor to Henry V., and one of the theologians at the Council of Constance, who in a work of profound learning and great eloquence, the "Doctrinale Fidei," confuted the sophistries advanced by Wyclif against the faith and discipline of the Church.

The Papal schism led to much confusion and relaxation of discipline, a portion of the order siding with the Avignon Pope and electing a different general. England remained true to Urban VI. To put an end to the dissimilarity of practice which prevailed, Eugenius IV. issued a bull in 1431, in which permission was given to eat meat three times a week, with other indulgences. But these were not accepted in all the convents. Gradually the names of Observantines and Conventuals crept in, to distinguish the Carmelites who observed the rule as ratified by Innocent IV. from those who accepted the mitigations of Eugenius. Special congregations aiming at a strict observance of the rule arose in Italy and France; among these was the congregation of Mantua, founded by the unhappy Thomas Connecte, who is noticed by Addison in the "Spectator." In England at the time of the dissolution of the monasteries, the Carmelites were in a very flourishing condition. Impartial witnesses declare that in no country of Europe did the glory of their institute shine out with greater lustre than in England. They had fifty-two houses.[1]

In London the library of the White Friars was the best to be found in the city; the books bestowed on it by Thomas Walden alone were valued at two thousand gold pieces. All these were destroyed or dispersed at the dissolution.[1]

The later glories of the order belong chiefly to Spain, and are due to the heroic virtue of a woman, St. Teresa. Carmelite nuns had first been instituted by John Soreth, general of the order in the fifteenth century. Relaxations of the rule had crept into their convents as into those of the friars. St. Teresa lived for many years in the convent of Avila, which was under the mitigated observance. Amidst great obstacles, and in the teeth of much persecution, she carried out her object of introducing a reform among the nuns by returning to the ancient rigour of the rule. She thus became the founder of the Discalced Carmelite nuns. Nor did her zeal stop here, but extended itself to a reformation of the friars, in which also, aided by the counsel of St. Peter of Alcantara, and the labours and sufferings of St. John of the Cross, who joined the new order, she was completely successful. At the time of her death, in 1582, she had assisted in the foundation of seventeen reformed convents for women and fifteen for men. These Discalced Carmelites, whose institute rapidly spread to all the Catholic countries of Europe, and to the Spanish colonies, were at first subject to the government of the unreformed order; but Clement VIII., in 1593, gave them a general of their own. forms have been introduced since that of St. Teresa in various countries, which we have not space here to notice. At present, in spite of the devastation wrought during the revolutionary epoch, and the spirit of unbelief which engenders and is encouraged by revolutions, a considerable number of Carmelite monasteries still exists. In France, though they were swept away at the first revolution, they had been re-introduced, and till lately possessed some sixty houses. But the iniquitous decree of March 29, 1880, issued by the Republican Government of France, has resulted in the violent seizure of all the houses of men, and in turning the friars adrift. In Spain, we believe, they are at present numerous.

In England there are two houses of Discalced Carmelite friars (at Kensington and Wincanton), and six nunneries —at Fulham, Notting Hill, Chichester, Wells, Lanherne, and Darlington. In Ireland there appear to be seven or eight Carmelite friaries, calced and discalced (beginning with the well-known convent in Whitefriar Street, Dublin, which stands on the site of an ancient Carmelite house founded in 1274), and eight or nine nunneries. (Hélyot; "Bibliotheca Carmelitana"; Tanner; Dugdale.)

CARNIVAL (from caro, vale, the time when we are about to say farewell to flesh-meat; or ubi caro valet—in allusion to the indulgence of the flesh in the days which precede the fast), the three days before Lent, though the name sometimes includes the whole period between February 3, the feast of St. Blasius, and Ash-Wednesday. The Carnival in Catholic countries, and in Rome itself, is a special season for feasting, dancing, masquerading and mirth of all sorts. In itself this custom is innocent, although the Church from Septuagesima onwards assumes the garb of penance, and prepares her children, by the saddened tone of her office, for the Lenten season. But the pleasures of the Carnival easily degenerate into riot, and the Church therefore specially encourages pious exercises at this time. In 1556 the Jesuits at Macerati introduced the custom of exposing the Blessed Sacrament through the Carnival. This devotion spread through the Church, and Clement XIII., in 1765, granted a plenary indulgence on certain conditions to those who take part in it.

CARTHUSIANS, ORDER OF. The founder of this celebrated order was St. Bruno, in the eleventh century. A well-known story, once inserted in the Roman Breviary, ascribes his retirement from the world to the marvellous resuscitation of a noted Paris doctor, as his body was being carried to the grave. But there is no contemporary evidence to sustain the story, and it was, probably on this account, left out of the Breviary by Urban VIII. Bruno was a native of Cologne, and gave proof of more than common piety, recollection, and mortification even from his tender years. When he was grown up, he was at first entered among the clergy of St. Cunibert's at Cologne, whence he passed to Rheims, a city then celebrated for its episcopal school. Bruno made here great progress in learning, and was appointed "scholasticus" (Fr. écolâtre); many of the leading men of the age were his pupils. He had much to suffer from the conduct of the unworthy Archbishop of Rheims, Manasses, suspended in 1077; and the resolution to quit the world seems to have arisen in him about this time, and grew in strength continually. Leaving Rheims, uncertain in what way God willed him to carry out his clearly-seen vocation, he repaired to St. Robert of Molesme, the founder of the Cistercian order, by whom he was referred to St. Hugh, Bishop of Grenoble. With six companions, Bruno presented himself to the bishop, and opened to him their desire to found an institute in which the glory of God and the good of man should be sought on a foundation of rigorous austerity and self-discipline. The good bishop was overjoyed at seeing them; in their request he saw the beginning of the fulfilment of a wonderful dream which he had had the night before. Soon afterwards he led them to the desert of the Chartreuse, an upland valley in the Alps to the north of Grenoble, more than 4,000 feet above the sea, and only to be reached by threading a gloomy and difficult ravine. High crags surround the valley on all sides; the soil is poor, the cold extreme—snow lies there most of the year—and the air is charged with fog. Bruno accepted this site with joy, and he and his companions immediately built an oratory there, and small separate cells, in imitation of the ancient Lauras of Palestine. This was in 1086, and the origin of the Carthusian order, which takes its name from Chartreuse, is dated from this foundation.

St. Bruno, when he had been only two or three years at the Chartreuse, was summoned to Rome by an imperative mandate from Urban II., who had been his pupil. With grief he left his beloved companions, the most prudent and devoted of whom, Landwin, he appointed prior in his room, and, recommending the monastery to the protection of the Abbot of Chaise Dieu, departed for Italy. He was never able to return, but after founding convents at Squillace and La Torre in Calabria, died at the last-named place in 1101. The celebrated Abbot of Cluny, Peter the Venerable, writing about forty years after St. Bruno, describes in few words the manner of life which the saint instituted, and to which his monks—the only ancient order in the Church which has never been reformed and never needed reform—have always faithfully adhered. "Their dress," he writes, "is meaner and poorer than that of other monks; so short and scanty, and so rough, that the very sight affrights one. They wear coarse hair-shirts next their skin; fast almost perpetually; eat only bran bread; never touch flesh, either sick or well; never buy fish, but eat it if given them as an alms; eat eggs and cheese on Sundays and Thursdays; on Tuesdays and Saturdays their fare is pulse or herbs boiled; on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays they take nothing but bread and water; and they have only one meal a day, except within the octaves of Christmas, Easter, Whitsuntide, Epiphany, and some other festivals. Their constant occupation is praying, reading, and manual labour, which consists chiefly in transcribing books. They say the lesser hours of the divine office in their cells at the time when the bell rings, but meet together at vespers and matins with wonderful recollection." This manner of life they seem to have followed for some time without any written rule. Guigo, the fifth prior of the Chartreuse (1228), made a collection of their customs; and in later times several other compilations of their statutes were framed, of which a complete code was arranged in 1581, and approved of by Innocent XI. in 1688. The glorious difficulty of the very perfect life aimed at by the Carthusians is recognised by the Church, which "allows religious men of any of the mendicant orders to exchange their order for that of the Carthusians, as a state of greater austerity and perfection; but no one can pass from the Carthusians to any other order, as Fagnanus, the learned canonist, proves at large."[1] The name of Chartreuse was given to each of their monasteries; this was corrupted in England into Charterhouse. Among their original customs was that of taking a walk, which they called spatiament (from the Latin spatiari), within the bounds of their desert; and to this day the monk of the Grande Chartreuse takes his daily "spaciment." The ordinary dress is entirely white; but outside the boundaries of his monastery the Carthusian wears a long black cloak and hood. In 1391 Boniface IX. formally renewed the exemption of the order from episcopal control; and in 1508 Julius II. ordained that their monasteries in every part of the world should obey the prior of the Grande Chartreuse and the chapter general of the order.

Among the distinguished men who have borne the Carthusian habit are St. Hugh, Bishop of Lincoln; Cardinal d'Albergati; the learned and holy Denis Rickel, commonly called Denis the Carthusian; and Walter Hilton (1433), whose "Ladder of Perfection," a work of mystical theology, was published by Abraham Woodhead in the seventeenth century.

The Chartreuses or Charterhouses in England at the time of the dissolution were nine in number.[2] A large proportion of the monks and friars then in England, like the secular clergy, accepted, in words at any rate, the new doctrine of the royal supremacy; but the Carthusians stood firm. Even Mr. Froude, the thoroughgoing apologist of Tudor tyranny, acknowledges that the London Carthusians met death like heroes. Haughton, their prior, and several of the monks, were hanged in 1535; one, Maurice Chauncey, accepting the supremacy, was allowed to leave England, but bitterly repented his weakness, was reconciled to the Church, and wrote an interesting and touching narrative of the whole tragedy. The remaining eight monks of the London house perished of jail-fever, foul air, and starvation, after being imprisoned some months in Newgate. The Carthusians of Shene, in Surrey, fifteen in number, withdrew to Flanders on the death of Queen Mary, and abode in various places; at the time when Alban Butler wrote they were settled at Nieuport, and were, with the Brigittine nuns of Sion [BRIGITTINES], "the only two English orders which were never dispersed."

When Hélyot wrote, early in the eighteenth century, there were 172 Carthusian houses altogether, of which five were nunneries; about seventy-five out of the whole number were in France. These were all swept away at the Revolution. The Jacobin government tried to sell the Grande Chartreuse, but no one would bid for it, on account of the poverty of the soil. After the Restoration some of the monks returning from abroad were allowed to reoccupy it; amongst these was the general, Dom Moissonnier, who, like another Simeon, died in peace eleven days after his re-entry into the beloved solitude. For a long time the monks were very poor, having to pay rent for their own barren lands to the government; but since they invented the famous liqueur named after the monastery, the revenue from the sale of which is considerable, they have been fairly well off. In 1870 they numbered about forty, with twenty lay brothers, and sixty servants.

In England, a large Carthusian monastery has been founded among the Sussex hills, near Steyning. (Hélyot; Alban Butler, Oct. 6; Tanner's "Notitia.")

CASSOCK (vestis talaris, toga subtanea, soutane). A close-fitting garment reaching to the heels (usque ad talos), which is the distinctive dress of clerics. The cassock of simple priests is black; that of bishops and other prelates, purple; that of cardinals, red; that of the Pope, white. Originally the cassock was the ordinary dress common to laymen; its use was continued by the clergy while lay people, after the immigration of the Northern nations, began to wear shorter clothes, and thus it became associated with the ecclesiastical state. The Council of Trent, De Reform. cap. 6, requires all clerics, if in sacred orders, or if they hold a benefice, to wear the clerical dress; although in Protestant countries clerics are excused from doing so in public, on account of the inconveniences likely to arise.

CASUISTRY. The science which deals with cases of conscience. [See MORAL THEOLOGY.]

CASUS. A name given to real or imaginary cases in canon law, moral theology, or ritual, collected together in order to illustrate difficult points in these branches of learning. Such a collection of cases to illustrate the "Decretum of Gratian" was made about 1200 by Benincasa Senensis; about 1245 Bernard of Bologna, afterwards Archdeacon of Compostella, made a similar collection to aid in the study of Gregory IX.'s Decretals. Since that time, collections of this kind without number, in all these three branches of learning, have appeared. At conferences of the clergy, "cases" of this kind are generally discussed.

CASUS RESERVATI. [See RESERVED CASES.]

CATACOMBS. A sketch of the present state of knowledge about the Roman Catacombs, considering the high religious interest of the subject, may fairly be expected in a work like the present. We shall briefly describe their position, explain their origin, and trace their history; then, after describing the catacomb of San Callisto, as a model of the rest, we shall show, so far as our limits will allow, what a powerful light the monuments of the catacombs supply in illustration of the life, and in evidence of the faith, of Christians in the primitive ages.

The word "catacomb" had originally no such connotation as is now attached to it; the earliest form, catacumbæ (κατά, and κύμβη, a hollow)—probably suggested by the natural configuration of the ground—was the name given to the district round the tomb of Cæcilia Metella and the Circus Romuli on the Appian Way. All through the middle ages "ad catacumbas" meant the subterranean cemetery adjacent to the far-famed basilica of St. Sebastian, in the region above-mentioned; afterwards, the signification of the term was gradually extended, and applied to all the ancient underground cemeteries near Rome, and even to similar cemeteries in other places, at Paris, for instance. The bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul were believed to have rested here nearly from the date of their martyrdom to the time of Pope Cornelius, who translated them to where they are now (Bed. "De Sex Æt. Mundi:" "corpora apostolorum de catacumbis levavit noctu"); it was therefore most natural, apart from the sacred associations which the memorials of other martyrs aroused, that for this reason alone pilgrims should eagerly visit this cemetery.

I. Some twenty-five Christian cemeteries are known, and have been more or less carefully examined; but there are many others, which, either from their having fallen into ruin, or being blocked up with earth and rubbish, remain unexplored. Those that are known and accessible are found on every side of Rome, but they are clustered most thickly at the south-east corner of the city, near the Via Appia and the Via Ardeatina. The most noteworthy of all, the cemetery of San Callisto, is close to the Appian Way; near it are those of St. Prætextatus, St. Sebastian, and St. Soteris. Passing on round the city by the east and north, we find the cemetery of Santi Quattro, near the Via Appia Nova, that of St. Ciriaca on the road to Tivoli, the extremely interesting catacomb of St. Agnes on the Via Nomentana, and that of St. Alexander, farther out from Rome on the same road. Next comes the cemetery of St. Priscilla, on the Via Salaria. Continuing on, past the Villa Borghese, we come upon the valley of the Tiber, beyond which, on the right bank of the river, we find in succession the cemeteries of Calepodius and Generosa. Crossing again to the left bank, we come upon the cemetery of St. Lucina on the Via Ostiensis, that of SS. Nereoed Achilleo (known also by the name of S. Domitilla) on the Via Ardeatina, and, finally, that of St. Balbina between the last-named road and the Appian Way.

II. The origin of the catacombs is now thoroughly understood. It was long believed that they were originally mere sand-pits, arenariæ, out of which sand was dug for building purposes, and to which the Christians resorted, partly for the sake of concealment, partly because the softness of the material lent itself to any sort of excavation. This was the view of Baronius and of scholars in general down to the present century, when the learned Jesuit, F. Marchi, took the subject in hand. He made personal researches in the catacomb of St. Agnes, and gradually the true origin and mode of construction of these cemeteries broke upon his mind. His more celebrated pupil, the Commendatore de Rossi, aided by his brothers, continued his explorations, and has given to the world a colossal work on the Roman Catacombs, which Dr. Northcote and Mr. Brownlow made the foundation of their interesting book, "Roma Sotterranea." Padre Marchi drew attention to the fact that among the volcanic strata of the Roman Campagna, three deposits are especially noticeable—a hard building stone, called the tufa litoide; a soft stone, the tufa granolare; and a sandstone of scarcely any coherency, called pozzolana. The sandpits, arenariæ, of course occur in beds of this pozzolana; and if they had been the origin of the catacombs, the latter would have been wholly or chiefly excavated in the same beds. But in point of fact the catacombs are almost entirely found in the tufa granolare, which exactly suited the purposes which the early Christians had in view. In the first place, they were obliged by the imperial laws to bury their dead outside the walls of the city. Secondly, they naturally would not place the cemeteries at a greater distance than they could help; and in fact all the catacombs above named, except that of St. Alexander, are within two miles and a half of the city walls.[1] Thirdly, the tufa granolare, being softer than the tufa litoide, the necessary galleries, chambers, and loculi (receptacles for the dead) could more easily be worked in it, while, on the other hand, it was sufficiently coherent to allow of its being excavated freely without danger of the roof and sides of the excavations falling in or crumbling away. The pozzolana was softer, but from its crumbling nature narrow galleries could not be run in it, nor loculi hollowed out, without the employment of a great deal of masonry for the sake of security, as may be seen in the two or three instances of arenariæ turned into catacombs which do exist: thus greater expense and trouble would arise in the end from resorting to it than from excavating in the tufa granolare.

If it be asked why the Roman Christians did not bury their dead in open-air cemeteries, the answer is twofold. In the first place, the Church grew up amid persecution, and the Christians naturally strove to screen themselves and their doings from public observation as much as possible, in the burial of their dead as in other matters. The sepulchral inscriptions and decorations which they could safely affix to the graves of their beloved ones in the subterranean gloom of the catacombs, could not with common prudence have been employed on tombs exposed to public view. In the second place, the needs of prayer and the duty of public worship were in this manner reconciled with the duty of sepulture to an extent not otherwise, under their circumstances, attainable. The relatives might pray at the tomb of a departed kinsman; the faithful gather round the "memory" of a martyr; the Christian mysteries might be celebrated in subterranean chapels, and on altars hewn out of the rock, with a convenience, secrecy, and safety, which, if the ordinary mode of burial had been followed, could not have been secured. Nor was the practice a novelty when the Christians resorted to it. Even Pagan underground tombs existed, though the general custom of burning the dead, which prevailed under the emperors before Constantine, caused them to be of rare occurrence; but the Jewish cemeteries, used under the pressure of motives very similar to those which acted upon the Christians, had long been in operation, and are in part distinguishable to this day.

The modus operandi appears to have been as follows. In ground near the city, obtained by purchase or else the property of some rich Christian, an area, or cemetery "lot," was marked out, varying in extent but commonly having not less than a frontage of a hundred and a depth of two hundred feet. At one corner of this area an excavation was made and a staircase constructed; then narrow galleries, usually a little more than two feet in width, with roof flat or slightly arched, were carried round the whole space, leaving enough of the solid rock on either side to admit of oblong niches (loculi)—large enough to hold from one to three bodies, at varying distances, both vertically and laterally, according to the local strength of the material—being excavated in the walls. After burial, the loculus was hermetically sealed by a slab set in mortar, so that the proximity of the dead body might not affect the purity of the air in the catacomb. Besides these loculi in the walls, cubicula, or chambers, like our family vaults, were excavated in great numbers; these were entered by doors from the galleries, and had loculi in their walls like the galleries themselves. There were also arcosolia—when above the upper surface of a loculus containing the body of a martyr or confessor, the rock was excavated, so as to leave an arched vault above, and a flat surface beneath on which the Eucharist could be celebrated—and "table-tombs," similar in all respects to the arcosolia except that the excavation was quadrangular instead of being arched. Openings were frequently made between two or more adjoining cubicula, so as to allow, while the Divine Mysteries were being celebrated at an arcosolium in one of them, of a considerable number of worshippers being present. When the walls of the circumambient galleries were filled with the dead, cross galleries were made, traversing the area at such distances from each other as the strength of the stone permitted, the walls of which were pierced with niches as before. But this additional space also became filled up, and then the fossors were set to work to burrow deeper in the rock, and a new series of galleries and chambers, forming a second underground story or piano, was constructed beneath the first. Two, three, or even four such additional stories have been found in a cemetery. Another way of obtaining more space was by lowering the floor of the galleries, and piercing with niches the new wall-surface thus supplied. It is obvious that expedients like these could only be adopted in dry and deeply-drained ground, and accordingly we always find that it is the hills near Rome in which the cemeteries were excavated—the valleys were useless for the purpose; hence, contrary to what was once believed, no system of general communication between the different catacombs ever existed. Such communication, however, was often effected, when two or more cemeteries lay contiguous to each other on the same hill, and all kinds of structural complications were the result; see the detailed account in "Roma Sotterranea" of the growth and gradual transformation of the cemetery of San Callisto.

III. With regard to the history of the catacombs, a few leading facts are all that can here be given. In the first two centuries, the use of the catacombs by the Christians was little interfered with; they filled up the area with dead, and decorated the underground chambers with painting and sculpture, much as their means and taste suggested. In the third century persecution became fierce, and the Christians were attacked in the catacombs. Staircases were then destroyed, passages blocked up, and new modes of ingress and egress devised, so as to defeat as much as possible the myrmidons of the law; and the changes thus made can in many cases be still recognised and understood. On the cessation of persecution, after A.D. 300, the catacombs, in which many martyrs had perished, became a place of pilgrimage; immense numbers of persons crowded into them; and different Popes—particularly St. Damasus, early in the fifth century—caused old staircases to be enlarged, and new ones to be made, and luminaria (openings for admitting light and air) to be broken through from the cubicula to the surface of the ground, in order to give more accommodation to the pious throng. These changes also can be recognised. Burial in the catacombs naturally did not long survive the concession of entire freedom and peace to the Church; but still they were looked upon as holy places consecrated by the blood of martyrs, and as such were visited by innumerable pilgrims. In the seventh and eighth centuries Lombard invaders desecrated, plundered and in part destroyed the catacombs. This led to a period of translations, commencing in the eighth century and culminating with Pope Paschal (A.D. 817), by which all the relics of the Popes and principal martyrs and confessors which had hitherto lain in the catacombs were removed for greater safety to the churches of Rome. After that, the catacombs were abandoned, and in great part closed; and not till the sixteenth century did the interest in them revive. The names of Onufrio Panvini, Bosio, and Boldetti are noted in connection with the renewed investigations of which they were the object; and since the appearance of the work of the Padre Marchi already mentioned, the interest awakened in all Christian countries by the remarkable discoveries announced has never for a moment waned.

IV. Having thus attempted to sketch the origin and trace the history of the catacombs, we proceed to describe what may now be seen in the most important portion of the best known among them all —the cemetery of San Callisto. Entering it from a vineyard near the Appian Way, the visitor descends a broad flight of steps, fashioned by Pope Damasus from the motive above mentioned, and finds himself in a kind of vestibule, on the stuccoed walls of which, honey-combed with loculi, are a quantity of rude inscriptions in Greek and Latin, some of which are thirteen and fourteen centuries old, scratched by the pilgrims who visited out of devotion the places where Popes and Martyrs who had fought a good fight for Christ, and often their own kinsfolk and friends, lay in the peaceful gloom, awaiting the resurrection. By following a narrow gallery to the right, a chamber is reached which is called the Papal Crypt; for here beyond all doubt the bodies of many Popes of the third century, after Zephyrinus (203–217) had secured this cemetery for the use of the Christians and committed it to the care of his deacon Callistus, were laid, and here they remained till they were removed by Paschal to the Vatican crypts. This is proved by the recent discovery, in and near the Papal Crypt, of the slabs bearing the original inscriptions in memory of the Popes Eutychian, Anteros, Fabian, and Lucius. A passage leads out of the crypt into the cubiculum of St. Cæcilia, where, as De Rossi has almost demonstrated, the body of the saint, martyred in the first half of the third century, was originally deposited by Pope Urban, though it was afterwards removed by Paschal to her church in the Trastevere, where it now lies under the high-altar. In this cubiculum are paintings of St. Cæcilia and of Our Lord, the latter "according to the Byzantine type, with rays of glory behind it in the form of a Greek cross." But these paintings are late—not earlier than the tenth century. Besides the Papal Crypt and the chamber of St. Cæcilia, there are in this part of the cemetery "several cubicula interesting for their paintings, chiefly referable to Baptism and the Eucharist, the fish being the principal emblem of the latter. In one of these crypts is a painting of four male figures with uplifted hands, each with his name, placed over an arcosolium; in another are representations of peacocks, the emblem of immortality; in a third, Moses striking the rock, and ascending to the mount; in a fourth, a grave-digger (fossor) surrounded with the implements of his trade; in a fifth, the Good Shepherd, with the miracle of the paralytic taking up his bed; in a sixth, a banquet of seven persons, supposed to be the seven disciples alluded to in the twenty-first chapter of St. John's Gospel. These paintings, as well as the greater part of the catacomb, are referred to the last halt of the third century."[1]

V. For a detailed answer, accompanied with proofs, to the question, what testimony the catacombs bear to the nature of the religious belief and life of the early Christians, the reader is referred to the pages of "Roma Sotterranea," or to the larger work of De Rossi. He will there find sufficient evidence to convince him of the truth of two main propositions—(1) that the religion of those Christians was a sacramental religion; (2) that it was the reverse of puritanical: that is, that it disdained the use of no external helps which human art and skill could furnish, in the effort to symbolise and enforce spiritual truth. With reference to the first proposition, let him consider how the sacrament of Baptism is typically represented in the catacombs by paintings of Noe in the ark, the rock smitten and water gushing forth, a fisherman drawing fish out of the water accompanied by a man baptising, and the paralytic carrying his bed ("Roma Sotterranea," p. 265); and also how the mystery of the Eucharist is still more frequently and strikingly portrayed by pictures in which baskets of bread are associated with fish, the fish being the well-known emblem of Our Lord.[1] The second proposition is so abundantly proved by the remains of Christian art of very ancient date still to be seen in the catacombs, in spite of the havoc and ruin of fifteen centuries, that it would be a waste of words to attempt to establish it at length. Adopting the general forms and methods of the contemporary Pagan art, but carefully eliminating whatever in it was immoral or superstitious, we find the Christian artists employing Biblical or symbolical subjects as the principal figures in each composition, while filling in their pictures with decorative forms and objects—such as fabulous animals, scroll-work, foliage, fruit, flowers, and birds—imitated from or suggested by the pre-existing heathen art. A type for which they had a peculiar fondness was that of the Good Shepherd. The Blessed Virgin and Child, with a figure standing near supposed to be Isaias, is represented in an exceedingly beautiful but much injured painting on the vaulted roof of a loculus in the cemetery of St. Priscilla. De Rossi believes this painting "to belong almost to the apostolic age" ("Roma Sotterranea," p. 258). Another favourite type of Our Lord was Orpheus, who by his sweet music drew all creatures to hear him. The vine painted with so much freedom and grace of handling on the roof of the entrance to the cemetery of Domitilla is also, in De' Rossi's opinion, work of the first century. ("Roma Sotterranea," Northcote and Brownlow; Murray's "Handbook of Rome.")

CATAFALQUE. An erection like a bier placed during Masses of the dead, when the corpse itself is not there, in the centre of the church, or in some other suitable place, surrounded with burning lights and covered with black cloth. It is also called "feretrum," "castrum doloris," &c. (Merati's "Novæ Observationes" on Gavantus," Part ii. tit. 13.)

CATECHISM. A summary of Christian doctrine, usually in the form of question and answer, for the instruction of the Christian people. From the beginning of her history, the Church fulfilled the duty of instructing those who came to her for baptism. Catechetical schools were established, and catechetical instruction was carefully and methodically given. We can still form an accurate idea of the kind of instruction given in the early Church, for Cyril of Jerusalem has left sixteen books of catechetical discourses, explaining the Creed to the candidates for baptism, and five more in which he sets forth for the benefit of the newly-baptised, the nature of the three sacraments (Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist) which they had just received. St. Augustine wrote a treatise on catechising, at the request of Deo Gratias, a deacon and catechist at Carthage. When the world became Christian there was no longer the same necessity for instructing converts, but the children, and, indeed, the people generally, still needed catechetical instruction. Hence we find a council held at Paris in 829 deploring the neglect of catechetical instruction, while the English Council of Lambeth in 1281 requires parish-priests to instruct their people four times a year in the principal parts of Christian doctrine—viz. the articles of the Creed, commandments, sacraments, &c. The treatise of Gerson, "De Parvulis ad Christum trahendis," gives some idea of catechetical instruction towards the close of the middle ages.

Catechetical instruction was one of the subjects which occupied the Council of Trent, and the Fathers arranged that a Catechism should be drawn up by a commission and be approved by the council. This plan fell through, and they put the whole matter in the Pope's hands. Pius IV. entrusted the work to four theologians—viz. Calinius, Archbishop of Zara; Fuscararius (Foscarari), Bishop of Modena; Marinus, Archbishop of Lanciano; and Fureirius (Fureiro), a Portuguese. All of them, except the first, were Dominicans. Scholars were appointed to see to the purity of style. St. Charles Borromeo took a great part in assisting the undertaking. In 1564 the book was finished,

[1] There were other reasons for this; but the fact that the initials of the Greek words signifying, "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour," made up the word ΙΧΘΥΣ, fish, undoubtedly had much to do with the general adoption of the emblem.

whereupon it was examined by a new commission under Cardinal Sirletus. Towards the close of 1566 the Catechism appeared, under the title "Catechismus Romanus, ex Decreto Concilii Tridentini, Pii V. Pont. Max. jussu editus. Romæ, in ædibus Populi Romani, apud Aldum Manutium." The original edition contains no chapters and no answers. This Catechism possesses very high, though not absolute, authority, and has been regarded as a model of clearness, simplicity and purity of language, of method and of doctrinal precision. But it was not fitted for direct use in catechetical instruction, being intended for parish priests and others who have to catechise rather than for those who receive instruction. Catechisms, therefore, of various sizes have been prepared by bishops for their dioceses, or, as in England, the bishops in concert approve a Catechism for use in the whole country or province.

CATECHIST. A name originally given to those who instructed persons preparing for baptism. Catechists were in early times also called ναυτόλογοι, because they brought the sailors on board the ship of the Church.

CATECHUMENS. Those who were being instructed and prepared for baptism. We meet with the first mention of catechumens in Justin Martyr, in Tertullian, and in the Clementines. Tertullian distinguishes two classes of catechumens: viz. the "novitioli," or beginners, and the "aquam adituri," or those who were nearly ready for baptism and were admitted to the sermon and liturgy. In the Apostolic Constitutions, the catechumens are classified as (1) "audientes" or ἀκροώμενοι—i.e. "hearers" who attended the sermon; (2) "genuflectentes" or γονυκλίνοντες, who also assisted at the prayers which followed the sermon, and received the bishop's blessing on bended knee; (3) the "competentes" or φωτιζόμενοι, who were allowed to hear the full statement of Christian mysteries, particularly the doctrine of the Eucharist. There was a famous catechetical school at Alexandria. Usually catechumens remained under instruction for two or three years, and often longer, but the time of probation was shortened when there was sufficient reason. (From Kraus, "Kirchengeschichte," p. 86.)

CATHARI (Gr. "pure"). A medieval sect of Manichæans, commonly called Albigenses q.v.

CATHEDRA: EX CATHEDRA. Cathedra, in the ecclesiastical sense, means (1) the chair in which the bishop sits. It was placed in early times behind the altar, which did not stand, as it usually does now, against the wall, but was surrounded by the choir. The wooden chair which St. Peter is said to have used, is still preserved in the Vatican basilica. Eusebius relates that the chair of St. James still existed in Jerusalem down to the time of Constantine. The chair of St. Mark at Jerusalem was regarded with such religious awe that Peter of Alexandria, archbishop and martyr, did not dare to sit upon it, though it was used by his successors. (Thomassin, "Traité des Festes.")

(2) Cathedra was used by a natural extension of meaning for the authority of the bishop who occupied it, so that the feast of the Cathedra or chair commemorated the day on which the bishop entered on his office. Thus we have three sermons of St. Leo on the "natalis cathedræ suæ"—i.e. his elevation to the pontificate. In the Sacramentary of St. Gregory we find a Mass for "the Chair of St. Peter," on the 24th of February. According to John Belith, a liturgical writer of the middle ages, this feast was intended to celebrate St. Peter's episcopate both at Antioch and Rome. A feast of St. Peter's chair is mentioned in a sermon attributed to St. Augustine, and in a canon of the Second Council of Tours, which met in 567. In the course of the middle ages, the feast in February was associated with St. Peter's chair at Antioch. Paul IV., in a Bull of the year 1558, complains that although the feast of St. Peter's chair at Rome was celebrated in France and Spain, it was forgotten in Rome itself, although the feast of his chair at Antioch was kept in Rome. Accordingly Paul IV. ordered that the feast of St. Peter's chair at Rome should be observed on January 18. The feast of St. Peter's chair at Antioch is kept on February 22. (Thomassin. ib.)

(3) Cathedra is taken as a symbol of authoritative doctrinal teaching. Our Lord said that the scribes and Pharisees sat "super cathedram Moysis"—i.e. on the chair of Moses. Here plainly it is not a material chair, of which Christ speaks, but the "chair," as Jerome says, is a metaphor for the doctrine of the law. This metaphor became familiar in Christian literature. Thus Jerome speaks of the "chair of Peter and the faith praised by apostolic mouth." Later theologians use "ex cathedra" in a still more special sense, and employ it to mark those definitions in faith and morals which the Pope, as teacher of all Christians, imposes on their belief. The phrase is comparatively modern, and Billuart adduces no instance of its use before 1305. It is often alleged that the theologians explain the words "ex cathedra" in many different ways, but a clear and authoritative account of the meaning is given by the Vatican Council, which declares that the Pope is infallible "when he speaks 'ex cathedra'—i.e. when, exercising his office as the pastor and teacher of all Christians, he, in virtue of his supreme apostolic authority, defines a doctrine concerning faith and morals, to be held by the whole Church." (From Ballerini, "De Primatu," and the Bull "Pastor æternus," cap. iv.)

CATHEDRAL (καθέδρα, the raised seat of the bishop). The cathedral church in every diocese is that church in which the bishop has his chair or seat; whence see, the English form of siège. It is sometimes called simply Domus, "the house" (Duomo, Ital.; Dom, Ger.); for, as "palace" sufficiently indicates the residence of a king, "so the Lord's house, which is the cathedral church, the palace of the king of kings, and the ordinary seat of the supreme pastor of a city and diocese, is sufficiently denoted by the single word Domus." (Ferraris, in Ecclesia.) A cathedral was in early times called the Matrix Ecclesia, but that name is now given to any church which has other churches subject to it.

The establishment of a cathedral church, the conversion of a collegiate church into a cathedral, and the union of two or more cathedrals under the same bishop, are all measures which cannot be legally taken without the approbation of the Pope. The temporal power has often performed these and the like acts by way of usurpation, as when the revolutionary government of France reduced the number of French dioceses from more than a hundred and thirty to sixty; but a regular and lawful state of things in such a case can only be restored by the State's entering into a convention with the Holy See, which is always ready, without abandoning principle, to conform its action to the emergent necessities of the times. Thus, in the case just mentioned, by the Concordat with Napoleon in 1802, Rome sanctioned the permanent suppression of many old sees, in consequence of which the French episcopate now numbers eighty-four bishops instead of the larger number existing before the Revolution. Analogous changes are provided for in the Anglican communion by the theory of the Royal Supremacy, though this theory has been slightly modified by the progress of political development since the Reformation. The sovereign is still supreme in theory "in all causes and over all persons, ecclesiastical as well as civil," within the Anglican communion; but the supremacy cannot be exercised in any important matter without the consent of the majority of the House of Commons, expressed through a responsible ministry. An Act of Parliament, embodying as it does the united will and action of sovereign and Parliament, solves all difficulties. Thus in 1833 ten Protestant sees in Ireland were suppressed at a stroke, and within the last few years several suffragan sees, at Nottingham and elsewhere, have been erected—always by Act of Parliament. In every such case, whatever legality the Act may have is solely due to the action of the temporal power; ecclesiastical authority has nothing to do with it.

The Council of Trent forbids the holding of more than one cathedral church, or the holding of a cathedral along with a parish church, by the same bishop.[1] It enjoins that ordinations shall, so far as possible, be publicly celebrated in cathedral churches, and in the presence of the canons.[2]

CATHEDRAL and MONASTIC SCHOOLS. [See SCHOOLS.]

CATHEDRATICUM. This payment, as originally regulated by the Second Council of Braga (572), was a visitation fee due from every parish church in his diocese to the bishop on the occasion of his annual visit to it. The amount was two shillings (solidi) in gold. In process of time coins of greater value were tendered—thus in the kingdom of Naples the cathedraticum was considered to be two ducats—and when such had become the established custom a return to the smaller money was not allowed. Wherever there is a beneficed clergy this fee is still legally due to the bishop, nor can any period of actual immunity from the burden, however prolonged, confer a claim to future exemption. But since the Council of Trent it has been customary to pay it in synod, not during the visitation; whence it is also called "Synodaticum." The churches and monasteries of the regular clergy are exempt from the payment of the Cathedraticum, though it must be paid on account of all secular benefices which are in the possession of monasteries. (Ferraris; Fleury, "Hist. Eccl." xxxiv.)

CATHOLIC ("general" or universal). The word occurs in profane authors—e.g. in Polybius—but among Christians it received a special or technical sense, and was applied to the true Church, spread throughout the world, in order to distinguish it from heretical sects. Thus one of the very earliest Christian writers, Ignatius of Antioch, says, "Where Christ is, there is the Catholic Church; where the bishop is, there must the people be also." Thus "Catholic" became the recognised name of the Church. As "heresy," Clement of Alexandria tells us, denotes separation (since heresy signifies individual choice), so the words "Catholic Church" imply unity subsisting among many members. Again, St. Augustine in his epistle against the Donatists, tells them that the question at issue is "Where is the Church?" He appeals to the traditional name "Catholic Church," which is given to one body and to one body only; he proves that the name has been given rightly, as is shown by the very fact that the Catholic Church, unlike the Donatist sect, is diffused throughout the world; and he concludes that as the Church is one, as this one Church is the Catholic Church, as the Catholic Church is the body of Christ, therefore that he who is without its pale cannot "obtain Christian salvation."

The name "Catholic" was also applied from very early times to individual members of the Church. The use occurs e.g. in Cyprian, and the saying of Pacian (Ep. 1 ad Sempron.) is familiar to everybody: "Christian is my name; Catholic is my surname." Lastly, the word "Catholic" is used of the faith which the Church of God holds. We meet with the phrase "Catholic faith" in Prudentius, and frequently of course in later writers. (For CATHOLIC CHURCH see CHURCH OF CHRIST.)

"Catholic" is also used in various subsidiary senses, viz.:

(1) Of letters addressed to the faithful in general, whether by the Apostles, who wrote "Catholic epistles" as distinct from Epistles to the Galatians, &c., or by later bishops. (See Euseb. iv. 23.)

(2) In Greek, of cathedral churches as distinct from parish churches; of the chief church as distinct from oratories; and, in the later Byzantine period, of parish as distinct from monastic chapels.

(3) Catholicus, originally a civil title used during Constantine's time in Africa and given apparently to the "procurator fisci," was bestowed on the Bishop of Seleucia, as representing the Patriarch of Antioch, and also on the chief ecclesiastic among the Persian Nestorians. The title was also current among Armenians and Ethiopians. It is said to have denoted a primate with several metropolitans under him, but himself subject to a patriarch. [See CATHOLICUS.]

(4) "Catholic thrones" was a title given to the four patriarchal sees.

(5) "Catholic King" was a title given to Pipin (767), and other kings of France (Froissart says it was borne by Philip of Valois), who were afterwards called "Most Christian." "Catholic King" became in modern times the usual title of the Spanish sovereigns. The title "Catholic" was conferred by Alexander VI. on Ferdinand and Isabella. (Kraus, "Real Encyclopädie;" and for the title "Catholic King" see also Fleury, cxvii. 11.)

CATHOLICUS. Certain Oriental patriarchs in Mesopotamia, Armenia, and Persia have anciently borne and perhaps still bear this name. It must have been intended to signify the wide sweep of the jurisdiction which the bearer of this dignity enjoyed over the provinces and dioceses under his rule. Yet the catholici were never placed on a level with the patriarchs of the five great sees, Rome, Jerusalem, Antioch, Alexandria, and Constantinople. On the erection of the Armenian church, through the labours of Gregory the Illuminated, early in the fourth century, its episcopal head was named "Catholicos." As time went on we find him indifferently styled the Catholic of Persia or of the Armenians. There was also a Catholic of Seleucia on the Tigris. Both these, after the general revolt of the Oriental churches against the Council of Chalcedon, lost the orthodox faith; one was Monophysite, the other Nestorian. The Nestorian Catholic of Seleucia had many archbishops and bishops under his jurisdiction, whose dioceses are said to have reached even beyond the Ganges. Both were originally subject to the Patriarch of Antioch; but the Catholicus of Seleucia, pleading the remoteness of his see, obtained the consent of the Patriarch to his ordination of archbishops by his own sole authority; and the concession of this right was almost equivalent to the erection of a new patriarchate. Thus we find the Arabic canons of Nice directing that the Patriarch of Seleucia shall have the sixth place in councils, after the five patriarchs above mentioned, and that the seventh should be assigned, with the title of Catholicos, to the patriarch of the Ethiopians. Persecution seems to have driven the Armenian Catholic out of Persia; in the fifteenth century we find him established at Sis in Cilicia, but almost isolated there, and knowing little of what went on in the real Armenia. This state of things led to the assumption of patriarchal power by the Abbot of Echmiadzin, near Mount Ararat, and by his successors down to the present day. Latterly, the Armenian uniate Church, which is in communion with the Holy See, has been prospering and advancing; the late patriarch of this Church, Mgr. Hassoun, who resided at Constantinople, was made a Cardinal (d. 1884); the Kupelianist schism has been extinguished; and there is a fair prospect of the return of the whole Armenian nation to Catholic unity. [See ARMENIAN CHRISTIANS.]

Anastasius the Sinaite, writing in the seventh century, speaks of a Catholicus of the Nestorians, who was obeyed by a great number of bishops and metropolitans. (Thomassin, "Vetus et Nova Ecclesiæ Disciplina.")

CELEBRANT. The priest who actually offers Mass, as distinct from others who assist him in doing so. Celebration of Mass is equivalent to offering Mass. But "celebrant" is also used by good liturgical writers—e.g. by Gavantus—for the chief officiant at other solemn offices, such as vespers.

CELESTINIAN HERMITS. A branch of the Franciscans, authorised by St. Celestine V. in 1294, and named after him. The object of their institution was to practise the rule of St. Francis with greater exactitude. They suffered much persecution, and soon after the death of their first superior, Liberatus, ceased to exist as a separate body.

CELESTINIANS. This order was founded about 1254 by the holy hermit Peter of Morone, and took the above name after the elevation of their founder to the supreme pontificate, with the title of Celestine V., in 1294. Its rule was austere; the religious had to rise at 2 A.M. to say matins; abstained perpetually from meat unless in case of illness, and fasted every day from the Exaltation of the Cross to Easter, and twice a week for the rest of the year. They increased rapidly, and spread into France and Germany, but do not appear to have ever established themselves in England. Most of their priories in Germany were in those provinces which the movement begun by Luther most affected, and they consequently perished. In the early part of the eighteenth century there were ninety-six priories in the Italian, and twenty-one in the French province; the chief or mother house being the convent of the Holy Ghost at Morone, near Sulmona, the only abbey in the order. The French Celestinians, whose principal house was at Paris, were included among the fifteen hundred convents which, upon various grounds more or less specious, were suppressed by the commission of 1766 presided over by the contemptible Lomenie de Brienne, Archbishop of Toulouse. The order has not since been revived in France. Of the once numerous Italian priories very few now exist.

CELIBACY of the clergy. The law of the Western Church forbids persons living in the married state to be ordained, and persons in holy orders to marry. A careful distinction must be made between the principles on which the law of celibacy is based and the changes which have taken place in the application of the principle.

The principles which have induced the Church to impose celibacy on her clergy are (a) that they may serve God with less restraint, and with undivided heart (see 1 Cor. vii. 32); and (β) that, being called to the altar, they may embrace the life of continence, which is holier than that of marriage. That continence is a more holy state than that of marriage is distinctly affirmed in the words of our blessed Lord ("There are eunuchs who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He that can receive it, let him receive it"). It is taught by St. Paul ("He that giveth his virgin in marriage doeth well, and he that giveth her not, doeth better") and by St. John (Apoc. xiv. 4). Christian antiquity speaks with one voice on this matter, and the Council of Trent, sess. xxiv. De Matr. can. 10, anathematises those who deny that "it is more blessed to remain in virginity or in celibacy than to be joined in marriage." Thus all Catholics are bound to hold that celibacy is the preferable state, and that it is specially desirable for the clergy. It does not, however, follow from this that the Church is absolutely bound to impose a law of celibacy on her ministers, nor has she, as a matter of fact, always done so.

There does not seem to have been any Apostolic legislation on the matter, except that it was required of a bishop that he should have been only once married. In early times, however, we find a law of celibacy, though it is one which differs from the present Western law, in full force. Paphnutius, who at the Council of Nicæa resisted an attempt to impose a continent life on the clergy, still admits that, according to ancient tradition, a cleric must not marry after ordination. This statement is confirmed by the Apostolic Constitutions, vi. 17, which forbid bishops, priests, and deacons to marry, while the 27th (al. 25th) Apostolic Canon contains the same prohibition. One of the earliest councils, that of Neocæsarea (between 314–325), threatens a priest who married after ordination with degradation to the lay state. Even a deacon could marry in one case only—viz. if at his ordination he had stipulated for liberty to do so, as is laid down by the Council of Ancyra, in 314. Thus it was the recognised practice of the ancient Church to prohibit the marriage of those already priests, and this discipline is still maintained in the East.

A change was made in the West by the 33rd Canon of Elvira (in 305 or 306). It required bishops, priests, and all who served the altar ("positis in ministerio") to live, even if already married, in continence. The Council of Nicæa refused to impose this law on the whole Church, but it prevailed in the West. It was laid down by a synod of Carthage in 390, by Innocent I. 20 years later; while Jerome (against Jovinian) declares that a priest, who has "always to offer sacrifice for the people, must always pray, and therefore always abstain from marriage." Leo and Gregory the Great, and the Eighth Council of Toledo in 653, renewed the prohibitions against the marriage of subdeacons.

So the law stood when Hildebrand, afterwards Gregory VII., began to exercise a decisive influence in the Church. Leo IX., Nicolas II., Alexander II., and Hildebrand himself when he came to be Pope, issued stringent decrees against priests living in concubinage. They were forbidden to say Mass or even to serve at the altar; they were to be punished with deposition, and the faithful were warned not to hear their Mass. So far Gregory only fought against the corruption of the times, and it is mere ignorance to represent him as having instituted the law of celibacy. But about this time a change did occur in the canon law. A series of synods from the beginning of the twelfth century declared the marriage of persons in holy orders to be not only unlawful but invalid. With regard to persons in minor orders, they were allowed for many centuries to serve in the Church while living as married men. From the twelfth century, it was laid down that if they married they lost the privileges of the clerical state. However, Boniface VIII., in 1300, permitted them to act as clerics, if they had been only once married and then to a virgin, provided they had the permission of the bishop and wore the clerical habit. This law of Pope Boniface was renewed by the Council of Trent, sess. xxiii. cap. 6, De Reform. The same Council, can. 9, sess. xxiv., again pronounced the marriage of clerks in holy orders null and void. At present, in the West, a married man can receive holy orders only if his wife fully consents and herself makes a vow of chastity. If the husband is to be consecrated bishop, the wife must enter a religious order.

We may now turn to the East, and sketch the changes which the law of celibacy has undergone among the Greeks. In the time of the Church-historian Socrates (about 450), the same law of clerical celibacy which obtained among the Latins was observed in Thessaly, Macedonia, and Achaia. Further, the case of Synesius in 410 proves that it was unusual for bishops to live as married men, for he had, on accepting his election as bishop, to make a stipulation that he should be allowed to live with his wife. The synod in Trullo (692) requires bishops, if married, to separate from their wives, and forbids all clerics to marry after the subdiaconate. However, a law of Leo the Wise (886–911) permitted subdeacons, deacons, and priests, who had married after receiving their respective orders, not indeed to exercise sacred functions, but still to remain in the ranks of the clergy and exercise such offices (e.g. matters of administration) as were consistent with the marriage which they had concluded.

The practical consequences of these enactments are (1) that Greek candidates for the priesthood usually leave the seminaries before being ordained deacons, and return, having concluded marriage, commonly with daughters of clergymen; (2) that secular priests live as married men, but cannot, on the death of their wives, marry again; (3) that bishops are usually chosen from the monks. (From Hefele, "Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte, Archäologie und Liturgik.")

CELL. (1) A colony or offshoot from some large monastery. Cells were first heard of in the Benedictine order, and were usually planted on estates that had been granted to the mother house. They were also called "provostships," "obediences," or "priories." They were originally ruled by provosts or deans, removable at the discretion of the abbot of the mother house. Some cells were of sufficient importance to be called abbeys; but their abbots could only be elected with the consent and subject to the confirmation of the abbot of the mother house. The inmates of the cell were bound to render yearly a stated portion of their revenues to the house on which they depended, and to present themselves there in person on particular days. Instances of important cells in this country were, Tynemouth Priory, depending on St. Alban's; Leighton Buzzard, on Woburn (Cistercian); and Bermondsey, a cell of the Cluniac abbey of La Charité, in France. This last is also an instance of an "alien priory," of which there were great numbers in England at the dissolution. (Ferraris, Monasterium.)

(2) The separate chamber or hut of any monk, friar, or hermit, is popularly termed his "cell," as in Milton's lines—

> And may at length my weary age
> Find out the peaceful hermitage,
> The hairy gown, and mossy cell.

(3) In primitive times the name "cella" was given to a small memorial chapel, erected over the tomb of some friend or relative in a sepulchral area, in which "agapæ" and commemorative celebrations were held on the anniversary of death.

CEMETERY (κοιμητήριον, sleeping-place). In this article only burial-grounds or churchyards "sub dio," or in the open air, will be noticed; for subterranean burial-places see CATACOMBS.

Even during the ages of persecution open air cemeteries were in use at Rome, as has been shown by De Rossi, as well as in the provinces. Thus the cemetery named after Callistus, who was placed in charge of it by Pope Zephyrinus, was partly above and partly below ground; that at Vienne on the Rhone entirely above ground. After Constantine, subterranean interment was of course abandoned. The old Roman law, as old as the Twelve Tables, which forbade intramural sepulture, was gradually disregarded; after 619 it became common to bury at Rome within the walls; and it is only in modern times that the sounder practice of antiquity has been everywhere restored.

A cemetery or churchyard, in order to be fit to receive the bodies of Christians, must first be consecrated and set apart by the bishop for that purpose. The rite may be seen in the Pontificale. From its tenor it is evident that it contemplates the burial of none but Christians within the space to be consecrated; indiscriminate burial is therefore an abuse. The admission to ecclesiastical burial in a cemetery so consecrated is regarded as a species of communion. Hence it has ever been held that the burial of excommunicated persons, and others with whom in their life we could not communicate, in a Catholic cemetery, is unlawful. If such an interment has been violently effected, Innocent III. ordered that the remains of the excommunicated person so buried among those of the faithful should, if they could be distinguished, be exhumed; if not, that the cemetery should be reconciled by the aspersion of holy water solemnly blessed, as at the dedication of a church. In a recent instance in Canada, where the civil power, acting upon the sentence of a lay tribunal, forcibly effected the burial of an excommunicated person in the Catholic cemetery, the Bishop of Montreal, Mgr. Bourget, laid the portion of the cemetery so desecrated under an interdict.[1]

Cemeteries enjoyed the same right and degree of asylum, in the case of criminals fleeing to them for shelter, as the churches to which they were attached.

The Council of Lyons (1244) ordered that all trading, marketing, adjudication, trial of criminals, and secular business of every kind, in churchyards no less than

[1] See an account of the "Guibord case," in the Catholic Review of New York, September 25, 1875. A French Canadian priest writes to us (May 5, 1881):—"The man was buried by force in the Catholic burying-ground, and the spot is considered with horror by all Catholics visiting that grand and imposing Montreal cemetery."

in churches, should be put an end to. (Ferraris, Cœmeterium.)

CENSURE may be defined as a spiritual penalty, imposed for the correction and amendment of offenders, by which a baptised person, who has committed a crime and is contumacious, is deprived by ecclesiastical authority of the use of certain spiritual advantages. Thus a censure presupposes not only guilt but obstinacy; its immediate effect is the deprivation of spiritual goods; it only affects those who by baptism have become subjects of the Church. It may be true, as Fleury[1] says, that under Gregory VII. censures were multiplied in a manner unknown to the early Church, and this may have been necessitated by the increasing wickedness of the times. But it is certain that the use of censures dates from the very infancy of the Church.

Censures are divided, according to the nature and extent of the pains they inflict, into excommunications, suspensions, and interdicts [see under those articles]. "Censuræ latæ sententiæ" are incurred on the violation of the law, ipso facto; "Censuræ sententiæ ferendæ," only on the sentence of the ecclesiastical judge. They may be passed ab homine—i.e. they may be issued by a mandate respecting some single action or business; or, again, a jure—i.e. a permanent law may be passed, binding under censure. In the former case, unless already incurred, they expire with the death of the legislator; in the latter, they continue still in force. Some censures are reserved, others not reserved—i.e. the superior may reserve the power of absolution from censures to himself, or he may commit it to the ordinary ministers [see ABSOLUTION].

That the Church has the power of inflicting censures appears from the words of Christ—"He that will not hear the Church, let him be unto thee as a heathen and a publican"—as well as from the constant practice of the Church herself. Censures can be imposed according to the ordinary law, by ecclesiastics possessing jurisdiction in the external courts ("forum externum" as distinct from the internal court or tribunal of confession). Thus censures may be imposed by the Pope or a general council for the whole Church; by an archbishop for his own diocese, also in the dioceses of his suffragans during a visitation, or with respect to cases brought to his tribunal by appeal from one of his suffragans; by bishops and vicar-generals in their own dioceses; by cardinals in the churches from which they take their titles; by legates in the territory of their legation; by provincial councils in the province; by chapters in the vacancy of a see till the election of a vicar-capitular, on whom the power then devolves; by generals, provincials, local superiors of regulars, according to the statutes of their order. Thus parish priests as such have no power of this kind. Still such authority may be delegated to all ecclesiastics: not, however, to women—e.g. to abbesses.

Persons who have not reached the age of puberty are not included among the persons whom the censure strikes; nor again are sovereigns, unless the censure be inflicted by the Pope. Cardinals are not subjected even to Papal censures, unless they are specially mentioned as so subject. (From Gury, "Theolog. Moral.")

CEREMONY (SACRED), in its widest sense, denotes any external act used in the worship of God. Some ceremonies are essential—such, for example, as concern the matter and form of the sacraments; others are accidental—e.g. the sacraments can be given validly, or the worship of God could be carried on, without them. Of accidental ceremonies, some descend from the apostolic age, others have been added in the course of time by the Church. That the Church has power to institute or to change such ceremonies is plain from the practice in all ages, and is defined by the Council of Trent.[1] The Council further declares that the approved rites of the Church, in the solemn administration of the sacraments, cannot be despised, or changed by individual caprice, without sin.[2]

Scripture and reason combine to show the wisdom of the Church's doctrine on this head. Scripture—for God ordained ceremonies in the old law, and Christ made outward ceremonies essential to the administration of Baptism and the Eucharist. Reason—because it is natural for man, who is composed of body and soul, to express his interior devotion by exterior acts; because man is impressed by teaching which is conveyed in the form of symbol, and which appeals to his eyes as well as to his ears; because, lastly, as both body and soul come from God, we are bound to use both in His service.

The position, however, and importance of ceremonies in the Christian is very different from that which they held in the Jewish Church. In the latter a multitude of ceremonies were binding by divine law; in the Christian worship, on the other hand, only a very few ceremonies have been instituted by Christ; the rest are alterable at the will of the Church. Another reason gave ceremonies a much more important place in the Jewish than they have in the Christian Church. The Jews, St. Thomas says, were looking forward in faith and hope, not only to heavenly joys, but also to the means by which these joys could be obtained. Heaven and the means of getting there were both future to them, and both were symbolised by their ceremonies. With us the means of salvation are secured by acts already past (e.g. Christ's passion), or by acts actually performed in our midst (e.g. the sacraments). Our ceremonies symbolise grace already won for us, and regard the future only so far as they typify heaven. The blessed in heaven have nothing more to hope for; therefore with them there are no figures or symbols ("nihil figurale"), "but only thanksgiving and the voice of praise, and so it is said concerning the city of the blessed: I saw no temple in it, for the Lord God Almighty is its temple and the Lamb."[1]

CERINTHIANS. Cerinthus was a native of Alexandria, but taught his heresy in proconsular Asia. He was a contemporary of St. John, who on one occasion left the public baths at Ephesus because Cerinthus was there, the Apostle fearing to be in the same place with an "enemy of the truth." Irenæus says St. John wrote his Gospel to confute him. Cerinthus was (1) a Judaiser. He seems to have held a gross doctrine on the Millennium, to have enforced the rite of circumcision and the observance of sabbaths. Moreover, it is related that the Cerinthians, like the Ebionites, accepted only St. Matthew's Gospel.

(2) He was also a Gnostic, so that he forms the link between the Judaising and Gnostic sects. He attributed the creation of the world and the giving of the Jewish law to an angel or angels far removed from and ignorant of the supreme Being. The reader will observe that Cerinthus made his creative angel ignorant of, but not antagonistic to, the supreme God; so that he was not obliged to break entirely with Judaism, as the later Gnostics did. (From Lightfoot on Colossians: "Essay on the Colossian Heresy.")

CESSATIO A DIVINIS. A prohibition which obliges the clergy to abstain from celebrating divine offices, or giving Church burial, in some specified place. It is distinct from an interdict, because (1) an interdict may affect only certain persons: cessatio a divinis is always local —i.e. it forbids anyone to celebrate the divine offices in a particular place; (2) an interdict is a censure, and therefore inflicted to correct offenders: not so cessatio a divinis, which may be ordered as an expression of the Church's sorrow, to repair some injury done to the divine honour, &c.; (3) during an interdict offices may be celebrated with closed doors, and publicly on certain feasts: neither is permissible during cessatio a divinis.

Cessatio a divinis is in some cases prescribed, as a matter of course, by the general law of the Church—e.g. when a church is desecrated; but it may also be imposed by all who have power to inflict censures. (Gury, "Theolog. Moral.") Fleury gives several instances of cessatio a divinis from the history of the French church in the sixth century.[1]

CHALCEDON, GENERAL COUNCIL OF. The fourth General Council, which, in 451, condemned the errors of Eutyches and affirmed two natures in Christ.

The opposition to Nestorius, who said there were two persons in Christ, led many, particularly among the monks, into the opposite extreme of maintaining that there was one nature, as there was one person only, in our Lord. Among those who fell into this error, which was closely connected with Apollinarianism, a conspicuous place belonged to Eutyches, an old monk who had been for thirty years Archimandrite of a monastery near Constantinople which numbered not less than 300 religious. In 448 Eusebius of Dorylæum accused Eutyches of heresy in a synod at Constantinople. Eutyches expressed his belief as follows: "I confess that our Lord was of two natures before the union, but after the union [i.e. the union of the two natures in the Incarnation] I confess one nature." The synod, over which Flavian, bishop of Constantinople, presided, maintained two natures in Christ "after the union" [i.e. Incarnation], and Eutyches was condemned and deposed. His error cut at the very roots of true belief in the Incarnation. He maintained that in Christ the human was absorbed in the divine nature, so that Christ's body was not of one substance with ours—was not, indeed, the "body of a man." Carried to its logical consequences, the Eutychian heresy involved a denial of Christ's humanity and even of His divinity, for Christ would have had one mixed nature, partly human, partly divine, and in reality neither divine nor human.

[1] Liv. xxxiv. 53. He calls them all interdicts, but one or two of his instances (e.g. the cessation of the offices at St. Denys, in Paris, because it had been polluted by bloodshed) exactly correspond to the cessatio a divinis.

After the synod, Eutyches appealed to Leo, professing his desire that the matter had been laid before Leo sooner, and his readiness to accept the Pope's judgment. He also wrote to Chrysologus of Ravenna, who referred him to the chair of Peter; and it is probable, though not quite certain, that he also addressed himself to Dioscorus and other bishops. Pope Leo, after examining the acts, approved the sentence passed in the synod at Constantinople. Dioscorus, on the other hand, who was really of one mind with Eutyches, managed through his influence with the Empress Eudocia, to secure the convocation of a general synod at Ephesus. Thereupon Leo, who received on May 13, 449, an invitation to take part in the council, despatched three legates to represent him there, and gave into their hands several letters, among which was his famous "dogmatic epistle" to Flavian. In it the Pope teaches with all possible fulness and clearness the existence of two distinct natures in the incarnate God. "He who, remaining in the form of a God, made man, also in the form of a servant was made man. For each nature without defect preserves its proper characteristics (proprietatem suam), and as the form [i.e. nature] of a servant does not take away the form of God, so the form of God does not diminish the form of a servant. . . Each form in union with the other does what is proper to it: the Word, that is to say, operating that which is proper to the Word, and the flesh performing that which is proper to the flesh. . . . The one [i.e. the divine nature] shines forth in miracles, the other [i.e. the human nature] succumbs to injuries. And as the Word does not fall away from equality with the Father's glory, so the flesh does not leave the nature of our race. For one and the same, a point often to be repeated, is truly son of God, and truly son of man. . . . To hunger, to thirst, to be weary, and to sleep, is evidently proper to man. But to satisfy five thousand men with five loaves, and to give the woman of Samaria living water . . . is without doubt divine. . . . It does not belong to the same nature to say, I and the Father are one, and again, the Father is greater than I." In August of the same year the bishops began to assemble at Ephesus in the council which for its evil repute has earned the name of Latrocinium or Robber-synod. The council met on the 8th of the month and consisted apparently of about 130 bishops, though one ancient account raises the number to 300. Dioscorus presided, while two Papal legates, besides Domnus of Antioch, Juvenal of Jerusalem, Flavian of Constantinople, were present. Flavian and Eusebius were condemned as heretics and deposed, as it was pretended, by the unanimous vote of the council, but the coarse and fanatical Dioscorus would allow no notes of the proceedings to be made except by his own creatures, and he was afterwards accused of having falsified the Acts. He called in soldiers and monks armed with cudgels, cruelly maltreated Flavian and cast him into prison, and forced the other Fathers by outrage and starvation to sign a blank paper, on which he afterwards wrote the condemnation of Flavian, who died shortly afterwards of the ill-usage he had received. Leo, with the whole West, rejected this council, while the churches of Syria, Asia Minor, Pontus, would hear nothing of it. It was, however confirmed by the Emperor Theodosius II., and for the time it was impossible to convoke another synod.

Better times came with the accession of Marcian and Pulcheria to the throne. Marcian at once annulled the decrees of the Latrocinium, and in concert with Valentinian III., the Western emperor, and with the approval of Pope Leo and of Anatolius, the new bishop of Constantinople, who had now subscribed Leo's letter to Flavian, convoked a new council, which was to meet at Nicæa. Afterwards, however, Chalcedon was chosen as the place of meeting, because of its proximity to Constantinople, which made it possible for Marcian to attend the council and at the same time to look after civil affairs in the capital of his empire. The council opened on October 8, 451, and closed on November 1 of the same year. The Fathers held their sessions in the church of St. Euphemia, which stood near the Bosphorus on a gentle eminence just opposite Constantinople. The number of assembled bishops was about 600. The external order of the council was in the hands of an imperial commission, consisting of civil officers; but the papal legates "manifested an unmistakeable superiority over the other voters, as representing, according to their own explicit statement, the head of the whole Church, and as holding fast to the conviction that every resolution of the synod to which they did not agree was null and void."[1] This claim was fully recognised by the council, as will presently appear.

In the first session, Dioscorus was declared guilty of murder and of other moral offences, particularly of violence and outrage upon the Fathers who met at Ephesus. In the second, the epistle of Leo to Flavian was unanimously approved. The Fathers exclaimed, "That is the faith of the Fathers: that is the faith of the Apostles. So we all believe. Peter has spoken through Leo. That was also Cyril's faith, and that is the faith of the Fathers." In the third session Dioscorus was deposed. In the fourth the letter of Leo to Flavian was approved by a formal vote. In the fifth session, the dogmatic formula of Chalcedon which had been drawn up by a commission was adopted by the council.

In this formula the council defined that there was "one and the same Christ the Son, Lord, only begotten, in two natures, without confusion, without change [this is directed against Eutyches], without division, without separation [this against Nestorius, who divided Christ into two persons]; the difference of the natures being in no wise destroyed on account of the union, but rather the property (ἰδιότητος) of each nature being preserved and meeting (συντρεχούσης) in one Person and Hypostasis." At the close of the council the Fathers wrote to Pope Leo, who "had presided over all the assembled [bishops] as the head over the members," begging him "by his assent also to honour their decision" (τίμησον καὶ ταῖς σαῖς ψήφοις τὴν κρίσιν). The Emperor also asked the Pope to confirm the decrees of the council. Accordingly, on March 21, 453, Leo addressed a circular to the bishops who had attended the council confirming their definition of the faith.

The confirmation of the council would have been obtained much sooner and much more easily, if the dogmatic controversy had been the only matter of discussion. But it was not so. At the end of the fourteenth session, the Papal legates withdrew, and in their next meeting the Fathers of the Council passed thirty canons, relating to Church government, clerical and monastic discipline, &c., of which the 28th is the most important. The Church of Constantinople, though not of Apostolic foundation, naturally acquired great influence as an imperial city, and as early as 381 the second General Council assigned it "the pre-eminence of honour" after the Church of Rome, on the ground that Constantinople itself was New Rome. This canon, however, was ignored by Rome. At Chalcedon, Anatolius of Constantinople saw that the time was unusually favourable for asserting the doubtful privilege of his see and for extending it. He had not much to fear from the jealousy or conservatism of the great patriarchates or exarchates in the East. The sees of Alexandria and Ephesus were vacant, Maximus of Antioch was his creature, Juvenal of Jerusalem was in his debt for helping him to obtain jurisdiction over the three Palestinian provinces. In these circumstances, the 28th canon of Chalcedon was agreed to with little difficulty. The former part of this canon merely reaffirms the decree of the second general synod to which the canon of Chalcedon expressly refers. The Fathers, the bishops of Chalcedon say, had rightly assigned [patriarchal] privileges to the elder Rome, because of its imperial dignity, and had from similar motives assigned the second rank to New Rome—i.e. Constantinople. The latter part of the 28th canon goes much further. It sanctions the practice which had prevailed since Chrysostom's time—viz. that the Bishop of Constantinople should be supreme, not only over the district (διοίκησις) of Thrace, but also over Pontus and Asia, which had been formerly independent. The metropolitans of these districts were to receive consecration from Constantinople.

Leo absolutely refused to confirm this canon, and Anatolius acknowledged that "the whole force and confirmation of that which had been done was reserved to the authority of [his] beatitude"—i.e.

[1] Hefele, Concil. ii. p. 421.

to the authority of his Holiness the Bishop of Rome. In like manner the council itself and the Emperor Marcian had expressly allowed that the canon was invalid without the approbation of the Apostolic See. Indeed, for a considerable time the Greeks themselves did not appeal to the canon in question, and their canonists[1] omitted it in their collections. Justinian, however, confirmed the high rank of Constantinople, and this very canon of Chalcedon was confirmed at the great Eastern synod in Trullo,[2] although Rome still abstained from sanctioning it. But after a Latin Empire had been established in the East, and a Latin Patriarchate at Constantinople, the Fourth Lateran Synod under Innocent III., in the year 1215, ordained that the Patriarch of Constantinople was to hold rank immediately after the Pope, and therefore above the Patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch. (From Hefele, "Concil." vol. ii.)

CHALDEAN RITE, CHRISTIANS OF.—The name Chaldeans in ecclesiastical use signifies the Catholics who belong to the Church formed by conversions from Nestorianism. Assemani ("Bibliothec. Orient." tom. iii. p. 410 seq.) distinguishes between particular conversions — i.e. conversions of individual bishops and their dioceses, and general conversions—i.e. unions effected with a large section of the Nestorians which led to the recognition of a Catholic patriarch. Under the former head he mentions—(1) the conversion of the Bishop Sahaduna and the Gamaræans, A.D. 630; (2) that of Timothy of Tarsus, metropolitan of the Nestorians in Cyprus, and of his subjects, A.D. 1445; (3) that of the Nestorians on the Malabar Coast; (4) that of the Christians of St. John, called Sabæans, by the Carmelite Fathers, in Bassora, circ. A.D. 1630. The story of the third of these conversions will be given in the article on the CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS. We doubt the accuracy of Assemani's statement about the Sabæans, whose history has been recently investigated by Chwolson.[3] The third case is interesting from its connection with the Council of Florence. Timothy was converted by Andrew, archbishop of Rhodes (Colossensis), whom Eugenius IV. sent to Cyprus. The union was effected in the second session of the continuation of the council in the Lateran, August 7, 1445. Eugenius, in his bull containing the decree of union, forbids anyone to call the Chaldeans heretics. So that here we have a formal recognition of the name "Chaldean."[1] (Hefele, "Concil." vii. p. 815 seq.)

Assemani enumerates the following "general conversions." (1) In 1247 Asa, "Vicar of the East"—i.e. representative of the patriarch in China and Eastern Tartary—under the Nestorian Patriarch Sabarjesu (1226-56), made a profession of Catholic belief to Innocent IV. It was subscribed by the Archbishop of Nisibis, two other archbishops, and three bishops. (2) The Patriarch Jaballaha was reconciled under Benedict XI., A.D. 1304. (3) A dispute about the succession to the patriarchate between Sulâka and Shimoom led to the reconciliation of the former under Julius III., A.D. 1552. (4) The Patriarch Elias became Catholic under Paul V., A.D. 1616. None of these conversions had any wide or lasting influence. (5) The conversion of the Nestorians at Diarbekir led Innocent XI. to establish a new Chaldean patriarchate in that city. Joseph I. was the first patriarch; the last died in 1828. (Badger, "The Nestorians and their Rituals," vol. i. p. 150.)

Here Assemani's narrative ends, but since his great work was published at Rome (1719–28) the most important accession of Nestorians to the Church has taken place. There had been since the middle of the sixteenth century a schism

[1] Till the time of Photius. Hergenröther, Photius, i. p. 87.

[2] But the decision of the council in Trullo on this point was not received in the other Eastern patriarchates. Hergenröther, ib. p. 223.

[3] See, especially, his criticism of Assemani (Die Sabier und der Sabismus, vol. i. p. 48).

[1] "Meshihaya," which simply means "follower of the Messias"—i.e. Christian—is now used as a distinctive name for the Chaldean Catholics, as opposed to the Nestorians of the same rite. The word (ܡܫܝܚܝܐ "Meshichojo") frequently occurs in Syriac literature as a general name for Christian. (Payne Smith, Thesaur. Syr. col. 2242.) The Greek word Χριστιανὸς has been adopted in the Syriac language, and occurs constantly, not only in the Peshitto, but also in late authors, e.g. in the chronicles of Barhebræus. The reader must not suppose that the name Chaldean has anything to do with the Chaldee language. The Catholics of the Syrian and Chaldean rites agree in the use of the Syriac tongue in the liturgy, the former, however, using the Western or Jacobite, the latter, the Eastern or Nestorian, dialect. The differences between the dialects, which are slight and chiefly affect the pronunciation of the vowels, are noted in all the recent grammars. Martin (Syro-Chaldaicæ Institutiones, p. 60) gives a transcription of the Nicene Creed in Roman characters, as he heard it pronounced by a Chaldean priest.

between the Nestorians themselves, and they had two patriarchs, one residing at Kochanes in Central Koordistan, the other at Mosul, or Alkôsh. Elias, the patriarch at the latter place, on his death in 1778, left two nephews, Hanna (= John, the name he took at ordination, his own name being Hormuzd) and Jeshuyan. Both were already metropolitans, both became Catholics, and both were candidates for the patriarchate. The latter had scarcely reached the object of his ambition when he relapsed into Nestorianism. John, who remained Catholic, claimed the patriarchate in his place, A.D. 1782. He had bitter disputes, not only with his Nestorian relatives, but also with the Carmelite missionaries and the Patriarch Joseph, who still exercised jurisdiction at Diarbekir. It was not till the close of the last century that he was recognised by Rome as the spiritual head of all the Chaldeans, and allowed to use the patriarchal seal and exercise patriarchal functions, and he then took the name Elias. He only received the pallium shortly before his death at Bagdad in 1841. He must have been bishop for more than sixty-three years; but it appears from his autobiography, translated by Badger, that he was consecrated metropolitan at the age of sixteen. This last conversion to the Church embraced most of the Nestorians in the plains by the Tigris. Badger, writing in 1852, estimates the number of Catholics belonging to the Chaldean rite at 20,000, thinly scattered through the vast territory which extends from Diarbekir to the frontiers of Persia, and from Tyari to Bagdad. The Chaldeans, says Badger (i. p. 176), are superior to their Nestorian countrymen "in civilisation, general intelligence, and ecclesiastical order." This is important testimony, coming, as it does, from an author who had extraordinary opportunities of judging correctly, and who writes with passionate vehemence against everything Catholic.

Rome utterly abolished the hereditary succession to the patriarchate which had long prevailed among the Nestorians, and John was forbidden to make any of his relations bishops, but it was difficult to root out this abuse. A nephew of the Patriarch John actually became Nestorian for a few months, in 1834, that he might be consecrated metropolitan by the Nestorian patriarch and succeed his uncle, who is said to have approved of this proceeding. The devotion to the old patriarchal house nearly led to a schism, which was fomented by a Nestorian patriarch, Shimoom, who fled from the Kurds to Mosul. Great discontent was caused in 1843 by an attempt of the Patriarch Zeiya to make the Chaldeans keep Easter according to the Latin reckoning. This patriarch was himself cited before the Holy Office on a charge of embezzlement, and resigned in 1846. The next patriarch, Joseph Audu, came into conflict with Rome on account of his claims to exercise jurisdiction over the Chaldeans in India, and because of his uncanonical ordinations. He was forbidden to consecrate bishops without leave from Rome. He refused to accept the decrees of the Vatican Council, which he attended, and renounced communion with Rome. A Capuchin, Bishop Fanciulli, was sent as Apostolic visitor to Mosul, and the patriarch made a qualified submission in July 1872. Soon after the patriarch renewed the schism, induced some of the bishops and nobles to join him, and consecrated bishops in defiance of the Pope. The revolt was fostered by the Turkish Government. The patriarch made his final submission in January 1877.

According to the ordinary law the patriarch—unless Rome has previously appointed a coadjutor with right of succession—is chosen by the bishops. The election, if canonical, is confirmed at Rome. He is subject not only to Propaganda but to the Latin Archbishop of Bagdad, as apostolic visitor. He resides at Alkôsh and Mosul.

The metropolitans and bishops, who are chosen from the monks, are nominated and consecrated by the patriarch. The metropolitan sees are Amedia, Mosul (both immediately subject to the patriarch), Kerkuk, and Sehna. The episcopal sees are Akra, Diarbekir, Gezir, Mardin, Salmas, Seert and Zaku. The secular priests are usually married, and partly support themselves by manual labour. The monks belong to the order of St. Anthony, and there are two monasteries—a very ancient one, that of Rabban Hormuzd, at Alkôsh, which in 1843 had an abbot and four monks, and a small one founded in modern times, and with scarcely any religious, that of Mar Yurgis (= St. George), on the left bank of the Tigris, a few miles above Mosul. The monks live apart in cells which are mostly in the rock. They abstain from wine and spirits and from flesh, except on Christmas Day and Easter Sunday.

The number of priests, secular and regular, is at present (1891) above 100;

the number of Catholics about 33,000. (Werner, "Orbis Terrarum Catholicus.")

Bickell ("Conspectus rei Syrorum litterariæ," Münster, 1871, §§ vii.-x.) mentions the following printed editions of liturgical books of the Chaldean rite: "Missale Chaldaicum, et Decret. S. Congregat. de Propaganda Fide," Romæ, 1767; "Psalterium Chaldaicum in usum nationis Chald." Romæ, 1842; "Breviarium Chaldaicum in usum nationis Chald. a Josepho Guriel, secundo editum," Romæ, 1865, He also gives the titles of four liturgical books of the Chaldean rite, but intended for the church of Malabar—viz. "Ordo Chaldaicus Missæ B. Apost. juxta ritum Eccles. Malabar." Romæ, 1774; "Ordo Chaldaicus Rituum et Lectionum juxta morem Eccles. Malabar." Romæ, 1775; "Ordo Chaldaicus Ministerii Sacrament. SS. quæ perficiuntur a Sacerdot. juxta morem Eccles. Malabar." Romæ, 1845; "Ordo Baptism. Adultorum juxta ritum Eccles. Malabar. Chaldæorum." Romæ, 1859. In three instances there is an exceptional use of the word Chaldee instead of Syriac in the titles of books meant for the Maronites—viz. "Missale Chaldaicum juxta ritum Eccles. nationis Maronitarum," Romæ, 1592; "Officium Defunctorum ad usum Maronitarum Gregorii XIII. impensa Chaldaicis characteribus impressum," Romæ, 1585, vol. ii.; "Breviarii Chaldaici æstiva pars" (the former part, printed ten years earlier, is entitled simply, "Offic. Sanctorum juxta ritum Eccles. Maronit. pars hiemalis"), Romæ, 1666.

(Assemani has been our authority for the history down to the close of the seventeenth century, then Badger, carefully compared with Silbernagl's "Kirchen des Orients;" and for the events of the last few years, Hergenröther, "Kirchengeschichte," vol. ii. p. 1009 seq.)

CHALICE (calix, ποτήριον). The cup used in Mass, for the wine which is to be consecrated. The rubrics of the Missal require that it should be of gold or silver, or at least have a silver cup gilt inside. It must be consecrated by the bishop with chrism, according to a form prescribed in the Pontifical. It may not be touched except by persons in holy orders.

We know nothing about the chalice which our Lord used in the first Mass. Venerable Bede relates that in the seventh century they exhibited at Jerusalem a great silver cup, with two handles, which our Saviour Himself had used in celebrating the Eucharist, but antiquity knows nothing of this chalice, and it has no better claim to be regarded as genuine than the chalice of agate which is still shown at Valencia and claims also to be that used by Christ. Probably, the first chalices used by Christian priests were made of glass. It seems likely at least, though the inference cannot be called certain, from Tertullian's words, that in his time glass chalices were commonly used in church, and undoubtedly such chalices were still common during the fifth century, as appears from the testimonies of St. Jerome and Cyprianus Gallus, the biographer of St. Cæsarius of Arles. Gregory of Tours mentions a crystal chalice of remarkable beauty, which belonged to the church of Milan.

However, even before persecution had ceased, the Church began, from natural reverence for Christ's Blood, to employ more costly vessels. The Roman Book of the Pontiffs says of Pope Urban I. (226) that "he made all the holy vessels of silver." So, too, we read in the acts of St. Laurence's martyrdom, that he was charged by the heathen with having sold the altar-vessels of gold and silver, and with having given the proceeds to the poor; while St. Augustine mentions two golden and six silver chalices, which were exhumed from the crypt of the church at Cirta. Of course, such precious chalices became more common when the Church grew rich and powerful. Thus St. Chrysostom describes a chalice "of gold and adorned with jewels." In 857 the Emperor Michael III. sent Pope Nicolas I., among other presents, a golden chalice, surrounded by precious stones, and with jacinths suspended on gold threads round the cup. A precious silver chalice adorned with figures belonged to the church at Jerusalem, and was presented in 869 to Ignatius of Constantinople. But it is needless to multiply instances on this head.

For a long time, however, chalices of horn, base metal, &c., were still used, and Binterim says that a copper chalice in which Ludger, the Apostle of Münster, in the eighth century, said Mass, is still preserved at Werden, where he founded an abbey. But very soon afterwards chalices of glass, horn, base metal, &c., were prohibited by a series of councils in England, Germany, Spain, and France, although chalices of ivory and of precious stone (e.g. of onyx) were still permitted. Gratian adopted in the Corpus Juris a canon which he attributes to a Council of Rheims, otherwise unknown. The words of the canon are, "Let the chalice of the Lord and the paten be at least of silver, if not of gold. But if anyone be too poor, let him in any case have a chalice of tin. Let not the chalice be made of copper or brass, because from the action of the wine it produces rust, which occasions sickness. But let none presume to sing Mass with a chalice of wood or glass." (Hefele, "Beiträge," ii. p. 322 seq.)

The practice of consecrating chalices is very ancient. A form for this purpose is contained in the Gregorian Sacramentary, as well as in the most ancient "Ordines Romani," and such consecration is usual among the Greeks and Copts. In the Latin Church, the bishop anoints the inside of the chalice with chrism, using at the same time appropriate prayers. The consecration is lost if the chalice be broken or notably injured, or if the inside is regilt. A decree prohibiting all except those in sacred orders to touch the paten or chalice is attributed to an early Pope, St. Sixtus, by the author of the "Liber Pontificalis." But Merati, who quotes this statement, admits that a Roman Ordo regards it as lawful for acolytes to do so. However, a Council of Braga, held in 563, confines the right of touching the sacred vessels to those who at least are subdeacons.

Besides the chalice from which the priest took the Precious Blood, the ancients also used "baptismal chalices," from which the newly-baptised received communion under the species of wine, and "ministerial chalices" ("calices ministeriales," "scyphi"), in which the Precious Blood was given to the people. This "ministerial" chalice was partly filled with common wine, and into this wine the celebrant poured a small quantity of the Precious Blood from the "calix offertorius"—i.e. the chalice with which he said Mass. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss." i. cap. 4.)

CHALICE-VEIL. The veil with which the chalice is covered, called also "peplum" and "sudarium." It used to be of linen, but must now be of silk, as the rubric requires. The Greeks use three veils, one of which covers the paten, another the chalice, a third both paten and chalice. They call the third veil ἀήρ, because it encompasses the oblations. Cardinal Bona says this Greek custom began in the church of Jerusalem, and thence spread through the East. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss." i. cap. 5.)

Benedict XIV. considers the antiquity of the chalice-veil to be proved by one of the Apostolic canons—viz. 72 (al. 73), which forbids the application of the church vessels or veils (ὀθόνην) to profane uses. Hefele thinks this canon may belong to the latter half of the third century. But there does not seem to be any reason for alleging that the veil meant is the chalice-veil. Gavantus says that the chalice-veil is mentioned in the liturgy of St. Chrysostom (which, however, has been altered since the saint's time); that silken chalice-veils were given to Pope Hormisdas (514–523), and that Amalarius mentions the Roman custom of bringing the chalice to the altar wrapped in a veil.

CHANCEL. The part of a church between the altar and the nave, so named from the rails (cancelli) which separated it from the nave. The word was in use before the Reformation, and the Anglicans still retain it. Among English Catholics it is now little used, the portion of the church near the altar, separated by rails from the nave, being designated the "sanctuary." In cathedrals and conventual churches, where space is required to accommodate the canons or the religious, a portion of the church between the sanctuary and the nave is taken for the purpose; it is not however called the "chancel," but the "choir," Fr. chœur. [See CHOIR.]

CHANCELLOR, EPISCOPAL (cancellarius, from cancelli, a lattice, railings). The place surrounded by railings, or lattice work, where the legal instruments which decisions in an imperial or royal court made necessary were prepared, was called "cancellaria." The word "cancellarius" is first used in the sense of a secretary or notary by Cassiodorus—that is, in the middle of the sixth century. The jurisdiction of the bishop was in primitive times exercised by his archdeacon [ARCHDEACON]; but in proportion as the powers of the archdeacons were enlarged, a tendency manifested itself to make their jurisdiction independent of episcopal control, until at last an appeal actually lay from the archdeacon to the bishop. Such a state of things would inevitably make the bishop's own official, his "chancellor"—the person, whether a clerk or a layman, who had the charge of the judicial records of the diocese—a personage of greater importance. We find, accordingly, that in the three centuries preceding the Reformation, while the power of the archdeacon had everywhere declined, or was declining, the influence and importance of the bishop's chancellor were always on the ascendant. We find St. Edmund Rich, archbishop of Canterbury, in the thirteenth century, carrying on an important and delicate negotiation with the monks of Christchurch chiefly through Richard, his chancellor, afterwards celebrated in the Church as St. Richard, bishop of Chichester. (See Gervase of Canterbury.) Canon law contains many regulations respecting the fees of office which chancellors are entitled to demand.

CHANCERY, EPISCOPAL. (See the article on Episcopal Chancellors.) From the chancery of a bishop proceed all those documents, deeds, certificates, licences, dispensations, &c., which are necessary to the publication, recognition, and execution of the acts which he performs in the exercise of the fivefold jurisdiction attributed to him by the canon law, in which are included the powers of ordering, judging, correcting, dispensing, and administering. To these may be added the power of delegating or deputing. (Soglia, "De Potestate Jurisdictionis.")

CHANCERY, PAPAL: CHANCERY TAXES, &c. [See CURIA ROMANA.]

CHANT ECCLESIASTICAL, GREGORIAN, &c. [See PLAIN CHANT.]

CHANTRY (Lat. capellania, Fr. chapellenie). The ancient name in this country—

(1) of a chapel, aisle, or part of an aisle, in a church, set apart for the offering of the Holy Sacrifice for the benefit of the soul of a particular person, generally the founder, or for some other pious purpose;

(2) of the institution and endowment of such a service: as when Chaucer praises his "Persone" for not leaving his parish

> "To seeken him a chaunterie for soules."

All chantries were dissolved by the Acts of 1545 and 1547. They were then found to be more than a thousand in number.

Chantries in the second of the above senses are divided by the canonists into three classes. (1) Mercenary, as when a testator leaves property to a layman with the charge of causing Masses to be said for his soul. (2) Collative, when property is left with an express injunction that out of the revenue arising from it daily Mass, or a certain number of Masses in the year, should be celebrated; as to these chantries, the collation of the priests to serve them properly belongs to the bishop. (3) Chantries in private patronage. These only differ from the second class in that the nomination to them rests with the private patron; but the institution must still come from the bishop. (Ferraris, Capellania.)

CHAPLAIN (capellanus, from capella, chapel). The word capella, the derivation of which is doubtful, appears to have first come into use in Gaul, and to have been applied to the buildings, smaller than churches, which kings or bishops erected in their own palaces, that they might more conveniently and frequently attend divine worship. The priest appointed to the charge of such a chapel was called the "capellanus" or chaplain. As the number of such chapels increased, the chaplains became a numerous body, and were placed under an archchaplain, who was also called the Grand Almoner. Charlemagne selected bishops for this office of Grand Almoner.

There are chaplains of many kinds, as the following enumeration shows:

1. Army chaplains. Various indults, privileges, and faculties have been granted to Catholic sovereigns by the Holy See in relation to priests stationed in barracks, or serving with an army in the field. In modern times the sovereigns have usually endeavoured to place army chaplains under the sole control of a royal or imperial chaplain-major. This has been resisted by the Church, and it is decided that such chaplains, in the absence of an Apostolic brief otherwise providing, must be approved by the ordinary of the place. Thus a marriage contracted before an army chaplain, in the absence of such brief as aforesaid, is held to be null if celebrated without the licence of the bishop.

There are at present (1891) sixteen Catholic chaplains holding commissions now attached to the British army in England and the colonies.

2. Auxiliary chaplains. Appointed by parish priests as their coadjutors, and removable by them, but not without just cause. (See Ferraris, Capellanus, § 41.)

3. Cathedral chaplains. After the common life of canons ceased, and each drew his portion or prebend from the common fund, it became usual for them to reside at a distance from the cathedral or collegiate church to which they belonged, and to pay chaplains to perform their duties in choir for them. This practice was checked by the Council of Trent. [See CANON.]

4. Chaplains of chantries (capellaniæ). [See CHANTRY.] A large proportion of the chantries which once existed were founded, not that Mass might be said for souls, but in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, or of some saint, or some particular mystery. The chaplains serving these were and are carefully regulated by the canon law, so that the course of episcopal and parochial discipline might not be troubled by their presence in a diocese.

5. Chaplains of confraternities. [See CONFRATERNITY.] Such chaplains cannot have processions without the express licence of the bishop. They are not to be removed without cause by the bishop against the wish of the brotherhood.

6. Court chaplains. How these originated under the early Frankish kings has been already explained. Charlemagne gave to his episcopal arch-chaplain precedence over all the archbishops and bishops of his empire. The chaplains of the imperial and royal Courts had great power for centuries. By a Papal brief dated in 1857 the Holy See restored the office of arch-chaplain or Grand Almoner in France; but with the collapse of the Second Empire the brief became inoperative. At the Courts of Catholic sovereigns in Germany the chaplains of an imperial or royal chapel now constitute a body of canons, and the chapel of the palace is regarded as a collegiate church.

7. Domestic chaplains. Priests appointed to say Mass in the chapels attached to private houses, such as Coptfold Hall, Coughton, &c.

8. Episcopal chaplains. In early times the bishops had their private oratories, and as their dwellings grew to be palaces their first care was to provide them with suitable chapels, the clergy attached to which became episcopal chaplains. In large and wealthy dioceses these became numerous, and were then placed under an episcopal arch-chaplain. At the present day, when the Church has in most countries of Europe been reduced to the greatest poverty, the chaplains of bishops usually act as their secretaries, or as masters of the ceremonies when they celebrate High Mass.

9. Chaplains of nunneries. These are of course very numerous, and to be found in every part of the Catholic world. Canon law requires that they shall be of mature age, and in other ways enacts a minute discipline for their guidance.

10. Pontifical chaplains, attached to the Pope's chapel. They are of three classes: honorary, ceremonial, and secretarial.

11. Chaplains of public institutions: e.g. workhouses, prisons, hospitals, and lunatic asylums. In all such appointments the chaplain is, as a rule, nominated by the civil authority, with the approval of the bishop of the diocese.

CHAPTER, CATHEDRAL. [For the derivation, see CHAPTER, CONVENTUAL.] The ancient name for the clergy of a cathedral church was Presbyterium; the term "chapter" was borrowed from the assemblies of regulars. The history of chapters has been already partly traced in the article CANON. With the increase of the corporate property of chapters, the extended patronage arising from that increase, and the sense of dignity which the possession of that patronage engendered, a strong tendency developed itself in the course of the middle ages towards the independent existence of chapters, both cathedral and collegiate, and their exemption from episcopal control. There was a danger lest the canons of his cathedral, instead of forming the trusted council of the bishop, and assisting him in the administration of the diocese, as in primitive times, should be transformed into a body of dignified and wealthy ecclesiastics, burdened by very light duties, admission amongst whom would be desired by the upper classes for their sons, from motives much short of the purest. This happened to a great extent, and as a natural consequence collisions between bishops and chapters came to be of frequent occurrence. The Council of Trent applied itself to remedy this state of things, and partially restored the authority of the bishops over the chapters. A general right of visitation and correction was asserted for them.[1] A bishop was authorised to convene the chapter for any affairs which did not solely concern the interests of the canons and their dependents; this power, however, was not to extend to his vicar-general. At meetings so convened the bishop was to preside, and due rank and honour were to be accorded him. On the other hand, many things important for the welfare of the diocese could at no time be settled by the bishop without the consent or advice of his chapter; and in this respect the Council made no change. Thus the consent of the chapter is required in the administration or alienation of the see-property, or in any case in which diminution of the authority and privileges of the cathedral is threatened; their advice must be had by the bishop before ordaining or instituting clerks,[1] before proclaiming public processions, convening synods, &c., &c. In England, in consequence of the Elizabethan schism, the reforming influence of the Council of Trent could not assert itself; and hence, though the chapters were left, no attempt was made to bring back their action and authority into that harmony with those of the bishops which primitive piety required. Thus the present singular state of things gradually arose. The dean and chapter of an Anglican cathedral have their own separate property, the bishop of the same cathedral has his, and neither side interferes with the other. The chapter, say of Worcester Cathedral, has complete power over the church itself, with the exceptions presently to be mentioned; but there its connection with the diocese ceases. It has no more to do with its government by the bishop than the chapter of Munich has. At a vacancy of the see, indeed, the chapter meets to go through the mockery of electing a new bishop; but, as everyone knows, in the congé d'élire sent down to them from London, the name of the Crown nominee is specified, and the chapter is not at liberty to reject it. On the other hand, the bishop has a legal right to a chair or throne in the cathedral, and to hold confirmations in it, and here his power ends. He has no authority to summon meetings of the chapter for any purpose whatever, nor to control the dean or the canons in any way, except so far as, in their merely clerical capacity, they may become amenable to his jurisdiction. The result is that an Anglican chapter has entirely lost the primitive character of the "senatus episcopi," and is generally regarded as a convenient institution by which a Government can pension and reward its principal clerical supporters. In the Catholic Church, amidst the unnumbered ills that have come upon it in every country of Europe, it is consoling to reflect that this particular evil at least, so rife in the middle ages, has in our day almost disappeared; everywhere harmony and co-operation reign between the bishops and the cathedral chapters.

In England every Catholic diocese has its chapter, presided over by a provost, and usually numbering ten canons. In Ireland, out of twenty-eight dioceses, ten only have chapters, but these are larger than in England, are presided over by deans, and usually contain five or six dignitaries or officials of the diocese, besides the Canon Theologian and Canon Penitentiary prescribed by the Council of Trent.

CHAPTER, CONVENTUAL (capitulum, a chapter). It was and is the common practice of monks to assemble every morning to hear a chapter of the rule read, and for other purposes. Both the meeting itself and the place of meeting gradually obtained the name of Capitulum or chapter from this practice. The assembly of the monks of one monastery being thus designated "the chapter," it is easy to understand that assemblies of all the monks in any province, or of the whole order, came to be called "provincial" or "general" chapters. A general chapter, in the case of most of the orders, is held once in three years.

CHAPTER-HOUSE. The place of meeting of the canons of a cathedral, or the religious of a monastery. Till the thirteenth century it was generally rectangular; after that time the polygonal or round form came in, as at Salisbury, Lincoln, and York. Chapter-houses were sometimes richly adorned; at Westminster Abbey, for instance, a band of fresco, the painting of which has considerable merit, ran round the interior of the building; the remains of this, lately opened to public view, are of great interest. A large round chapter-house, with seats for sixty—the number of the monks—extremely plain in its architecture, but effective from the symmetry and boldness of its forms, was lately erected by the Cistercians at their house of Mount St. Bernard's in Leicestershire.

CHAPTERS. [See THREE CHAPTERS, THE.]

CHARACTER (χαρακτήρ). A stamp on coins, seals, &c., and in its theological sense, a spiritual mark indelibly impressed on the soul, by baptism, confirmation, and holy order, which sacraments cannot be reiterated without sacrilege. That these sacraments do really impress a character is taught by the Council of Florence, in the "decree of union," and is solemnly affirmed by the Council of Trent (Sess. vii. can. 9, De Sacram. in Gen.) as an article of faith. The Fathers of Trent content themselves with defining character as a "spiritual and indelible mark," on account of which the three sacraments which confer it cannot be reiterated. But St. Thomas, who is followed by other theologians, points out that character marks the recipient in some special way for the worship of God and also conveys certain powers. Thus baptism stamps a man indelibly as a Christian and enables him to receive the other sacraments: confirmation makes him a good soldier of Christ, and conveys particular powers of confessing the faith: by holy order he becomes a minister of Christ, and is empowered to perform certain sacred functions.[1]

The truth of the Church's doctrine on this matter is shown by the fact that it has always been accounted sacrilege to reiterate the three sacraments of baptism, confirmation and order. There must, therefore, be something in these sacraments which separates them from the other four, which may be lawfully received over and over again. Nor can it be said with any show of reason that the modern doctrine of character is an invention of the middle ages, first set forth by Innocent III. From the earliest times, Christian writers—e.g. Clement of Alexandria[2]—speak of baptism as "the seal of the Lord" (σφραγὶδα τοῦ κυρίου). So confirmation was known as the "seal," and it is still conferred in the Greek rite with the words the "seal of the Holy Ghost." What can this language mean, if considered in connection with the fact that baptism, confirmation and order were never reiterated, except this, that these sacraments set a seal on the soul which could never be blotted out, by sin or even by apostasy? St. Augustine gives clear witness to the tradition of the Church on character, and as the sense of his statements has been disputed, we will quote a brief summary of his teaching from the most eminent of Protestant Church historians. Augustine, says Neander,[3] "in connection with baptism often uses the comparison with the mark ('character militaris') which was impressed upon soldiers, as a token of imperial service, and which remained indelibly fixed even on those who were untrue to their service, though in that case it only witnessed against them." This is simply the Tridentine doctrine of sacramental character.

CHARITY. The theological virtue of Charity may be described as "a virtue divinely infused by which we entirely give ourselves up to God as the Sovereign Good, that by doing His will we may please Him and be united with Him." This description sets forth the object and the substance of the act of Charity. The object is our union with God, for it is of the nature even of disinterested love to seek union with the beloved object; the substance of the act is a loving gift of ourselves to God, which is also called union. "It pertains to charity, that man gives himself up to God so as to adhere to Him by some union of the mind (spiritus)," i.e. by making God the object of his thoughts and affections (St. Thomas, $2^a\ 2^{ae}$, q. lxxxii. a. 2 ad 1). St. Bonaventure describes charity as "a life which unites the lover with the beloved" ("vita copulans amantem cum amato." St. Bonav. "Comp. Theol. Verit." l.v. c. 23.). Considered as a habit, charity is an infused virtue which elevates the soul, enables and disposes it to bring forth the acts proper to charity, viz. love of God above all for His own sake, and of our neighbour for the sake of God. Charity may be perfect or imperfect: the former justifies man by its own efficacy; the latter only in the Sacrament of Penance. (See the arts. ATTRITION and CONTRITION.) Perfect charity admits of three degrees: first, love of God above all things which grievously displease Him; second, love above all things which only slightly displease God; and third, love of God even above such things as do not displease Him, but still are less pleasing than others. The first degree excludes all mortal sin and is necessary and sufficient for salvation. The second excludes venial sin and belongs to Christian perfection. The third is the summit of perfection to which no command obliges us, but Divine grace invites. Habitual charity or the habit of charity is lost by mortal sin only (Trid. Sess. vi. c. 15). Venial sins, however numerous, do not diminish it, though their frequent repetition gradually unfit the soul for the retention of charity, just as disease gradually unfits the body for the retention of the soul (St. Thomas, 2^a 2, q. xxiv. a. 10). Christ has laid down the commandment of charity as the first and highest of all commandments: "Thou shall love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart, and with thy whole soul, and with thy whole mind," Matt. xxii. 37, 38. This precept forbids hatred and all other offences of God and in this respect is binding at all times. In as far as it commands positive acts of love it is not binding at all times; yet a single act of love in a lifetime is not sufficient to comply with it. Propp. damn. 2 Mart. 1679, pr. 5, 6, 7. (See St. Thomas, 2ª 2æ. qq. xxii.–xliv. and commentaries.)

CHARITY, FATHERS OF. [See ROSMINIANS.]

CHARITY, SISTERS OF. [See SISTERHOODS.]

CHARITY, WORKS OF CHRISTIAN. Our Lord himself declared "by this shall men know that ye are my disciples, because ye love one another," and the heathen felt that a new spiritual power was in their midst when they beheld the manifestations of Christian love. The fact that the Christian religion taught its disciples to pray for all men, to love all, and to sacrifice themselves for all, is a most solid and a most touching proof that the Christian religion is divine. With scarcely an exception, every work and institute of mercy existing in the world is of Christian origin, direct or indirect. The same kind of proof may be brought to show that the Catholic religion is the one true form of Christianity. No doubt, many Protestants have been conspicuous for philanthropy, and, as Protestants have preserved much of the Catholic belief, we need not be surprised to find this belief producing its natural fruit in works of mercy. It is true, however, on the other hand, that the Catholic Church has laboured for the souls and bodies of men to an extent unknown in other systems, and Protestants offer an unconscious testimony to the superiority of the Catholic religion by imitating many of its institutes for the relief of the poor and suffering. Much information on this head will be found in the articles on religious orders founded for works of this kind. Here, we can only give a brief account of the different directions in which Catholic charity has shown itself. We shall speak first of spiritual, then of corporal, mercy.

(A.) We find religious orders erected with the special view of succouring the fallen, or saving those who are exposed to danger of sin. Such was the double order of Fontevraud, erected for male and female penitents, towards the close of the eleventh century, by Robert of Arbrisselles, who was endowed with wonderful power for the conversion of sinners. The order spread over France, Spain, and England. A century later, the famous preacher Fulk of Neuilly and Raymund de Palmariis also laboured for fallen women. Other orders with this object have been founded in modern times. The orders established for the instruction of the poor in Christian doctrine by means of missions, &c., and for the teaching of youth, both of the higher and lower classes, are past reckoning. The missions to the heathen are a creation of the Catholic Church. They were adopted by Protestants long after the rise of the new belief, and, like Sunday-schools, missions to people already Christian, sisterhoods, &c., are borrowed from the old religion.

(B.) The care of the Church for the bodies of the poor shines forth, not only in the lives of saints, but in the Church's ordinary law. By ancient regulation, a fourth part of the Church revenues was devoted to the poor: if extreme distress prevailed, even the sacred vessels were sold for the support of the needy. In many monasteries hundreds of poor people were fed every day; while in most churches funds for the poor, called "mensæ pauperum," "mensæ S. Spiritus," were established. Further, the Church showed her care for the suffering and the indigent by the foundation of houses in which they were received and tended. Public institutions of this sort were scarcely possible during the period of heathen persecution; but whenever the peace of the Church was secured, the bishops began to have houses erected for the reception of strangers (Xenodochia), of the sick (Nosocomia), of the poor (Ptochotrophia), of orphans and foundlings (Orphanotrophia and Brephotrophia), and of old people (Gerontocomia). About the middle of the fourth century, we hear of a hospital for the sick at Sebaste in Armenia; while the hospital erected through the zeal of Basil the Great was of a size so vast that it was often compared to a town. In the different sections of the building unfortunate people of every kind were received —the poor, exiles, lepers, &c. Half a century earlier, St. Chrysostom spent all the spare revenues of his church in restoring old hospitals and erecting new ones. In the West, Paulinus founded a house for the poor, for the sick, and for widows. It is to be observed that in Western as well as Eastern Europe the first institutions of this kind were erected by bishops. Not that the laity were remiss in promoting works of charity. Fabiola, the friend of St. Jerome, the Emperor Justinian, the Empress Eudoxia, and a multitude besides, were all distinguished as the founders of hospitals; still, the bishops led the way.

During the middle ages, the Scottish monks—i.e. monks from Scotland or Ireland—seem to have founded the earliest hospitals. The good work was greatly promoted by Alcuin, who seems to have influenced Charlemagne in this direction, and to have encouraged the bishops to found hospitals in their dioceses. Two years after Charlemagne's death, a Council of Aix la Chapelle issued statutes on this matter which deserve special notice. The bishops were required, after the example of the Fathers, to provide a house for the poor, and to support it from the Church funds. The canons were to resign a tenth part of their income in its favour. It was to be near the church, and under the care of a cleric, and in penitential seasons the canons were to wash the feet of the poor.

Whether these hospitals were endowed by clerics or lay people, they were placed under the jurisdiction of the Church, a point settled in the East, e.g. by the ordinances of Justinian, and in the West by Charlemagne and the decrees of councils and Popes. Even if a prince founded a hospital, still it was not as a secular ruler, but as a Christian, that he did so; it was not state policy, but the living spirit of Christianity which had called hospitals into being: it was not State revenues, but gifts bestowed, sometimes by ecclesiastics, sometimes by secular rulers, sometimes by private individuals, but always for the love of God, which maintained them after their foundation. The Council of Trent, again, enforces the obligation which lay upon bishops of watching over benevolent institutions. And the Church did her work well. "With such intelligence," says Von Raumer, "was the inner management [of such institutions] conducted as in truth to excite astonishment and admiration." True, even in the middle ages lay administrators did occasionally, to the great injury of the suffering poor, usurp the control of hospitals. But it was the Reformation which began to sever on principle the bond which connected works of benevolence with the power of the Church till modern statecraft completely snapped the link and substituted natural for Christian benevolence. No Catholic can approve of a change which is opposed to the whole tradition of the Church and to every Catholic instinct. Nor do results recommend the so-called emancipation of benevolence from the Church. The feeling of brotherhood between rich and poor has been changed to a great extent into positive enmity, and the State itself has suffered in consequence from the spread of Socialism. The poor accept State aid without gratitude, because it is very often given without real charity. Every experienced person knows the horror with which they regard the workhouse, and, on the other hand, the readiness with which indigent Catholics enter a house of refuge cared for by religious—such, for example, as the Little Sisters of the Poor or the Sisters of Nazareth.

This leads us to speak of another characteristic feature in Catholic charity. It was not only, or even chiefly, that the Church founded houses for the relief of the poor and suffering; she infused into her children a spirit which made them count it an honour to tend their suffering brethren, and, if need be, to sacrifice life itself in their behalf. From early times, bishops, like St. Basil the Great and St. Gregory Nazianzen, found time to tend the sick and minister to them with their own hands. Persons of the highest rank, such as Placilla, wife of Theodosius the Great, performed the most menial services for them. In the middle ages, St. Elizabeth of Hungary, from the time of her widowhood—i.e. from her twenty-first year—went daily to the hospital, gave the patients food and medicine, bound up their wounds and applied remedies to ulcers, from the very sight of which others shrank in horror. Everybody knows the love St. Francis had for the poor, and his tender care of the suffering, particularly of lepers. Whole orders were founded for this personal attendance on helpless sufferers, and the poor learned to love those who were born to wealth, when they saw the richest and the noblest among them making themselves the servants of the poor; they learned to bear their own poverty patiently, when they saw the rich counting it an honour to be poor for Christ's sake. Among such orders we may name the Canons Regular of St. Antony of Vienne, founded by a French nobleman, Gaston, towards the end of the eleventh century, for the succour of persons afflicted with "St. Antony's fire," a horrible disease, then raging in Western Europe; the Jesuats, a confraternity formed by B. John Colombino, which occupied itself in the preparation of medicines, &c., for the sick; the "Clerks Regular, Ministers of the Sick," also called "the Fathers of a Good Death," established at the end of the sixteenth century by St. Camillus of Lellis; the "Sisters of Charity," founded by St. Vincent of Paul; and other orders founded for the same ends and animated by the same heroic zeal, the name of which is legion.

The Catholic Church has also alleviated the hardships of prison life. The lot of prisoners was changed wherever Christianity became the religion of the State. The sexes were separated; care was taken that they should never lack the consolations of religion; greater liberty and better food were allowed to them on Sundays; the bishop had to visit the prisons every week, and to see that there were no abuses in the administration of discipline. In the middle ages, the Church exercised her tempering and restraining influence on the roughness and barbarity of the times. During that period, the constant wars subjected many innocent persons to imprisonment; and, accordingly, it was common for pious persons to devote large sums of money to the redemption of captives. Help was given in other ways, but all the works of mercy to captives were surpassed by the Trinitarian Order—an institute devoted to the redemption of captives from slavery under the Saracens. The rule of the Order of the Trinity was approved by Innocent III., in 1198; in 1223, a similar order, "for the redemption of captives," was established in Spain. In the seventeenth century, St. Vincent of Paul laboured for the galley-slaves, and changed places which had been like hell on earth into abodes of penance, resignation and peace. The Sisters of Notre Dame de la Charité, of St. Joseph, &c., have undertaken the superintendence of female prisoners, and till lately almost every prison for women in France and Belgium was under the care of nuns. Statesmen themselves have admitted that by religious, and religious only, could prisons be successfully managed.

We pass over, for want of space, the orders devoted to the care of the insane, the blind, deaf and dumb, &c., and will only touch in conclusion on one other work of Catholic charity. In early times and in the middle ages it was often difficult to borrow money except at usurious rates. To meet this evil, the Franciscan Father Barnabas of Terni, under Pius II. (1458–64), erected the first Monte di Pietà, at Perugia, in the States of the Church. The rich contributed capital, from charitable motives, and this was lent to the poor, on security indeed, but at a very low rate of interest. Soon almost every city in Italy had its Monte di Pietà. Several Popes, the Fifth Lateran Council, and the Council of Trent, confirmed these institutions, which in past times produced incalculable good.

No doubt many of these orders and institutes of charity fell away from their first zeal, and were abused for selfish ends. But holy souls have never been wanting to reform what was amiss, and to come with fresh help to the relief of their brethren. The words of the Psalm have been constantly fulfilled by Christ in his Church: "He will judge the poor of his people, and save the children of the poor." (From Hefele, "Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte, Archäologie," &c.)

CHARTOPHYLAX (more often spelt Carthophylax). The name signifies "keeper of the records" merely, and such was the original function of the ecclesiastics who held the office in the Eastern Church, answering to that of bibliothecarius among the Latins; but in course of time other duties, carrying with them a corresponding increase of charge, influence, and dignity, were imposed on the chartophylax. Yet it appears from the canons of Nice that in the fourth century the chartophylax of a cathedral was inferior in rank to the archdeacon, and was bound to obey him. But at Constantinople, the power and pre-eminence of the chartophylax, as a kind of secretary or grand chamberlain to the Patriarch, attained after a time to a great height. An exact appreciation of his office, and of the dignities attaching to it, as they stood in the ninth century, is given by a contemporary writer—Anastasius the bibliothecarian. The post of chartophylax in other cathedral churches in the East appears to have been assimilated more or less to that of the church of Constantinople; and hence this official, representing the bishop and exercising his jurisdiction, held in the Eastern nearly the same position as the archdeacon in the Western Church. Even at this day the Uniate Greeks of the Austrian Empire retain the office; with them, "the carthophylax directs the business of the episcopal chancery, and is one of the members of the metropolitan or cathedral chapter, along with the archpriest or chief provost, the archdeacon or lector, the primicerius or precentor, the ecclesiarch or churchwarden, and the scholaster or master of ceremonies." (See the rest of the article by Hausle, in Wetzer and Welte.)

CHARTREUX. [See CARTHUSIANS.]

CHASUBLE (Lat. casula, pænula, planeta; and in Greek, φελόνιον or φελώνιον, from φαινόλης, or φελόνης, identical with pænula). The chief garment of a priest celebrating Mass. It is worn outside the other vestments. Among the Greeks, it still retains its ancient form of a large round mantle. Among the Latins, its size has been curtailed, but it still covers the priest on both sides, and descends nearly to the knees. In France, Belgium, and very often in England, a cross is marked on the back: in Italy, this cross is usually in front. In the West, all who celebrate Mass wear the same chasuble, but among the Greeks, the chasuble of a bishop is ornamented with a number of crosses (φαινόλιον πολυσταύριον), while an archbishop wears a different vestment altogether, viz. the σάκκος, which is supposed to resemble the coat of Christ during His Passion. In Russia, even bishops, since the time of Peter the Great, have worn the σάκκος.

The chasuble is derived from a dress once commonly worn in daily life. Classical writers often mention the "pænula," or large outer garment which the Romans wore on journeys or in military service. "Casula," from which our word chasuble is obtained, does not occur in pure Latinity. It was, however, used in later ages, as an equivalent for the "pænula," or mantle. We first meet with the word in the will of Cæsarius of Arles (about 540), and in the biography of his contemporary Fulgentius of Ruspe. In both instances, "casula" denotes a garment used in common life. Isidore of Seville (about 630) uses the word in the same sense, and explains it as a diminutive of "casa," because, like a little house, it covered the whole body. The same author tells us that "planeta" comes from the Greek πλανάω, "to wander," because its ample folds seemed to wander over the body. It is plain, from the examples given by Ducange, that "planeta," like "casula" and "pænula," denoted a dress worn by laymen as well as clerics.

It is in the former half of the sixth century that we find the first traces of the chasuble as an ecclesiastical vestment. In the famous mosaic at San Vitale, in Ravenna, the archbishop, Maximus, is represented wearing a vestment which is clearly the chasuble, and over which the pallium is suspended. The chasuble has the same shape which prevailed till the eleventh century. The Fourth Council of Toledo, in 633, makes express mention of the "planeta," as a priestly vestment. Germanus, Archbishop of Constantinople, about 715, uses the word φελώνιον in the same technical sense; while at the beginning of the ninth century, Amalarius of Metz speaks of the "casula" as the "general garment of sacred leaders" ("generale indumentum sacrorum ducum"). Almost at the same time, Rabanus Maurus gives the derivation of "casula" quoted above from Isidore of Seville, and goes on to say that it is "the last of all the vestments, which covers and preserves all the rest." Later authors of the middle age copy their predecessors; and even Innocent III. adds nothing of his own save certain mystical meanings implied in the use of the vestment.

To sum up, the chasuble was first of all an ordinary dress; from the sixth century at latest it was adapted to the use of the Church, till gradually it became an ecclesiastical dress pure and simple. But did it at once become distinctive of the priesthood? The question admits of no certain answer. The eighth "Ordo Romanus" distinctly prescribes that acolytes, in their ordination, should receive the "planeta" or chasuble. Amalarius, in like manner, declares that the chasuble belongs to all clerics. On the other hand, almost all ancient writers who refer to the Church use of the chasuble regard it as the distinctive dress of priests. Cardinal Bona mentions this difficulty without venturing to explain it. Hefele suggests that as the Greek φελόνιον signifies (1) a chasuble in the modern sense, (2) a kind of collar, reaching from the neck to the elbows, which is worn by lectors or readers, so the Latin word "planeta" may have been also employed as the name of two distinct vestments. But even if this explanation is correct, the fact remains that even now the deacon and subdeacon in High Mass during Advent and Lent wear chasubles folded in front, laying them aside while they sing the Gospel and Epistle. This custom is mentioned by Hugo of St. Victor (d. 1140).

The form of the chasuble has undergone great alterations. The ancient chasuble, which enveloped the whole body, was found very inconvenient, and hence, in the twelfth century, it was curtailed at the sides, so as to leave the arms free. Of this kind is a chasuble said to have been used by St. Bernard. In shape, it resembles what is now known as the Gothic chasuble, although the ornaments upon it are not Gothic, but Romanesque. At a later date, the chasuble was still further curtailed, till in the Rococo period all resemblance to the original type disappeared. However, even in Italy, attempts were made to recall the ancient shape, at least to a certain extent. Thus St. Charles Borromeo, in a provincial council, ordered that the chasubles for the Ambrosian rite should be about four and a half feet wide, and should reach nearly to the heels.

Various symbolical significations have been given to the chasuble. The earliest writers make it a figure of charity, which, as Rabanus Maurus says, "is eminent above all the other virtues." This is the most popular explanation of the symbolism; but we also find it regarded by an ancient writer as typical of good works; ancient Sacramentaries and Missals consider it as the figure of sacerdotal justice, or of humility, charity, and peace, which are to cover and adorn the priest on every side; while the prayer in the Roman Missal connects the chasuble with the yoke of Christ. (Hefele, "Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte, Archäologie und Liturgik," p. 195 seq.)

CHERUBIM. Superhuman beings, often mentioned in Scripture. They guarded the entrance to Paradise after the fall; the images of two cherubim overshadowed the ark; God is represented in the Psalms as sitting or throned upon the cherubim; Ezekiel saw them in vision, with wings, with human hands, full of eyes and with four faces, viz. those of a man, lion, ox, and eagle. The Fathers generally are agreed in regarding them as angels; for the opinion of Theodore of Mopsuestia,[1] who denied this, seems to be quite singular in Christian antiquity. They form the second among the nine orders of angels. What the meaning of the word is, it is difficult even to conjecture. Most of the Fathers explain the word as meaning knowledge, or the fullness of knowledge; but, as Petavius justly remarks, this derivation finds no support either in Hebrew or Chaldee. Many conjectural derivations have been suggested by modern scholars. In a cuneiform inscription copied by M. Lenormant, "Kirubu" is a synonym of the Steer-god, whose winged image filled the place of guardian at the entrance of the Assyrian palaces. With this word, the Hebrew cherub may be connected, and the etymology may belong to some non-Semitic language.[1]

CHILD OF MARY. About the year 1560 a Jesuit professor at the Roman College, named John Leonius (?), used to assemble a number of his students after lecture to give them pious discourses and to guide them in their spiritual difficulties. These gatherings were placed under the protection of the Blessed Virgin. The members undertook to do their best to advance in piety and learning; they heard Mass every morning; once a week they went to confession, and once a month to Holy Communion. On Sundays they visited the hospitals and performed other works of mercy. The young society soon began to attract attention. Gregory XIII., in 1584, gave it his hearty approval. Numerous branches were formed in imitation of the original. The only bond of union between them, besides identity of aim and practices, was aggregation to the parent congregation in Rome which is called "Prima Primaria." The members were everywhere distinguished for their virtue, and were looked upon as the champions of orthodoxy against heretics and infidels. In 1748 Benedict XIV., himself a member, published the "Golden Bull," Gloriosæ Dominæ, in which the confraternity was strongly commended and enriched with numerous indulgences. The expulsion of the Jesuits from France, in 1762, where the "Congregation," as it was called, especially flourished, led to the suppression of the confraternity there. After the Revolution it revived; and during the Restoration a fierce battle raged between the "Congregationistes" and the Liberals, ending in their suppression once more in 1830. It has since, however, been re-established. Pius IX. and Leo XIII. have both highly favoured the institute.

The confraternity was thrown open to women and young girls, and in this form is perhaps more familiar to us than the male branch from which it originally sprang. (See "La Congrégation," by M. de Grandmaison, and the art. SODALITY.)

CHINESE RITES. The Jesuit missionary St. Francis Xavier desired to preach the Gospel in China, but his wish was not fulfilled, and he died in the forty-fifth year of his age, A.D. 1552, on the little island of Sancian, close to the great empire which was the object of his longing. His religious brethren entered on the labour which he had left undone, and worked with great apparent success. Father Ricci's mathematical knowledge secured the favour of the Imperial Court. He devoted himself to the mission twenty-seven years (1582–1610), and left behind him 300 churches, one of which was in the capital, Pekin. A German Jesuit, Schall, who came on the field in 1622, was also a distinguished mathematician. Shortly afterwards a great change occurred in the fortunes of the Chinese mission. It had been left entirely in Jesuit hands; indeed, Gregory XIII. had in 1585 forbidden the members of other orders to enter China. But this restriction was removed, and in 1631 the first Dominican missionaries appeared, who were followed in 1633 by another Dominican, Morales, and by Franciscans. The new missionaries, and especially Morales, accused the Jesuits of gaining so-called converts by an unworthy compliance with Chinese idolatry and superstition; and the famous controversy on the Chinese rites began. We shall have occasion to enter upon the precise nature of the Jesuit concessions later. Here we content ourselves with stating the main contention as given by the Jesuit advocate Pray ("Hist. Controversiarum de Rit. Sinicis," p. 9 seq.). Ricci and his successors, Pray tells us, considered the offerings of food and the marks of homage given to the dead in general, and to Confucius the great Chinese philosopher in particular, as certainly free from idolatry, and probably even from superstition. Further, the Jesuits allowed their converts to use as the name of God the Chinese words signifying "Lord of Heaven," or "Lord of the Sky," or even the single word Tien—"sky" or "heaven," and they exhibited in their churches tablets with the inscription "King tien," "adore the sky." These were the practices known as the Chinese rites or usages.

In 1643 the Dominicans sent Morales to Rome, and he submitted to the Congregation of Propaganda seventeen propositions on the Chinese usages tolerated by the Jesuits. These usages, after consultation with theologians and the Roman Inquisition, were prohibited by Innocent X., till the Holy See should otherwise determine. Meanwhile, the Jesuit Martini tried to convince the authorities at Rome that the impugned customs had nothing to do with religion, and that the success of the Catholic Church in China depended on their being permitted. He obtained from the Inquisition a decree, confirmed in 1656 by Alexander VII. This edict allowed the practice of the Chinese rites, provided they possessed a merely civil character, were free from all admixture of idolatry, and could not be omitted without grave loss to the Chinese Christians. The complaints, however, were renewed by three Lazarists whom Alexander VII. had made vicars-apostolic, and Clement IX. in 1669 renewed the decrees of 1645 and 1656, with a significant addition in which the regulars were ordered to obey the vicars-apostolic. While these disputes were dividing the missionaries into two hostile camps, the Jesuits were rising in the favour of the Court, and in 1692 the emperor Khang Hi publicly announced that the Jesuits had full leave to preach, and his own subjects to embrace Christianity. Still the opposition of the other missionaries lasted. The Lazarist vicar-apostolic forbade the rites in 1693, and sent a priest to Rome three years later to justify the step which had been taken. Innocent XII. died before the commission he had appointed had settled the question, but his successor Clement XI. took the matter vigorously in hand, and, desirous of full information, sent Tournon, patriarch of Antioch, to China as Apostolic legate in 1703. After examination of the points at issue, Tournon in 1707 condemned the Chinese rites as idolatrous, and in consequence of his evangelical courage was imprisoned by the Chinese emperor. It is a melancholy fact that the Portuguese at Macao were not ashamed to act as his gaolers, and there he died in 1710, after his elevation to the dignity of cardinal. The Jesuits and bishops who thought with them appealed against the legate's decision to Rome; but they found less favour there than at Pekin. Clement XI. confirmed decrees of the Inquisition (1709 and 1710) in accordance with Tournon's decision, and finally closed the question by the Bull "Ex illa die" (1715). Every Catholic missionary in China was required to promise on oath all possible resistance to the rites. It was in vain that a new legate, Mezzabarba, tried to modify Clement's ruling. The prohibition was renewed in all its force, the concessions of Mezzabarba recalled, and the oath again exacted by Benedict XIV.

We have abstained of set purpose from discussing the serious charges of rebellion against and cruelty to Cardinal Tournon which are made against the Jesuits. They are contained in the "Anecdotes sur l'état de la religion dans la Chine" (first volume, 1733), by Villermaules; in the "Memorie Storiche del Cardinale di Tournon" (Venice, 1761–2), prepared, as is commonly alleged, by that determined opponent of the Jesuits, Cardinal Passionei; and in the Lazarist "Memoirs of the Congregation of the Mission" (vol. iv.–viii.), collated with other authorities in the Vatican library by Father Theiner, but suppressed by Pius IX., and now an exceedingly rare book. The charges have often been repeated, e.g. by the Protestant historian Mosheim, and they are answered by Pray in the work mentioned above. The writer of this article does not possess the knowledge which would entitle him to an opinion, and what he has read on either side proceeds from writers too much influenced by party spirit to inspire confidence. But, after all, the conduct of the Jesuits to Tournon is not a question of theological moment. It affects the conduct of individuals, or at most of a religious order, but it has nothing to do with the great principles at stake. Fortunately these principles have been stated with Christian moderation and with rigid impartiality by the celebrated Dominican, Natalis Alexander. It is only right to compare his account with that of Pray, but we are confident that the result can only enhance the credit of Natalis Alexander. Besides this, a very clear and authoritative statement of the controversy will be found in the decree of the Roman Inquisition which bears date November 20, 1704, and is printed at length in the "Mémoires pour Rome sur l'état de la religion chrétienne dans la Chine" (1709; no place of publication given).

It is well known that Confucius, who lived about 600 years before Christ, was in no sense a religious teacher, or even a philosopher, if by that term we understand one who investigates the ultimate causes of things. He laid down rules of life based on utility, inculcated great respect for order and for public authority, and great reverence for ancestors, for ancient custom, for all, in short, which represented the traditions of Chinese civilisation. For the rest, he was content to let religion alone; and the ruling classes then, as now, were mostly atheistic, their atheism, however, being perfectly compatible with belief in fate, and in a quasi-immortality of the soul, so far as this, that the forces which constitute man's life were supposed to endure after death mingled with other powers of nature, and with a boundless toleration of popular superstition as a means of restraint suitable to the multitude. Now the Jesuits may have had some excuse for allowing the neophytes to call God the "Lord of Heaven," or even "Heaven," though apparently the Chinese literati used these terms in a pantheistic and materialistic sense. Even here they went to lengths manifestly dangerous and even reprehensible, and we cannot wonder that the Roman Inquisition refused to sanction the inscription "Adore the sky" as suitable for a Christian church. (See the second article in the questions proposed to the Inquisition.) But the worship of ancestors, and especially of Confucius, was far more scandalous. We will quote a description of this worship by a Jesuit Father, Le Comte, who took a prominent part in the dispute. "They prostrate themselves before the name of Confucius, before the name and the tomb of the ancestors. Offerings are made of food and vegetables. Incense is burnt. The duty is acknowledged of respect for the one (Confucius) and gratitude to the others (the ancestors). Such has been their immemorial practice; this is the essence of the rites. That, then, is good and laudable. What more do we want? We do not even ask so much, and we limit ourselves to that which is indispensably attached to the functions of public office" (Lettre du R. P. le Comte, p. 74; apud N. A. Lettre 1, p. 25). Even this is a very inadequate account. Confucius was venerated as the greatest of the sons of man (see decree of the Inquisition in 1704, super iv. artic.) He was addressed in these words—"All hasten to offer thee sacrifices and prayers. . . . . Let thy spirit come towards us" ("Apologie des Dominicains," append. pp. 37 and 211; apud N. A. Lettre 1, p. 41). Ancestors were worshipped according to a maxim of Confucius, as actually present, and they were invited to rest in their pictures. Even the atheistic Mandarins believed that the subtle air of the sky into which the souls of the dead had been dissolved was attracted to earth by sacrifice and the other rites, and devotion to ancestors was believed to ensure good luck.

The ruin of the Chinese mission is said to have followed the decision hostile to the "rites." But ruin was preferable to success, bought so dear. No one who has read St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians can reasonably doubt what his decision would have been. Christ has no fellowship with idols, and the religion which is from above, as another great authority reminds us, is first "pure," then, and only then, "peaceable."

CHIVALRY (Lat. caballus, a horse). The system of ideas prevalent among the mounted men-at-arms (Fr. chevalier, It. cavaliero, Span. caballero, Ger. Ritter, Eng. knight) of the middle ages, and which still influences their descendants and European society in general, to a greater or less degree, is known by this name.

The Equites, the equestrian order, of ancient Rome summon before the mind no corresponding associations. The three patrician tribes constituted, indeed, the "horsemen" in the organisation of Servius Tullius, and had the first place both in arms and in politics. But before the end of the Republic commercialism invaded the equestrian order, and when we speak of a "Roman knight," or eques, the name suggests a selfish capitalist, wringing taxes out of oppressed provincials, and living in vugar luxury at Rome; it is as far as possible from calling up any of the ideas which we associate with the term "chivalry."

After the disruption of the empire of Charlemagne, the importance of horse-soldiers in war continually increased. For this there were various reasons: among others the improvements made in armour, which required that the weight of the panoply should be borne by the horse he rode, so that the warrior might preserve freedom and celerity of movement. But the chief reason was the condition of European society, under which, in the absence of strong central authority in the various countries, power was sown broadcast over thousands of principalities, counties, and fiefs. The holders of these had no other way of deciding which should rule the other, or believed they had none, but by going to war. Horses and armour, like breech-loading rifles at the present day, gave an advantage to those using them over foot-soldiers; whoever, therefore, could afford it went into battle on horseback. The "miles Crassi" was a sturdy footman, armed with the pilum, the ensis, and the scutum; the "miles" of the eleventh century was a horseman cased in as much armour as he could bear the weight of, and attended by lightly-armed followers on foot. The principles of courage and fidelity may have been transmitted to the knights of the eleventh century from their Teutonic or Iberian ancestors; in these respects a Hermann or a Viriathus left little to be desired. But if ferocity and rapacity were to be indulged without check, if cruelty and injustice, availing themselves of the weakness of law, were to be, without protest, the accompaniment and the fruit of the warrior's toils, no amelioration of the general lot could be hoped for, though extraordinary villany might be repressed by extraordinary chastisement,[1] until the expiration of the long period required to weld a loose feudal aristocracy into an orderly law-governed State. Religion here stepped in, and endeavoured to consecrate and transform that rough struggle for superiority which was everywhere going on. The cavalier was not to desist from war; that was an impossible requirement, and he was generally fit for not much else; but he was to draw the sword for just causes only, to succour the oppressed, resist attack and encroachment, and support his liege lord according to his oath. He was to be immovable in his faith, obedient to the holy Church, full of respect for her ministers, and devoutly submissive to the Vicar of Christ, the Roman Pontiff. For the honour and service of the ever blessed Mother of God, whose faithful vassal he was to be, women were to find in him an honourable, fearless, and virtuous protector. A high standard of self-respect could not but accompany the consecration to these lofty ends. The word of the knight once given, whether to friend or foe, must be irrevocable; he must be no truce-breaker or snatcher of mean advantages; his honour must be without stain. Courtesy and humanity were to mark his bearing and his acts. In a word, the Christian soldier was to have all those perfections of character and all those grâces d'état which the revelation of the Gospel and the institution of the Sacraments have rendered possible; he would then be a perfect mirror of chivalry. This was the ideal; but when we ask in what degree was it ever realised, we are forced to admit that human passion and perversity have played their part, and made chivalry by no means an unmixed blessing to the world. The reverence for woman, grounded on a just devotion to the Mother of God, was turned into an idolatry; human love (such was the baser teaching) was to fill the soul of the true knight and to predominate over all other thoughts; nay, the very forms and words of the divine office were blasphemously parodied in the service of this vicious development.[1] Again, the self-respect of the true knight was depraved into a pride of class, which looked down on the labouring non-fighting multitude as base roturiers and plebeians, the shedding of whose blood was a very trifling matter; his sense of honour often became an absurd punctiliousness, tyrannising over the free speech and action of other men. Human rights and human equality were thus ignored; but this was not the doctrine of chivalry—it was the corruption of that doctrine. The true, noble, knightly spirit and its counterfeit went on side by side, energising, founding, and destroying, for centuries. The Popes, beginning with Urban II. and ending with Pius V., preached, blessed, and aided the holy wars, by which, in the cause of justice, the places made sacred by our Lord's sojourn and sufferings were to be taken out of the hands of persecuting infidels, or Christian lands to be delivered from Moslem thraldom. Numerous orders of chivalry were instituted—the Templars, the Knights Hospitallers, or of St. John of Jerusalem, the Knights of the Sword, the Teutonic Knights, those of Calatrava, Alcantara, and many more—the labours of which, speaking generally, were an honour to human nature and a benefit to mankind. The spirit of chivalry was refined and exalted by the invention of fruitful conceptions, such as that of the Saint Graal, by which the whole tone of romance literature was elevated. On the other hand, in the fourteenth century, while the form and ceremonial of chivalry were greatly developed, its essence—the contention for justice—was shamefully forgotten. Our Edward III. instituted the Order of the Garter, but waged unjust wars with France, causing incredible misery; his son, the Black Prince, waited on the French king, his prisoner, at table, but ordered the indiscriminate massacre of the people of Limoges.

Burke wrote, beholding the first shameful excesses of the French Jacobins, "The age of chivalry is past;" but the age of chivalry will never be wholly past, while faith survives and wrongs remain to be redressed. Wherever, and so far as, the true Catholic faith, and the imitation of Christ and His saints, inspire a population, a class, or an individual, there, and in that proportion, the spirit of chivalry, dormant and entranced as it seems now, will revive. That spirit is, as we have said, essentially, the readiness to contend for justice. For the present it remains passive in every part of Europe, stupefied, as it were, by the audacity of the so-called Liberals, who, having got into their hands the organisations of government in most of the states, are carrying their hostility to divine faith, the Church, and the Pope into practice, with a vigour and a malice which Christians find a difficulty in conceiving. But it will awake, and when it does it will not ask whether universal suffrage has decided this way or that, but whether it is just that this or that change should be made or unmade. Parliamentary government assisted a tyrant in England to deprive the people of their religion, and enacted that none who did not communicate with heresy should serve their country.[1] Parliamentary government in France has recently sanctioned the perpetration of measures of violence against the religious orders, so flagrant in their iniquity, that the infidels of other countries were almost scandalised. The temper of true chivalry, when its awakening comes, will perhaps work changes which the verdict of the ballot-box would neither initiate nor ratify, yet which may be ultimately found to be beneficial and curative to European society.

[1] As in Gower's Confessio Amantis, and Chaucer's Court of Love.

[1] Test Act of 1673.

It need scarcely be said that an order of chivalry which has abandoned the Catholic faith, and repudiated obedience to the chair of Peter, has forfeited its title. An order like the Garter, in which the official chief of the religion of the false prophet is one of the "knights," has evidently nothing of chivalry about it but the name. (See Kenelm Digby's "Broad Stone of Honour" and "Mores Catholici.")

CHOIR (chorus). From the "band" of singers at the divine worship, who were placed between the clergy in the apse and the people in the body of the church, the space between the sanctuary and the nave came to be called the choir. In the course of time, the superior clergy of a cathedral or collegiate church found it necessary to migrate from the confined space of the apse or sanctuary, which they occupied in primitive times, and to establish themselves in seats, called stalls, on either side of the choir. These stalls were often ornamented in the most exquisite manner.

The recitation of the breviary for each day takes place "in choir" in cathedrals, collegiate churches, and the great majority of convents.

CHORAL VICARS. These were anciently clerics to whom the precentor (i.e. the canon who had the charge of the music), in a cathedral or collegiate church, committed the immediate superintendence of the choir. In the reconstituted chapters of France and Germany choral vicars are directly appointed to perform this duty, in concert with the canons, and receive salaries accordingly.

CHORAULES (χοραύλης, lit. a flute-player in an orchestra). In the Eastern Church the name appears to have been transferred to the choir-boys of a cathedral generally.

CHOREPISCOPUS (Gr. χωρεπίσκοπος, lit. a country superintendent or bishop). Nothing is heard of such persons in the first three centuries. The first mention of them is in the canons of the Councils of Ancyra and Neocæsarea (314), and they probably arose in Asia Minor. A chorepiscopus was appointed and ordained by the bishop of the diocese, to whom he was answerable for the right discharge of his duties. A certain district was assigned to him to administer; he was to attend to the wants of the poor and the maintenance of all Christian institutions, and he had the power of conferring minor orders, even to the subdiaconate inclusive. It has been argued —especially by the Protestant writers Hammond, Beveridge, and others—that they were true bishops, although of inferior dignity and power to the recognised bishops of sees. The fact that fifteen "country-bishops" subscribed the Nicene canons seems to lend support to such a view. But the better opinion is that, notwithstanding the name, they were neither true bishops nor an order of clergy interposed between bishops and priests, but simply priests, invested with a jurisdiction smaller than the episcopal, but larger than the sacerdotal. Many notices of them scattered up and down in ecclesiastical history, and the consenting tradition of the Fathers, adjust themselves to this view of their office, and not to the former. Thus a canon of Neocæsarea likens them to the seventy-two disciples sent out by Christ; but these were always associated with the priesthood, not with the episcopate. The Nicene canon which authorises a bishop to treat one who had been deposed from the see for heresy, but who desired to return to the Church, as a chorepiscopus, and give him employment and rank as such, is itself a proof that they were not bishops; for the council would not have empowered a single bishop to reinstate to his former place a deposed member of the order. Yet it might seem as if they formed something like an intermediate clerical order, for a canon of Chalcedon says, Si quis ordinaverit per pecunias episcopum, aut chorepiscopum, aut presbyterum, aut diaconum ("if anyone shall have ordained for money a bishop, or a chorepiscopus, or a priest, or a deacon"). It is certain, however, that in no age of the Church have the grades of holy (or superior) order been reckoned as more than three—bishop, priest, and deacon. A chorepiscopus, therefore, must have been either a bishop or a priest; but we have shown that he was not a true bishop; he was therefore a priest, but one who received on his appointment a spiritual jurisdiction higher than any priest could pretend to. The Council of Laodicea calls them περιοδευταί, or "circuit officers," which shows that they were then expected to make visitation tours in their districts. St. Basil had no fewer than fifty chorepiscopi under him, governing districts of his extensive Cappadocian see, like the archdeacons whom Remigius appointed in the different counties when he organised his great see of Lincoln.[1]

In the Western Church we hear nothing of chorepiscopi before the Council of Riez, in the fifth century. But after 500 the notices of them become numerous, and under Charlemagne, according to Thomassin, their numbers and power were such as to be formidable even to the bishops themselves. In the later Carlovingian times unworthy persons were often foisted into the sees through lay interference, for the sake of the wealth with which they were endowed, and such bishops were glad to devolve as much of their functions as they could divest themselves of on chorepiscopi, engaged at a low rate of remuneration, and live in sloth and luxury at Court. This abuse called forth the zeal of the Roman Pontiffs, and by a series of Papal briefs and conciliar decrees, from Leo III. to the end of the ninth century, restraining the authority of the chorepiscopi, annulling many of their acts, and ordering that no more should be appointed, the endeavour was persistently made to compel the bishops to perform their own duties and not attempt to delegate them. Nothing more is heard of this class of clergy after the middle of the eleventh century. (Thomassin; Soglia; Smith and Cheetham.)

CHORISTER. A singer in a choir, whether cathedral, collegiate, or parochial. The name is usually applied to boys rather than men.

The regular singers (κανονικοὶ ψάλται) of a church received in early times a kind of ordination, without imposition of hands, which could be conferred by a presbyter. The form of words prescribed by the Fourth Council of Carthage was, "See that thou believe in thy heart what thou singest with thy mouth, and approve in thy works what thou believest with thy heart." (Smith and Cheetham, article Cantor.)

CHRISM. Olive oil mixed with balm, blessed by the bishop and used by the Church in confirmation as well as in baptism, ordination, consecration of altar-stones, chalices, churches, and in the blessing of baptismal water. The oil, according to the Roman Catechism, signifies the fulness of grace, since oil is diffusion; the balm mixed with it, incorruption and the "good odour of Christ."

In itself the word chrism (χρῖσμα) need not mean more than "anything smeared on;" but even in classical writers it denotes especially a scented unguent, while the common oil was called ἔλαιον. It was this simple unperfumed oil which was used in the earliest times for sacred purposes, but from the sixth century oil mixed with balm began to be employed. This balm (βάλσαμος, in the classics ὀποβάλσαμον) is a kind of perfumed resin, produced by a tree which grows in Judæa and Arabia. This Eastern balm was always used in the West till the sixteenth century, when Paul III. and Pius IV. permitted the use of a better kind of balm, brought by the Spaniards from the West Indies. The Orientals did not content themselves with simply mixing balm. Thus the Greeks mingle forty different spices, and the Maronites, before they were reunited to the Catholic Church, prepared their chrism from oil, saffron, cinnamon, essence of roses, white incense, &c.

The consecration of the oils during the Mass goes back to the earliest times. Cyprian mentions it in Ep. 70, addressed to Januarius; and St. Basil attributes the origin of this blessing to apostolic tradition. It of course included chrism in the strict sense, when that came into use. In the West this blessing was always reserved to bishops; in the East, as may be seen from Goar's "Euchologium," it was only given by the patriarchs. At first the oils used to be blessed on any day at Mass, but in a letter of Pope Leo to the emperor of the same name, in the Synod of Toledo (490), and in all the older Sacramentaries and ritual-books, Maundy Thursday is fixed for this blessing. It was only in France that the custom survived of blessing the oils on any day, till uniformity with the use of other churches was introduced by the Council of Meaux, in 845. The function took place in the second of the three Masses which used to be said on Maundy Thursday; whence the name "Missa Chrismatis." The blessing of the chrism was called "Benedictio chrismatis principalis." All the clergy of the diocese used to assist, till, in the eighth century, the custom altered, and only those who lived near the cathedral came, while the others had the holy oils sent to them. The chrism used to be kept in a vessel like a paten with a depression in the middle. A "patena chrismalis" of this kind is mentioned by Anastasius, in his Life of St. Silvester. (Kraus, "Real-Encyclopädie.") word מָשִׁיחַ, as is expressly stated in John i. 42: "We have found the Messias, which is interpreted Christ." In the Old Testament the word is used of the high-priest, who was anointed for his office (e.g. in Levit. iv. 3); of kings, who were also anointed—e.g. 1 Reg. xxiv. 7, where David calls Saul "the anointed of the Lord:" in the second Psalm, "against the Lord, and against his anointed" (where χριστὸς is the word in the LXX); with which we may compare other places, such as Dan. ix. 25, Hab. iii. 13, Ps. cxxxi. 17. The Hebrew word designates the king who was to come, the promised Messias. In the doctrinal language of post-biblical Judaism, this expected deliverer is called almost with the significance of a proper name, מָשִׁיחַ, of which "Messias"[1] is only another form, and "Christ," as we have seen, a translation. Hence, when our Lord came, "the Christ" (ὁ Χριστὸς)[2] was his official title, while "Jesus" was his ordinary name. When the word occurs in the Gospels, it constantly implies a reference to the Messiah as portrayed by the prophets.

CHRIST, "Anointed" (Gr. χριστός from χρίω), a translation of the Hebrew

The history of Christ's life belongs to a Biblical rather than a theological dictionary; it is only the teaching of the Church on his Person and office which concerns us here. We may divide the subject into two halves, treating under (A) of what Christ is; under (B) of his work.

(A) Natures and Person of Christ.—Jesus Christ, according to the Catechism familiar to English Catholics, is "God the Son made man for us." He has therefore two natures: that of God, and that of man. As God, according to the Nicene Creed, He was born of his Father, before all worlds: He is God from God—i.e. He, being true and perfect God, proceeds from God the Father, who is also true and perfect God—He is light from light; begotten, not made, as creatures. He exists from all eternity. He is almighty, omniscient, incapable of error or of sin. At the moment of his Incarnation, He further became true man, without, however, in any way ceasing to be God. This truth is vigorously expressed by St. Leo in his dogmatic epistle to Flavian, which was accepted by the Fathers of the Fourth Œcumenical Council. "The Son of God," Leo says, "enters the abasement of this world (hæc mundi infima), descending from his heavenly seat, and [yet] not receding from his Father's glory; begotten according to a new order and by a new birth. By a new order: because being invisible in his own nature (in suis) He became visible in ours; being incomprehensible, He willed to be comprehended; remaining before time, He began to be from a (certain) time." Moreover, He had a true body, as the Church taught from early times against the Docetæ; a true human soul, so that as man He could fear, sorrow, reason, &c., as the Church taught against the heretic Apollinaris; a human will, as distinct from his divine will, as was defined in the Sixth General Council against the Monothelites. Thus, in the words of the Fourth General Council, "Christ Jesus [the] only begotten Son, is to be acknowledged in two natures, without confusion, without change . . . since the difference of the natures is by no means annulled on account of the union, but rather the property of each nature preserved." Lastly, those two natures are united (so the Council of Ephesus defined) in one Person. Our body and soul are united in one person, so—though, of course, the analogy is imperfect—the divine and human natures were united in one Divine Person, who acted and suffered in either nature. To believe otherwise, is to assert, with the Nestorians, that there are two Sons and two Christs.

Such are the chief definitions of the Church on the Natures and Person of Christ; but it is necessary to point out some important corollaries from these first principles of the faith. The following seem to be the most important.

(1) Christ, having a human soul, had true human knowledge, as distinct from that which belonged to Him as God. His human soul did not, and could not, know God with that perfect and infinite comprehension with which God comprehends Himself. The contrary proposition, held by Augustine of Rome, was condemned by Nicholas V. Christ acquired knowledge in the same way as other men—i.e. experimentally; for, as we read in the Epistle to the Hebrews, He "learned obedience from the things which He suffered." It is important, however, not to misunderstand Catholic doctrine on this head. Even in Christ as man, there was no ignorance which had to be removed by instruction or experience. On the contrary, as Christ's soul was hypostatically united to the Word, as He was the head from which grace and glory was to flow into the members, it was fitting that He should, from the first moment of his earthly existence, see God face to face with his human soul, as the blessed do in heaven. This beatific knowledge was always present, even when the inferior part of his soul was in agony on the cross. Again, St. Thomas argues that as the soul of Christ is the most perfect of all created things, therefore "no perfection found in creatures is to be denied to it;" and he goes on to say that, besides the knowledge of God seen in his essence, and of all things seen in God, besides the experimental knowledge common to all men, the soul of Christ had a knowledge infused or poured into it, by which He knew most fully all the mysteries of grace, and every object to which human cognition extends or can extend.

[1] The Greek word Messias (Μεσσίας or Μεσίας) is immediately derived, not from the Hebrew, but from the Chaldee מְשִׁיחָא, the ח being omitted between the two long vowels, as in μεδὰ = מְחוֹרָא, Nehem. vii. 54, and the σ sometimes doubled, as in Ἀβεσσαλώμ.

[2] It usually has the article in the Gospels, but occurs oftener than not without it in St. Paul's Epistles.

(2) Christ was absolutely sinless and incapable of sin, because his actions were the actions of God, who is holiness itself; so that in Him sin was a physical impossibility. Moreover, in Him there could be no involuntary rebellion of the flesh or lower appetites, no temptation from within, because in Him human nature was united to the Word, and it was the office of the Word to rule the human nature united to it and to hold it in absolute subjection. He could, indeed, as the statements of the Gospels prove, wonder and fear and suffer mental distress, but in Him these feelings were in perfect subjection to reason.

(3) Christ had the fullness of all grace—i.e. over and above the grace of the hypostatic union grace was infused into his soul so that it was most perfectly sanctified, according to the prophecy of Isaias, "the Spirit of the Lord is upon me."

(4) Christ did not only take a real human body, but He took one subject to those defects which followed from the common sin of mankind, except so far as these defects were repugnant to the end of the Incarnation. The reason of his taking these defects (the capability of hunger, thirst, and the like), and no others, was that Christ became subject to infirmity, with the precise object of satisfying for the sins of human nature. Therefore He took upon Him in his own body the weaknesses caused by Adam's sin. He did not, however, assume bodily defects so far as they are incentives to sin or impediments to virtue, since this would have been inconsistent with his office as redeemer. The interesting question on the personal appearance of Christ will be treated in a separate article [CHRIST, PERSONAL APPEARANCE AND REPRESENTATIONS OF].

(5) Inasmuch as divine and human nature, although remaining each of them distinct in its own properties, were united in the Person of the Word, it follows that human attributes may be predicated of or ascribed to God the Son; and, on the other hand, that divine attributes may be predicated of the man Christ Jesus. Thus, although it was his human nature which Christ took from Mary, and although she is not the mother of the Godhead, still the Council of Ephesus defined that the Blessed Virgin is really and truly the Mother of God. So, again, we may truly say, God suffered, God died, of the man Jesus Christ is the eternal God, by whom all things were made. [See COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM.] Moreover, as Cardinal Franzelin writes in his treatise on the Incarnation, "the sacred Humanity, or human nature with all its component parts, inasmuch as it is the nature of the Word," is the object of supreme adoration, though, of course, we adore the flesh not because it is flesh, but because it is united to the Word. He continues: "This is clearly and plainly taught in the definitions of councils and in the discussions of the Fathers." Thus the Fifth General Council[1] anathematises those who "affirm that Christ is adored in two natures, in such sense that two adorations are introduced, one proper to God the Word, and one proper to the man [Christ] . . . and do not adore with one single adoration God the Word incarnate with his own flesh, as the Church of God has received from the beginning." Cardinal Franzelin also quotes words of St. Athanasius against the Apollinarists: "It [i.e. the body of Christ] is worshipped with due and divine adoration, for the Word, to whom the body belongs, is God;" and of St. John Damascene ("Fid. Orthodox." iii. 8): "Nor do we deny that the flesh [of Christ] is to be adored; nor again do we give supreme worship to a creature; for neither do we adore it as mere flesh, but as united to the Godhead." It will be observed that these principles formulated in the early Church contain within them a full justification of the adoration which the Church gives at this day to the Wounds, Blood, Heart, &c., of Christ. If we may, because of the hypostatic union, adore the flesh of Christ, which is a part of his Humanity, then undoubtedly we may for the same reason adore his Heart, which is a part of his sacred flesh.

(B) The Work and Office of Christ.—(1) Christ came chiefly, as the Fathers declare, to take away sin. This great truth is constantly asserted in Scripture. "The discipline of our peace was upon Him, and by his bruises we are healed." "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." "God sending his own Son, in the likeness of sinful flesh, even of sin, condemned sin in the flesh;" and thus in the Nicene Creed we confess that God was made man "for us men and for our salvation." This point is treated more fully in the article on the REDEMPTION. Here, it is enough to say that, although God might have forgiven sin without any satisfaction at all, still it was his will that a perfect satisfaction should be made, and be made by man. Accordingly, God the Son was incarnate. He was a natural mediator between God and man, since in Him the divine and human natures were united. As man, He was able to suffer and die; because He was God, his satisfaction possessed an infinite value, more than sufficient to compensate for the infinite dishonour done to God's majesty by sin. He of his free will offered Himself to endure the penalties incurred by men who were his brethren. He could not, of course, in the strict and proper sense, make our sins his own, nor was Christ as man punished. But He allowed wicked men to work their will upon Him, and, as the new Adam or head of the human race, took on Himself the obligation of satisfying for the offences of mankind. It was this free will with which He suffered that gave their meritorious character to the pains which He underwent. By his passion He merited every grace which has descended or ever will descend on man, for even under the old law all grace and pardon was bestowed for the merits of Christ foreseen. By the merits of his passion He on the day of his ascension opened Heaven "to all who believe." There He presents his five wounds and pleads the efficacy of the work He accomplished on Calvary; while on earth He continues and applies his sacrifice in the holy Mass, thus remaining a priest for ever.[1]

(2) Christ came to teach, so fulfilling the prophetic as well as the priestly office. "Behold," God says in Isaias, "I have given Him for a witness to the people, for a leader and a master to the Gentiles." He Himself declared that He came "to bear witness to the truth." He revealed the nature of the Triune God, and, first to his apostles, then through them and their successors to the world, He explained the mysteries of the kingdom of God, and the way to heaven. He gave perfect instruction in morals, particularly in the sermon on the mount, in which He speaks with authority, as the giver of the new law. Lastly, He taught, as no mere man could, by example, exhibiting Himself as the model of every virtue.

(3) Christ is the Head of the Church, militant in this world, suffering in Purgatory, and triumphant in heaven, and this headship belongs to Christ as man, for St. Paul in Ephes. i., after mentioning the fact that God raised Christ from the dead, adds that He made "Him head over all the church." This proves that the headship belongs to Christ as man, for it was in his human nature that Christ was raised from the dead. Christ is head, not only because He is supereminent in dignity as compared with the members of his mystical body, but also because grace and glory flow from Him to the members of his Church in earth and Purgatory and in heaven. Even Catholics living in mortal sin are members of Christ, connected with Christ their head by the gift of faith; and the proposition of Quesnel, that "he who does not lead a life worthy of a son of God and of a member of Christ ceases to have God within him for his Father and Christ for his head," was condemned by Pope Clement XI. Moreover, Christ is head of his Church because it receives its constitution and its doctrine from Him.

(4) Christ, as man, holds a kingly, as well as a priestly, power. The Prophets foretold Him as king, and the "anointed king" is a recognised name of the Messias in Jewish writers. He exercises this regal power, not only over his Church, but also over all men, so far as his law binds them all. As God, of course, Christ is supreme over all, both in temporal and spiritual matters. But it cannot be affirmed, at least for certain, that He, as man, possessed temporal dominion. "As man," Petavius says, "I consider that He was by no means a temporal, but only a spiritual, king; especially so far as He lived a man among men. For He did not answer falsely to Pilate the governor, when he inquired concerning his kingdom: "My kingdom is not of this world.'" Whence Augustine "thus explains the place in the second Psalm where Christ says that He, after his resurrection, was constituted king: 'But I am constituted king by Him over Sion his holy mountain:' viz. by pointing out that that Sion and that mountain are not of this world. 'For what is his kingdom, except those who believe in Him?' See, too, the same Father in his 12th Book against Faustus. cap. 42, where he explains more fully the kingdom of Christ from the prophecy of the Patriarch Jacob, and demonstrates that it does not belong to this world—that it is not temporal, but spiritual."[1]

[1] The opinion held by some of the ancients that Christ inherited the priesthood by descent from Aaron on his mother's side, is refuted by Petavius, De Incar. xii. 15.

(5) Closely connected with Christ's regal dignity is his office of Judge. This also belongs to Christ as man.[2] "He has been appointed by God," in the words of St. Peter, "judge of the living and the dead." He is eminently fitted for this office by his perfect justice and integrity, his knowledge of man's heart, and his mercy.

Other titles of Christ, such as Advocate, Shepherd, &c., have been virtually explained already. Others will be discussed in other articles. (From St. Thomas, P. iii.; Billuart, Cardinal Franzelin, but above all, Petavius, in their treatises "De Incarnatione.")

CHRIST, PERSONAL APPEARANCE AND REPRESENTATIONS OF. Two views on Christ's personal appearance have prevailed in the Church. During the first three centuries, when Christians were persecuted and oppressed, it was generally held that our Lord assumed a bodily form without comeliness or beauty. Thus Justin, "Dial. c. Tryph.," speaks of Christ as ἄτιμος καὶ ἀειδής, "without honour and unsightly:" a view which he repeats six or seven times at least, and which is also asserted by Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen (against Celsus). This view was based on the prophecy of Isaias: "Despised and the most abject of men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with infirmity; and his look was, as it were, hidden and despised; whereupon we esteemed Him not." This conception of Christ's personal appearance, joined with the danger of scandal to converts from heathenism, may account for the fact that the ante-Nicene Church was not accustomed to make a religious use of pictures and statues representing Christ in his natural form. Christians preferred to pourtray Him under symbolical forms —e.g. that of the Good Shepherd—or to honour Him by honouring his cross. Indeed, we find the first certain instances of statues or natural representations of Christ, among heathen and heretics. Thus Lampridius, in his Life of the heathen emperor Alexander Severus (222–235), c. 29, tells us that the latter placed in his Lararium, or chapel for the protecting gods of the house, figures of Apollonius, Abraham, Orpheus, and Christ; while Irenæus (i. 25) relates of the Carpocratians, an early Gnostic sect, that they had paintings and other representations of Christ, and asserted that Pilate had caused Christ's portrait to be taken during his lifetime. The respect which the Carpocratians paid to these images was evidently quite unchristian, for they offered a similar veneration to likenesses of Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, and others.

A second and widely different view of Christ's outward appearance began to gain ground after the triumph of the Church under Constantine. Chrysostom and Jerome[1] regard Christ as the ideal of human beauty; and the advocates of this theory also supported it by an appeal to the Old Testament, and quoted the verse of the Psalm, "Thou art beautiful above the sons of men." This naturally became the most popular view, and it is the only one that could be adopted in the religious use of art. At the same time, we may observe that this belief of Chrysostom and Jerome has not been accepted without reserve by all later theologians.

[1] Petav. De Incarnat. xii. 15.

[2] The Father is said to have given all judgment to the Son. Petavius says that the office of judge "resides properly in the human nature, like the office of priest, mediator, &c., though its force and value comes from the Godhead."

[1] Hefele cites Chrysost. Opp. t. v. p. 62, Hieron. t. ii. p. 684, both in Benedict. ed.

Billuart, for example, denies that our Lord's body while still passible, exhibited any extraordinary beauty; and St. Thomas was of the same opinion.[1]

Whatever we may think on this matter, in any case the divergence of opinion with regard to it in the early Church seems to create a strong presumption against the authenticity of any likeness of Christ attributed to persons who had seen Him. Indeed, St. Augustine ("De Trin." viii. 4) allows that there was no sure tradition in the Church on the bodily appearance of Christ. This presumption is confirmed by an investigation of the portraits of Christ for which an early origin is claimed.

The earliest witness to the existence of these ancient likenesses is Eusebius. In his "Church History," vii. 18, he tells us that he had seen a statue of Christ erected at Cæsarea Philippi by the woman who was healed of an issue of blood. There was a figure also of the woman herself kneeling at Christ's feet. In the fragments of the Arian historian Philostorgius we find this same statue of Christ mentioned, with an additional remark well worthy of notice. Philostorgius says that at first it was not known to whom or by whom the statue had been erected, till, on clearing the inscription, it was found that it had been raised by the woman with an issue of blood, to Christ. Very likely the statue was erected to Hadrian, or some other heathen emperor, and the female figure, kneeling at his feet may have symbolised a suppliant province; while the inscription may have run—"To the Saviour of the World" (σωτῆρι τοῦ κόσμου), a title which his flatterers would readily give to the emperor, and which may have misled the Christians who read it at a later time.

Another tradition attributes portraits of our Lord to St. Luke. This tradition is never mentioned by early writers. Theodorus Lector (518) mentions a portrait of the Blessed Virgin painted by St. Luke, but he does not speak of his having painted our Lord's likeness. Portraits of our Lord from the hand of St. Luke are first mentioned by Simeon Metaphrastes, the "Menologium" of the Emperor Basil (980), and Nicephorus Callisti—manifestly authorities of too late a date to inspire much confidence in a statement which is unlikely on the face of it. Accounts which make St. Luke a sculptor (a statue of Christ said to have been executed by St. Luke is preserved at Sirolo; one "by Nicodemus," at Lucca) are of still later origin.

There is another class of likenesses, the so-called εἰκόνες ἀχειροποίηται, images not made with hands, of which the most famous are the portrait sent to Abgarus and the "Veronica" likeness.

As to the former, Eusebius, at the beginning of his history (i. 13), mentions a correspondence between our Lord and Abgarus, king of Edessa. Moses of Chorene, an Armenian historian of the fifth century, adds that Christ sent Abgarus a portrait of Himself, wonderfully impressed on a cloth. This likeness is said to have been removed to Constantinople, and thence to the church of St. Silvester, at Rome, where it is still shown. It belongs to the Byzantine type of art, and represents our Saviour with a lofty brow, clear eyes, long, straight nose, and reddish beard. Genoa also claims to possess this miraculous picture.

Veronica is said to have been one of the women who accompanied our Lord on his way to Calvary. She gave Him her veil that He might wipe away the perspiration from his face, and when our Lord had done so, the impress of his countenance was found upon the cloth. It is alleged that this likeness was brought to Rome about the year 700, and it belongs at this day to the relics of St. Peter's church at Rome, where it is only shown to persons of princely rank, who, however, must first be made titular canons of St. Peter's. Mabillon and the Bollandist Papebroch suppose that the Veronica came, by mere error, to be regarded as the name of a person, the word really being a barbarous compound of vera and icon (εἰκών), and meaning "true image." As a matter of fact, mediæval writers give the name Veronica to the image itself and not to a woman. Thus Matthew of Paris (ad ann. 1216) speaks of "the representation of our Lord's face, which is called Veronica." A recent archæologist, William Grimm, derives the word from Βερονίκη, the name, according to John Malala, a Byzantine historian of the sixth century, which belonged to the woman with the issue of blood.

In this utter absence of any authentic likeness of Christ or account of his appearance, different types of face were assigned to our Lord in different countries. Photius (Ep. 64) testifies that this was the case in his day; and a recent traveller and Biblical scholar, Dr. Scholz, found a number of different types prevailing in different Eastern nations. Thus the Copts, Syrians, Armenians, &c., each give a special type of face to pictures of our Lord. At the same time great influence was exercised (1) by a description to be found in St. John Damascene (ed. Le Quien, t. i. p. 631), and which is as follows: "Christ was of imposing stature, with eyebrows nearly meeting, beautiful eyes, crisp hair, somewhat stooping, in the bloom of youth, with black beard and yellow complexion, like his mother;" (2) by a forged letter of "Publius Lentulus," a friend of Pilate, addressed to the Roman Senate, which contains the following description: "He is a man of slender figure, dignified, of a venerable countenance, which inspires love and fear in those who see him. His hair is curled and crisp, dark and glossy, falling over his shoulders and parted in the middle, after the fashion of the Nazarenes (? Nazarites). The brow is very clear, the face without wrinkle or spot, pleasing by its moderately red colour. Nose and mouth are faultless; the beard strong and reddish, like the colour of the hair, not long, but parted; the eyes of indistinct colour and clear." We cannot determine the date of the forgery, but in its present form it became well known about St. Anselm's time. A third description of Christ's form is found in Nicephorus Callisti. It belongs to the fourteenth century.

The famous work of Jablonski, "De Origine Imaginum Christi Domini," is a standard authority on this subject. A treatise on the Abgarus likeness appeared in 1847, by Samuelian, an Armenian Mechitarist monk at Vienna. The subject has also been treated by Glückselig, "Christusarchäologie," 1863. (Hefele, "Beitrage zur Archaologie," &c.)

CHRISTIANS (Χριστιανοί). A name first given at Antioch to the followers of Christ about the year 43, as we learn from Acts xi. 26. The name can scarcely have arisen from the disciples themselves, for it seems at first to have been used contemptuously—at least this seems a fair inference from Acts xxvi. 28, 1 Pet. iv. 14–16 (the only other places of the New Testament where the word occurs), as well as from Tacitus, "Annal." xv. 44. Still less could it have come from the Jews, who would never have admitted that the adherents of a sect which they hated and despised could rightly claim so honourable a title as "disciples of the Messias." On the contrary, they called Christ's disciples "Nazarenes," "Galileans." Probably, the heathen at Antioch mistook "Christus" for a proper name, and called the disciples "Christiani," just as they called those who adhered to Pompey's party "Pompeiani." It was at Antioch that the first church of converts from heathenism was formed, and no doubt it then became plain to the heathen that the doctrine of the disciples was distinct from Judaism, and this led to the imposition of a special name. Besides the form "Christiani," we also find that of "Chrestiani," many heathen, in their ignorance of the Messianic doctrine, deriving Christ's name from χρηστός, "good," instead of from χρίω, "to anoint."[1]

In later times the word has been used (1) for those who imitate the life as well as hold the faith of Christ;[2] (2) for Catholics; (3) for baptised persons who believe in Christ; (4) for all baptised persons.

CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE: FATHERS AND CONFRATERNITY OF THE. Ignorance of their religion being seen to be one of the chief causes of the terrible instability which caused whole populations in the sixteenth century, confounded by the harangues of Protestant preachers which they knew not how to answer, to lapse into heresy, earnest efforts were made by many good men to procure that the teaching of the true doctrine of Christ should be more general and systematic. To this end a number of priests and laymen, with Marco Cusani, a gentleman of Milan, for their head, formed themselves into a society, about 1560, for the purpose of teaching the catechism to children on Sundays, and to the ignorant generally, in the country districts, on Church holidays. Cusani came to Rome in the year above named, and found there many supporters and associates, among whom were Cæsar Baronius, and Francis Maria Tarugi, two of the most prominent among the companions of St. Philip Neri. The Popes strongly encouraged the pious enterprise, which was exactly in accordance with the spirit which the Council of Trent laboured to revive in every part of the Catholic world. The priests belonging to the institute were the "Fathers"— the laymen the "Confraternity"—of the Christian Doctrine; but the whole society was often spoken of by the name of confraternity. St. Pius V., by a bull in 1571, ordered that such associations should be established by parish priests generally, accorded special indulgences to their members, and gave to the Fathers the church of St. Agatha. This being found too small for them, Clement VIII., in 1596, granted them the fine church of St. Martin dei Monti. This Pope also directed Cardinal Bellarmine to compose a short catechism for use in the schools of the confraternity. In process of time the name of provost was given to the chief among the Fathers, and that of president to the head of the confraternity. Four definitors, two chosen by the clerical, two by the lay members, decided any difficult or disputed question that might arise. Although they wore the dress, slightly modified, of the secular clergy, and were not bound to any office in common, the Holy See did not view any light treatment of their obligations with indifference, and Urban VIII. (1627) ordered that members leaving the community should incur the penalties of apostasy as if they were monks. [APOSTASY.] Paul V. raised them to the rank of an archconfraternity. In later times the Fathers, taking the name of Congregation, appear to have been entirely separated from the archconfraternity. From the continuation of Hélyot by Badiche, it would appear that the head of this congregation is at present styled vicar-general. (Hélyot, "Ordres Monastiques.")

CHRISTIAN BROTHERS. The proper title is "Brothers of the Christian Schools." This admirable institution was founded by the Blessed J. B. de la Salle, the process of whose canonisation was begun at Rome some years ago and is still in progress. Born in 1651 at Reims, where his father was a distinguished advocate and king's counsel, Jean Baptiste devoted his remarkable powers of mind and will at an early age to the divine service, and, having been ordained, was nominated Canon of Reims. The education of the poor, to promote which schools, called "little schools," had begun to be organised in the thirteenth century, after the legal establishment of the University of Paris, was checked by the Hundred Years' War which raged in France at short intervals from the middle of the fourteenth to the middle of the fifteenth century. In 1570 a society of teachers was established under the title of the "master-writers" (maitres écrivains) at Paris, whence it spread to other cities. Their aim was to teach writing and arithmetic, and a little Latin, so that their pupils might be qualified to assist the clergy in the church offices. They received many privileges, which they construed into a monopoly of teaching. About the year 1680, many good and earnest persons, both among the clergy and the laity, were engaged in promoting the Christian education of the people. Prominent among these was a M. Nyel of Rouen, who selected teachers and trained them, and then sent them to the cities or great seigneuries which offered to provide buildings and salaries. The Abbé de la Salle, who was an intimate friend of M. Nyel, had his attention thus drawn to the subject, the importance of which soon engrossed his thoughts. In his capacious mind the spirit of system was united to a sound common-sense, quick perception of character, and the tenderest charity. He took charge of several of M. Nyel's teachers, and engaged others; but finding that many of these young men were anxious about their future, and dreading to embark in a calling which the death of their leader might deprive of stability and social favour, he resolved to renounce his church preferment, and also his private fortune, that he might be able to say to them that he, even as they, had no help or trust save in God. He accordingly resigned his canonry, and distributed his patrimony to the poor. This was in 1684; in the same year he drew up the first rules for his teachers, and selected the name which they should bear; the origin of the brotherhood therefore dates from this time. The teaching in all his schools was to be gratuitous for the day scholars, but boarders and day-boarders were also received. The blessed founder himself often taught in his schools, and, with his sure eye for organisation, reformed the instruction in many large schools (e.g. in that connected with St. Sulpice at Paris) the inefficiency of which had baffled the efforts of their managers. De la Salle insisted that Latin should be no longer an obligatory subject in schools for the children of the poor, but that the basis of their teaching, after the Catechism, should be their own language: let them first learn to read and write

French correctly, and then, if they had time and means, they might take up Latin. On this account the Blessed de la Salle is often regarded—and, it would seem, with justice—as the originator of primary schools and primary instruction, which, till his time, had been confounded with secondary. It is true that St. Joseph Calasanctius had founded at Rome long before (1597) his admirable institution of the Scuole Pie, or Pious Schools, in which instruction was given gratuitously; but the line was not clearly drawn in these, as regards the subjects taught, between what constitutes primary and what constitutes secondary instruction. Latin was not excluded, and the teachers were encouraged to aspire to the priesthood; hence the Pious Schools passed by degrees into the rank of secondary establishments. On the other hand, the rule of the Blessed de la Salle required that the Brothers who bound themselves by vow to devote their lives to teaching in the schools, and wore the religious habit, should be and remain laymen, equally with the professors and assistant teachers who were employed under them. And this has continued to be the practice of the congregation ever since. For the training of the Brothers the founder instituted a noviciate; for that of the professors, &c., a normal school. Founded at Rheims in 1685, this appears to have been the first training school for primary teachers in Europe. It was, and still is, a part of the rule, that the Brothers should work in pairs. They take the three religious vows, after having attained to at least twenty-three years. Their habit gives them an ecclesiastical appearance; it consists of a long black cassock, with a cloak over it fastened by iron clasps, a falling collar, and a hat with wide brims.

The founder lived to see the fruit of his labours in the establishment of his schools in many of the principal towns of France. He died in 1719, leaving his congregation so firmly planted that all the convulsions by which French society has since been torn have not been able to extirpate it. It has moreover spread to many countries beyond the limits of France, and has been imitated by other teaching associations.

From a table with which we have been furnished by the Principal of Tooting College, London, it appears that at the end of 1890 the Brothers had under their charge 1,713 schools, attended by 315,332 scholars. Out of this general total France and her colonies contributed 221,793 scholars; Belgium, 19,588; England and Ireland, 2,149; North and South America, 48,953; India, 2,137. The number of Brothers was 12,554.

It should have been mentioned that a Bull of approbation in favour of the Christian Brothers was granted by Benedict XIII. in 1725, elevating them into a religious congregation. The founder was declared "Venerable" in 1840, and was beatified Feb. 19, 1888.

It is interesting to note that, in 1699, long before Sunday Schools were thought of in England, the Blessed de la Salle established one (école dominicale) at St. Sulpice, which was to be open from noon to three o'clock, and give secular instruction. Similar schools, open on festivals, were established by St. Charles Borromeo at Milan, about 1580; see his Life by Bascape, vii. 42.

("Vie du Vénérable J. B. de la Salle," Rouen, 1874.)

CHRISTIAN BROTHERS, IRISH. A religious congregation founded in 1802 in the city of Waterford by Edmond Ignatius Rice, of Callan, in the county Kilkenny. Mr. Rice had resided in Waterford since 1780, and thus had an opportunity of witnessing the demoralising effect of the penal laws, which proscribed Catholic education. He used to relate with what pain he saw crowds of poor children wandering through the streets and lanes of the city, in idleness, and its usual attendant, vice; and how, meeting a number of them one day at a village near the town, he drew them round him, and by questioning them ascertained the fact of their neglected condition, and in particular their deplorable ignorance of the first elements of religion. It was on this occasion that he conceived the idea of devoting his life and ample property to the cause of the education of the poor.

He adopted the rules and general system of the institute founded by the Blessed de la Salle, conceiving that he could find no better model. His first school was opened at Mount Sion in the city of Waterford, on May 1, 1804, and was eminently successful; so much so, that in a short time the altered habits and demeanour of the children in the streets became a common topic of remark. The bishop of Waterford was a warm admirer and supporter of Mr. Rice, and he was soon invited by other bishops to open similar schools in their dioceses. In the course of a few years houses of the institute were established in Dublin, Cork, Limerick, and other centres of population; and the result appeared so satisfactory that the bishops, in 1818, memorialised the Holy See to approve the congregation, and grant it a constitution. Rome took two years to consider the question, and on September 5, 1820, the Apostolic Brief of Pius VII. (Ad Pastoralis) granted the prayer of the memorial and confirmed the institute. The members bind themselves by the usual religious vows, and are subject to a Superior-General, who has three Assistants to aid him in the government of the body. Houses of the order are now found in almost every town in Ireland, and in several of the British colonies. The Brothers at present number about 600, and their pupils 40,000. Their system of teaching has met with the warm approval of successive Royal Commissions, appointed to inquire into the state of education in Ireland. (See "Testimonies in favour of the Christian Brothers and their Schools," Dublin, 1877.) The Brothers, after the establishment of the Irish system of national education in 1832, placed their schools for a time in connection with the Board, and accepted the grant; but finding that the rules of the Board as to the absolute division of secular from religious teaching were gradually leading them into concessions alien from the spirit of their founder and the Church, they withdrew from all connection with Government, and have since carried on their schools independently. Nor have they seen any cause to repent of having thus thrown themselves boldly on the generous Catholic sympathies of the Irish people. (From information supplied by the Rev. Br. J. A. Grace, of Belvidere House, Drumcondra.)

CHRISTIAN NAME. [See BAPTISMAL NAME.]

CHRISTMAS DAY. The 25th of December, on which the Church celebrates Christ's birth. Whether or not the birth of our Lord really occurred on this day, ancient authorities are not agreed. Clement of Alexandria mentions the opinion of some who placed it on the 20th of April, and of others, who thought it took place on the 20th of May,[1] while St. Epiphanius and Cassian state that in Egypt Christ was believed to have been born on the 6th of January. For a long time the Greeks had no special feast corresponding to Christmas Day, and merely commemorated our Lord's birth on the Epiphany. St. Chrysostom in a Christmas sermon, delivered at Antioch in the year 386, says, "it is not ten years since this day [Christmas Day on December 25] was clearly known to us, but it has been familiar from the beginning to those who dwell in the West." "The Romans, who have celebrated it for a long time, and from ancient tradition, have transmitted the knowledge of it to us." St. Augustine gives similar testimony as to the custom of the Latin Church. We may therefore conclude that in the fourth century Christmas Day had been celebrated from time immemorial in the West, and about Chrysostom's day it began to be observed in the East; and it seems to have spread rapidly there, as appears from the writings of the two Gregories (of Nazianzum and of Nyssa).

Two or three points in the celebration of the Christmas festival, as at present practised, deserve special notice. It is well known that in ancient times the greater feasts were preceded by vigils, which the faithful kept in the church, spending the night in fasting and prayer. For grave reasons, the Church abolished this custom, among the faithful generally, and restricted the observance of vigils in the proper sense to the religious orders, who say the night office, while to the lay people a vigil is merely an ordinary fasting-day. But when other vigils were abolished, that of Christmas was still preserved, and to this day, according to ancient custom, the people meet in the church to assist at the singing of the divine office, and at the sacrifice of the Mass, which is offered after midnight.

Next, on Christmas Day, against the rule which prevails on every other day in the year, priests are allowed to celebrate three Masses. In ancient times, however, the custom of allowing a single priest to celebrate more than one Mass was not limited to Christmas Day. Two Masses used to be said on January 1—one Mass of the octave of the Nativity, another of the Blessed Virgin. Three Masses were said on Holy Thursday—one for the reconciliation of penitents, another for the consecration of the holy chrism, a third to commemorate the solemnity of the day. Two Masses were said on the Ascension—one of the vigil, and another of the feast. A Roman Ordo mentions the custom of saying three Masses on the feast of St. John Baptist, while it appears from Prudentius that the Popes used to celebrate two Masses on the feast of St. Peter and St. Paul—one in the Vatican basilica, another in the church of St. Paul. To return to Christmas Day: the Roman Ordines prove that the Popes used on that feast to say three Masses—the first in the Liberian basilica; the second in the church of St. Anastasia, whose memory is celebrated on the same day, December 25; the third in the Vatican church. In other places, particularly in France, the same priest used to say two Masses on Christmas Day. When the Roman Ordo was received in France by the command of Charlemagne, the Roman custom of saying three Masses was introduced in France also, the privilege being given first of all to bishops only, and then to priests also. To sum up: throughout the Church, or at least in a great part of it, there were two Masses—one for the vigil of Christmas, another for the feast itself. At Rome there were three, because the feast of St. Anastasia fell on the same day; and the Roman custom spread throughout the West. Those three Masses, however, were always said, not together, but at considerable intervals—viz. at midnight, dawn, and in the day time—a custom still observed in cathedral and collegiate churches. A mystical explanation of the three Masses is given, and they are supposed to figure the three births of our Lord—viz. of His Father before all ages, of the Blessed Virgin, and in the hearts of the faithful.

[1] This statement is given on the authority of Benedict XIV. It is clear from Clement's words (Strom. i. c. 145) that he knew of no certain tradition as to the date of Christ's birth.

An old chronicler (Albertus Argentinensis) relates that during the Christmas Mass celebrated at "cock-crow," Charlemagne stood with drawn sword and read the gospel, "A decree went forth from Cæsar Augustus." Martene mentions the ancient custom, according to which the emperor, or, failing him, any sovereign who was present in the Papal chapel on Christmas night, used to read the fifth lesson in the office, with his sword in his hand. "At present," says Benedict XIV., "on Christmas night the Pope blesses a ducal cap and sword, which he either gives to some prince who is there, or else sends it as a present." (Benedict XIV., "De Festis.")

CHURCH BOOKS OR REGISTERS. The Roman Ritual in the English edition enumerates the following books or registers to be kept by every parish priest (a name which here no doubt is meant to include priests in charge of a mission)—viz. the register of baptisms, confirmations, marriages and deaths ("libri baptizatorum, confirmatorum, matrimoniorum, defunctorum").[1]

The origin of the baptismal register is very ancient. The catechumens were accustomed some time before baptism, and usually in the fourth week of Lent, to give their names to the bishop, that he might enter them in a list known as the "book of life," or "roll of catechumens" ("catalogus catechumenorum"). The Council of Trent (sess. xxiv. De Reform. Matrim. c. 2) orders parish priests to write down in a book the names of the god-parents at baptism.

The "book of the dead" may be connected in origin with the diptychs of the ancient Church, in which the names of benefactors, &c., were enrolled, in order that they might be prayed for specially in the commemoration of the dead; but it is not till the end of the sixteenth century that we find the names of the dead registered in the present manner. The keeping of a register of marriages was introduced (or rather made of universal obligation) by the Council of Trent, sess. xxiv. De Reform. Matrim. c. 1, in these words: "Let the parish priest have a book, in which he is to enter the names of the persons married and of the witnesses, the day on which the marriage was contracted, and the place at which it was celebrated, which book he is to keep carefully under his charge." The register of persons confirmed, like that of deaths, was prescribed by various provincial councils.

CHURCH HISTORY. It is the object of the following article to give some account of the chief histories of the Church. We confine ourselves, with regard to Church histories written in modern times, to such as have come from Catholics, and we shall speak only of histories which deal with the fortunes of the whole Catholic Church, as distinct from the particular branches of it which have flourished in this or that nation. What we have to say is taken in substance from a learned essay by Bishop Hefele in the German "Catholic Cyclopædia." Following his guidance we divide the literature of the subject into three epochs. The first period (A) comprises the ancient Church historians down to the time of Charlemagne, crowned Roman Emperor in 800. During this period the Greeks and Romans were the chief representatives of civilisation and Catholic Christianity. The second period (B), from Charlemagne to the rise of the Protestant religion, embraces the whole of the middle ages, during which the German and Romance nations were united in one Church and under one head, viz. the Pope. The third period (C) extends from the sixteenth century to the present day. Under the first period we shall begin with the Greek and then pass on to the Latin historians.

(A) The first Church historian of whom any memorial has been preserved was Hegesippus, a Jewish convert, who lived about the middle of the second century. He wrote a work in five books called ὑπομνήματα, or Memoirs. Great use of it was made by Eusebius, to whom we are indebted for the eight fragments which remain; the work itself is lost. These fragments have been edited and illustrated with learned notes by the great Protestant scholar, Dr. Routh, in his "Reliquiæ Sacræ." Hegesippus also drew up a catalogue of the Roman bishops down to Anicetus, and this may have been a separate work. (1) The real Father of Church history is Eusebius, who was bishop of Cæsarea in the earlier half of the fourth century. His "Ecclesiastical History" in ten books begins with Christ and ends with the victory of Constantine over Licinius, in 324. He used a number of old documents, which have perished long since, such as writings of early Fathers, letters, and particularly documents taken from the archives of the empire and placed at his disposal by Constantine. This history was translated into Latin by Rufinus. In spite of the roughness of his style, the credulity which made him accept unhistorical matter (e.g. the correspondence between Christ and Abgarus), and the fact that his narrative is often incomplete, the documents which Eusebius used, and which have perished since, give a value altogether singular to his "Church History." His Life of Constantine in four books also contains, although it is written in the tone of a panegyric, information of the first importance. The "Chronicle" of Eusebius belongs rather to profane than to ecclesiastical history, and is besides more useful for the history of the Old than of the New Testament. The first book seems to have contained a brief sketch of the history of the world, from the establishment of the first of the great empires down to his own day. The second book (χρονικὸς κανών) contained chronological and synchronistic tables from the time of Abraham to that of Constantine. It was founded on a similar work of Julius Africanus (third century). The Greek original perished in the ninth century, and we were left with nothing except fragments and a Latin reproduction of the second book by Jerome, who allowed himself to add and to alter freely. However, an early Armenian version of the entire Chronicle (with, however, some gaps) was printed at Venice towards the end of last century, and edited by the Mechitarist monk Aucher, with a Latin version and with the Greek fragments (Venice, 1818). (2) Socrates, a lawyer, or, as he calls himself, σχολαστικὸς, at Constantinople, wrote a history of the Church from 305 to 439—i.e. to his own time. His history is in seven books, and deserves high praise for the diligent use of the sources (particularly of the works of St. Athanasius), for the exactness of the chronological data, for the agreeable style, and, on the whole, for impartiality. He was clearly a Catholic, although inclined to regard the rigorist views of Novatian with favour, and although, as Photius remarks, he was "not over-accurate" in his account of dogmatic matters. (3) Sozomen, like Socrates, a lawyer at Constantinople, but originally from Palestine, wrote in nine books the history of the Church from 324 to 423. He does not seem to have known the work of Socrates, to which his own is in most respects decidedly inferior. (4) Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus in Syria, and perhaps the most learned theologian of his age, wrote, about 450, the history of the Church from 320 to 428. It is the briefest but the best continuation of Eusebius. Its chief fault lies in the almost entire omission of dates. (5) Theodore Lector lived at the beginning of the sixth century, and was attached as lector to the church of Constantinople. He wrote a history made up of extracts from the works of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, and this book still exists in MS. He also continued the history of Socrates down to 527, but of this original history only fragments remain. (6) The last Greek Church-historian of this period is Evagrius, a Syrian, born at Epiphania about 536. He was a lawyer, high in office at Antioch. He wrote in six books the history of the Church from the Council of Ephesus in 431 to 594, so that his work is of special importance for the Nestorian and Monophysite controversies. He is learned, orthodox, and writes in a cultivated style, but is credulous and fond of marvels.

The Greek text of Eusebius (Church History), Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, and Evagrius, with fragments of Theodorus Lector, was edited for the first time by Robert Stephens (Paris, 1544). An edition incomparably superior was issued under the care of Henri de Valois (Valesius), a lawyer, who was entrusted with this work by the French bishops. He corrected the text by collation of MSS., and enriched his editions by notes and dissertations of profound learning, which can never lose their value. The work appeared at Paris, 1659–73, in three folios—the first containing the works of Eusebius relating to Church history except the Chronicle; the second, Socrates and Sozomen; the third, Theodoret, Evagrius, and the fragments of Theodorus Lector and of the Arian historian, Philostorgius, who in the interest of his party wrote a Church history in twelve books, from the rise of Arianism to the year 423. A new and convenient edition of the ancient Church historians was edited by Reading and published at Cambridge, 1720. Since then Eusebius has been edited by several critics, among whom we may mention Stroth (Halae ad Salam., 1779), Heinichen, Burton (Oxford, 1838, an edition of inferior merit). Heinichen's last edition (Lipsiæ, 1868) contains a good text and valuable notes, excursus, &c., taken from many sources.

In this first period the Latins did much less than the Greeks for Church history. Rufinus, about 400, made a free translation of Eusebius, compressing the work of the latter into nine books and adding two of his own, which gave the history of the Church from 318 to 395. Rufinus is an inaccurate and sometimes a partial writer. The best edition is by Cacciari (Romæ, 1740). Sulpitius Severus, a contemporary of Rufinus, wrote a "Sacred History" ("Historia Sacra," also "Chronica Sacra") from the beginning of the world to 400. The style is justly celebrated, but the work is too meagre to be of much value, though it gives some details on the history of the Priscillianists. The best editions are by Hieron. de Prato (Veronæ, 1741), and by the Oratorian Gallandius in vol. viii. of his "Bibliotheca Patrum." Orosius, a Spanish priest, at the request of St. Augustine, wrote his "Seven Books of Histories against the Pagans," which is really a profane history, written, however, in the Christian interest, with the special intention of showing that the calamities of the empire were not caused by the triumph of the Christian religion. Lastly, Cassiodorus, after he had retired from his high civil offices and had become superior of the monastery he founded, abbreviated and harmonised the histories of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret. This "Historia Tripartita," as it was called, consisted of twelve books, and was, with the works of Rufinus, the great authority during the middle ages on the history of the early Church.

(B) In the second period, the relative merits of Greeks and Latins with regard to Church history were reversed. Among the former, literature of this kind almost died out; among the latter it began to flourish vigorously when the storm of the barbarian invasion was past. Indeed, between 600 and 1,500, the East boasts only one famous Church historian, viz.: Nicephorus Callisti, a clergyman at Constantinople about the middle of the fourteenth century. He wrote the history of the Church down to 610—in which year the Emperor Phocas died—using very diligently the authors (many of them lost to us) in the library of St. Sophia, but without the critical spirit or the power to distinguish history from legend. His work has been edited by the Jesuit Fronton le Duc (Paris, 1630).

As we have already said, the richness of historical literature in the West offers a striking contrast to the poverty of the East in this respect. However, the most valuable historical literature of the middle ages does not fall under review here. It is composed of annals and chronicles without number, and also of the histories, civil and ecclesiastical, of particular races and nations. To the latter class belong a history of the Franks by St. Gregory of Tours (†595); the "Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation" (gentis Anglorum) by Venerable Bede (†735); of the Lombards by Paulus Diaconus (†799); of the Scandinavian North by Adam of Bremen (canon of Bremen from 1067); of Bremen, Hamburg, Lower Saxony and Westphalia, by Kranz, a canon of Hamburg (†1517). To these we may add a history of the church of Rheims by Flodoard (†966). Of general histories, the following are extant:—(1) Ten books of Church history, by Haymo, from 840 bishop of Halberstadt. This work, mostly compiled from Rufinus, gives the Church history of the first four centuries. (2) About the same time lived Anastasius, librarian of the Roman Church, and appointed by Nicholas I. abbot of a monastery on the further side of the Tiber. He wrote an "Historia Ecclesiastica seu Chronographia Tripartita," which is translated and compiled from three Byzantine historians, and goes as far as the ninth century. Commonly, too, the famous "Liber Pontificalis," also called "De Vitis Romanorum Pontificum," is ascribed to him. But the learned authors of the "Origines de l'Église de Rome" (Paris, 1826), followed by Hefele, have proved that the book is much older, and that Anastasius cannot have written more than the lives of some of the last Popes in the series. The latest edition of this book is by Blanchinus and Vignolius. (3) About 1142, Ordericus Vitalis, an Englishman and Abbot of St. Evroul, in Normandy, wrote thirteen books of ecclesiastical history from the time of Christ to the twelfth century. (4) Some 150 years later, the Dominican Bartholomew of Lucca wrote a Church history in twenty-four books, from Christ till 1312. (5) The great Church history of the middle ages came from Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence in the fifteenth century. He relates the history of the world, secular and profane, from the beginning to 1459. Here we see the first dawn of historical criticism. Laurentius Valla and Nicolas of Cusa had already pointed out the spurious character of the so-called "Donation of Constantine," and of other documents accepted in the middle ages, and the new epoch of historical literature was soon to begin.

(C) Many causes conspired at the time of the Reformation to awaken a new interest in Church history, and to introduce a new method of studying it. The fall of the Eastern empire brought Greek literature and a knowledge of the Greek language to Western Europe, so that it became possible to consult the sources. The invention of printing made these sources widely accessible, while the fact that the Protestants represented their religion as a revival of primitive Christianity impelled Catholics to study with exactness the history of the early Church. In the middle of the sixteenth century, the famous work of the Magdeburg Centuriators began to be written and published. It was a history of the Church, written in an intensely Lutheran spirit, divided into centuries, of which the first five were prepared at Magdeburg, whence the name, though the whole work was printed at Basle in 1599 in thirteen folios. The director of the work was Matthias Flacius, who had a number of learned men working under him, collecting materials, &c., while the Protestant princes supported him with money. To meet the impression the "Centuries" were likely to make, Cæsar Baronius, afterwards Cardinal, began his "Ecclesiastical Annals," a work of stupendous learning, and a treasure house of valuable documents, so that at this day, as Hefele says, Protestants use it a hundred times for once that they have recourse to the forgotten "Magdeburg Centuries." The first edition, ending with 1198, was published at Rome in twelve folios (1588–1607). It was continued by the Polish Dominican Bzovius, in eight folios, reaching to 1564 (Rome, 1672); by Spondanus, Bishop of Pamiers, in two folios (Paris, 1640), reaching to 1640. The best continuation, rich in documents, is by the Oratorian Raynaldus, in nine folios (Rome, 1646–77). Laderchius, also an Oratorian, added three folios (Rome, 1728–37), which however only contain the history of seven years. The two Pagi, uncle and nephew, both Franciscans, gave to the world learned and valuable notes on Baronius, entitled "Critica Historico-Chronologica in Universos Annales, etc., Baronii" (Antw. 1705). They were published complete by the younger Pagi after his uncle's death. Mansi's edition of Baronius is the most esteemed; it contains, besides the text of Baronius, the notes of the Pagi and the continuation of Raynaldus, in thirty-eight folios (Lucca, 1738–59). This costly edition is unhappily disfigured by errors in printing. Recently, a continuation by the Oratorian Theiner in three folios coming down to 1583 has been printed at Rome and Paris (1856, seq.), while the whole work has been reprinted at Bar-le-Duc (1864, seq.).[1]

The great work of Petavius on the history of dogma, the admirable editions of the Fathers by the Benedictines of St. Maur, and many other works of a critical nature, prepared the way for the labours of the French Church historians of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The greatest names in this golden age of ecclesiastical learning are, (1) Natalis Alexander. His great work in thirty octavo volumes, containing the history of the Jewish Church, and of the Christian to the end of the sixteenth century (Paris, 1676, seq.), was placed, because of its Gallican views, on the Index by Innocent XI. An edition by Roncaglia, with the entire text of Alexander, but with the addition of notes correcting his Gallican utterances, appeared at Lucca in 1734. There have been many subsequent editions. (2) Fleury, sous-précepteur of the French Princes, and Prior of Argenteuil, wrote the history of the Church down to 1414, in twenty quarto volumes (1691–1720). Unlike Baronius and Natalis, who wrote in Latin, Fleury wrote in French. The strength of Natalis Alexander lay in learned and minute discussion; Fleury contents himself with giving the results of criticism, and tells the history of the Church in a manner attractive to the educated public, and in language clear, dignified, and simple. Nothing can be more charming than the skill with which he introduces extracts from ancient authorities, or the exquisite tact with which he catches the spirit and portrays the manners of the early Christians. In spite of his Gallicanism, Fleury has been commended in the highest terms by Cardinal Newman and Hefele. Indeed, no competent judge would question his extraordinary merits, and to this day his work is unsurpassed. Fleury found several continuators, of whom Faber, a bitter and exaggerated Gallican, is the best known, but none of them were in any way worthy to compare with him. (3) Le Nain Tillemont, perhaps the most learned and accurate of all Church historians. He was a priest entirely devoted to prayer and study, connected with the solitaries of Port Royal, though not himself a Jansenist. His famous "Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique" give materials for the history of the Church, mostly in biographical form, down to the year 513, in sixteen quarto volumes (Paris, 1693). The history is given almost entirely in the words of the ancient documents, but these extracts from ancient authorities are united with an art which gives to the whole the smoothness and finish of a mosaic. Tillemont's accuracy would of itself entitle him to rank as an historical genius. It never fails him, notwithstanding the vast amount of details with which he deals. The notes at the end of each volume are models of critical acumen. The readers of Gibbon are aware how highly he valued Tillemont, and how greatly he is indebted to him. The French Church historians soon after this date show a marked falling off. They are many of them agreeable writers, but without depth of learning. Among them we may name Choisy ("Histoire de l'Eglise," Paris, 1706–23), the Jansenist Racine, Ducreux, Berault Bercastel, a popular writer whose history, published at the close of the last century, has been re-edited and continued down to our own time by Henrion (Paris, 1841). A history on a larger scale has been written by the Abbé Rohrbacher, "Histoire Universelle de l'Eglise" (Paris, 1842–48).

The Italians, since Baronius, have done much less for the history of the Church than the French. The best Italian Church histories are those of Cardinal Orsi, whose "Storia Eccl." (Rome, 1748) gives the history of the Church in the first six centuries; and of Saccarelli ("Historia Ecclesiastica," down to 1185). The work of Graveson, a Frenchman settled in Italy, is now almost forgotten. Berti's compendium has little worth. Works of moderate compass have been written by Delsignore ("Institutiones Historicæ," Romæ, 1837), and by Palma ("Prælectiones Hist. Eccles.," Romæ, 1838).

Much labour has been devoted to Church history in Germany, but the most complete and popular of German Church histories is the Protestant work of Neander. For a long time German Catholics did little or nothing for this study, till a new era was opened by Stolberg. The first fifteen volumes, containing the "History of the Religion of Jesus Christ," from the creation to A.D. 430, were published at Vienna and Hamburg, in 1806, seq. This work with its continuation by Kerz and Brischar is very voluminous. A popular history going down to 1153 was written by Katerkamp (Münster, 1819–34), and a useful compendium by Hortig in 1826. Döllinger, about ten years later, published a compendium which carries the history of the Church down to the sixteenth century. He also began a Church history on a larger scale, but unhappily only two volumes of this excellent and learned work appeared. The first volume ends with Constantine; the second gives the external history of the Church down to 680. An English version by Dr. Cox is taken partly from the compendium, partly from the larger history, but the translation is far from accurate. Möhler's lectures on Church history were edited and published long after his death by Gams from the notes of students. The compendium of Alzog (eighth edition, 1867) is a most useful work; it has been translated into English. A Church history of great learning, but heavy in style, has recently appeared from the pen of Cardinal Hergenröther. The manual of Kraus (Trèves, 1871–75) is indispensable to the student. In its own special line it has no rival. A Church history in the proper sense it can scarcely be called. It is rather an analysis of the facts, with a list of the original sources, and of the whole literature down to modern times, relating to each part of the subject, while synchronistic tables are given in an appendix. It is difficult to say too much in praise of this book. An immense amount of matter is compressed into less than 1,000 pages; the arrangement is a marvel of simplicity and system, and the completeness of the information on books of reference is no less admirable. It need hardly be said that Bishop Hefele's History of the Councils (in seven volumes) is the best book on the subject, and of European reputation.

In English we have no Catholic Church History worth mentioning, though of course particular portions of the subject have been treated of with great success by Dodd, Challoner, Butler, Lingard, Oliver, Tierney, Rock, Northcote, and above all by Cardinal Newman.

CHURCH OF CHRIST: CATHOLIC CHURCH. The Roman Catechism, in expounding the ninth article of the Creed, urges priests to explain the nature and authority of the Catholic Church to their flocks with special frequency and earnestness, because of the supreme importance which belongs to this point of Christian doctrine. All heresy involves a rejection of the Church's authority; and, on the other hand, it is impossible to accept the true doctrine concerning the Church, and at the same time to be a heretic. Hence, in all ages, and against all forms of error, the Fathers and Doctors of the Catholic Church have appealed to her teaching as the infallible rule of faith. If such an appeal was necessary at every time, there is a more than ordinary need at the present day for insisting upon this article of the Creed, "I believe in the holy Catholic Church." It is misunderstood by Protestants more utterly than by most at least of their predecessors in separation, and the true sense of the ninth article in the Apostles' Creed is the hinge on which all our controversy with Protestants turns. We propose to consider (A) the Church of Christ as described in the New Testament; (B) this Church as it existed in the ages which came immediately after that of the Apostles; (C) to show that the present Catholic Roman Church is the Church founded by Christ and attested by Scripture and tradition; that she, and she alone, is the heir to the promises of Christ and the ark of salvation; (D) having discussed the general characteristics, we shall conclude with a more detailed account of its component parts and constitution.

(A) The Church as set forth in the New Testament.—It is well known that the Protestant Reformers made the Bible, and the Bible only, the rule of faith. With them the Bible came first, the Church came second, and occupied a very subordinate position.[1] The individual, enlightened by the Holy Ghost, read the Bible and received the true faith from its pages. A number of these individuals, gathered together, formed a church. This idea of the Church, it may be safely said, is still held by the great mass of Protestants, though it has lost ground, no doubt, among the learned. Now, the first thing which ought to strike an intelligent reader of the New Testament is, that there is an importance attached to the Church which, from the Protestant point of view, is exaggerated and out of all due proportion, while, on the contrary, no adequate provision is made for furnishing mankind with the one and only means of attaining the truth—viz. the Bible. There is no means of evading this plain and evident fact. Christ never once told His disciples to write books, or promised them His help in doing so. Books indeed were written, describing the life of our Lord, and the Apostles wrote various epistles, as occasion served; but, so far as we can learn from the pages of the New Testament, the Apostles did not leave any list of inspired writings, and, except in one solitary instance, they never once even allude to the fact that there were any inspired writings at all, except those of the old law.[2] Surely this is very strange, on the Protestant theory. It cannot be affirmed that these writings bore the marks of inspiration on the surface, for the Fathers of the Church (till the Church decided) were not agreed about the number and titles of the Biblical books; and those who do not care much for the Fathers may be reminded that the Reformers themselves were at variance with one another on the same question. But this becomes stranger still, on the Protestant theory, when we find that, while our Lord and His Apostles preserve a silence which is scarcely broken, on the New Testament, they speak frequently and in most exalted terms of the Church. We find Christ telling His disciples to hear the Church. St. Paul speaks of the Church of God; of the Church which Christ has purchased with His blood, of the Church which is the pillar and ground of the truth, of the Church as "the house of God." This is very intelligible to Catholics, who hold that the Church has infallible authority in all controversies of faith, so that, given the authority of the Church, the inspiration of Scripture would be accepted, and the decision of questions as to the books which composed it would follow as a matter of course; on the Protestant hypothesis, the phenomenon is inexplicable.

Great importance, then, was given by the Apostles to some Church or other. Let us see what they understood by this Church.

The Church which they recognised was, first of all, a visible body. No other kind of Church would have answered to the intention of Christ in founding it. His disciples were to be like "a city that is set on a mountain" (Matt. v. 14), "a candle put on a candlestick" (ib. 15). Christ's Church was not to consist merely in the invisible union of pious believers in Him. Far from this, in a series of parables our Lord warns His followers that the kingdom of heaven[1]—i.e. the Church which He was to establish (since none but the good can enter heaven in the literal sense)—was to consist of good and bad. He compares His church to a field in which good grain and weeds grow together till the day of judgment; to a net which takes good and bad fish; to a wedding-feast where all the guests are not clothed in the wedding-garment of charity; to virgins, some of whom are wise, some foolish.[1] The same characteristic of the Church follows by a necessary consequence from the duties of mankind with regard to her, which will be presently explained. There would be no meaning in the admonition to "hear the Church," if she were invisible. We could not accept her as our infallible guide, as the unfailing oracle of truth, if she consisted only of pious people, who are known and can be known, as such, to God alone. It is true that there is an invisible Church, or, rather, that the visible Church has an invisible side. The Church is invisible so far as she has an invisible Head, Jesus Christ; so far as she is united by prayer and union under the same Head, Christ, to the souls in Purgatory, and to the "Church of the first-born who are written in Heaven."[2] It is true also that the Church to a great extent works invisibly. She is compared, not only to a spreading tree in which the birds of the air lodge, but also to the hidden leaven, the working of which is concealed from the eye of the observer. The Church gives visible sacraments, but God alone can distinguish with absolute certainty the souls on which the invisible grace of the sacraments produces its due effect. So much every Catholic will gladly allow. But it is one thing to make this admission, quite another, and a very different thing, to contend, with Luther, that God first of all enlightens the individual on the nature of the gospel, and that the individual so enlightened, and already a member of the invisible Church, pronounces the body or bodies in which this true gospel is taught to be the true visible Church. According to Catholics, the recognition of and submission to the visible Church is the ordained means of sharing in the invisible treasures of grace. The visible Church precedes the invisible. The Lutheran reverses this order, and thereby separates himself from the teaching, not only of the Catholic Church, but also of the New Testament. The Lutheran doctrine moreover contradicts, the Catholic is in perfect harmony with, the whole purpose of the Incarnation. The Son of God did not content Himself with working invisibly on the hearts. He assumed a visible body, went about teaching and doing good, and at the same time added to His words and works the invisible agency of His divine Spirit. Therefore He left visible representatives, who were to be known and seen by all, and at the same time took care that this outward Church should be quickened by the invisible presence of the Holy Ghost, which rules and quickens the Church, as the soul rules and quickens the body.

The Church, then, of the New Testament was a visible body, and it was further invested with authority. A visible body differs from a mere mob or accidental gathering of individual units, because the former has, while the latter has not, a regularly appointed government. We have seen already that the Church was to be clothed with power, from the fact that all men were to hear her. This power was to be wielded by the officers and rulers of the Church. Our Lord chose and trained His Apostles. As He was leaving the earth, He declared, "All power is given to Me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, teach all nations."[1] How great the power was which had been given to our Lord and which He committed to the twelve appears from His own words to them, "Whatsoever you shall bind upon earth, shall be bound also in heaven: and whatsoever you shall loose upon earth, shall be loosed also in heaven;"[2] and again, "Whose sins ye shall forgive, they are forgiven them: and whose you shall retain, they are retained."[3]

The consideration of the Church as a visible body naturally leads us to speak of her unity. We can see that our Lord meant to found one Church, because He compares His Church to a house, the keys of which He put into Peter's hands; and again, He likens His Church, in pointed and emphatic words, to one single flock under one single shepherd. The Church, then, is one, because she is a single body constituted under one invisible Head, Jesus Christ, and also under one earthly head, our Lord's representative upon earth —viz. St. Peter. Christ did not permit His followers to form themselves into voluntary and independent societies, united by individual inclinations, or for purposes of convenience. He built His house upon a rock, and He gave St. Peter power to open and to shut the doors—i.e. to admit some to membership and to exclude others, according to the statutes which Christ Himself had framed. St. Paul develops the idea of this unity, and shows exactly in what it consisted, in the maxim, "One body and one Spirit . . . one Lord, one faith, one baptism."[4] In other words, the unity of the Church is assured by the unity of God Himself, who founded one Church and continues to rule it by His earthly representatives. This unity manifests itself in a double way. First, it implies unity of faith—"One faith." Among the members of merely human institutions opinions must needs vary. Not so with the members of the Church, who are united in the one invariable truth, proclaimed by the incarnate God. Accordingly, St. Paul beseeches his converts to persevere in this unity of belief, in which they had been established by the grace of God. "I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that you all speak the same thing, and that there be no schisms among you; but that you be perfect in the same mind, and in the same judgment."[1] Far from tolerating various ways of thinking; far from allowing scope for private judgment on articles of faith, or admitting that men were free to indulge in great latitude of belief, provided that they were sincere and attentive to the natural precepts of morality, St. Paul exclaims, "If any one preach to you a gospel besides that which you have received, let him be accursed."[2] The word "heresy," which is used at first without any bad meaning in the sense of "party" or "school," occurs in the later writings as a term of reproach, used to mark those who chose for themselves instead of submitting to the faith of the Church, as if that fact alone were sufficient to brand those who presumed to exercise this choice. We are not left to guess how the Apostles judged of such a course. "A man that is a heretic," St. Paul writes, "after the first and second admonition, avoid: knowing that he that is such an one is subverted and sinneth, being condemned by his own judgment."[3] St. Peter describes heretical parties or schools as "sects of perdition,"[4] and St. John, with all his gentleness, is no less stringent. "If any man come to you and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into the house or say to him, God save you."[5] Next, the unity of the Church, as St. Paul conceives it, implies that the faithful are not only one because they hold the same faith, but also because they participate in the same sacraments—"One baptism." In baptism all are born again; they become children of the same Father in heaven, and for that very reason are united as brethren to each other. "As many of you as have been baptized in Christ, have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek; there is neither bond nor free; there is neither male nor female. For you are all one in Christ Jesus."[1] Moreover, St. Paul only names baptism as one of the sacraments by which the unity of the Church is secured, and in which this unity displays itself, for he attributes the same unifying influence, and that in a higher degree, to the Eucharist. "The chalice of benediction, which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? And the bread which we break, is it not the partaking of the body of the Lord? For we being many are one bread, one body, all who partake of one bread."[2]

The unity of the Church, then, depends on the unity of her organisation, her common faith and teaching, the discipline to which all are subject, the life of prayer and of sacramental grace to which all her members are called. But this sacramental life makes the Church holy, just as it makes her one. There is, indeed, a marked difference in our Lord's teaching on the sanctity as contrasted with His statements on the unity of the Church. As has been already proved, Christ warns us that all the members of His Church would not be holy, while He never gives the slightest hint that this Church could by any possibility be split into opposing sects. But in spite of sins and defects in her members, the Church was to be in a true and real sense holy. She deserves to be so called because in Christ her Head she possesses the source of all sanctity; because by true doctrine on morals, as well as on faith, she teaches the way to heaven; while by prayer and the sacraments she puts into men's hands the weapons of this spiritual warfare, by which they can overcome evil and fight the good fight of faith. Christ "loved the Church and delivered Himself up for it, that He might sanctify it, cleansing it by the laver of water in the word of life."[3] He loves the Church as husbands ought to love their wives; so that the marriage bond is a type of the union between Christ and His mystical body.[4] Moreover, in spite of scandals, which were by no means lacking in Apostolic times and were often of the grossest character, the sanctity of the Church shone forth in the lives of her children. St. Paul appeals in all humility to his own work, to his self-denial, his arduous toils, his charity and gift of sympathy, to the fruitfulness of his Apostolic teaching. For the first time Jews and heathen saw men give up their goods and hold all things in common; they beheld not only men who were pure and faithful to their wives, but also others who embraced a perfection unknown even to the great saints of the old law—men who embraced the celibate life, making themselves, in Christ's words, "eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake." St. Paul specially commends the unmarried state, and that not simply "on account of the present necessity," but further, on general grounds, because "he that is without a wife is solicitous for the things that belong to the Lord, that he may please God. But he that has a wife is solicitous for the things of the world, how he may please his wife, and he is divided."[1] Thus, while the heathen rulers were actually trying to force their subjects into marriage, in order to deliver them from the evils of profligacy, the members of the Christian commonwealth exhibited to the world a new order of things, in which, on the one hand, the holy marriage tie became indissoluble, and was rendered holier still by a great sacrament, while, on the other, many pressed on to a higher state and even on earth led an angelic life. On this supernatural sanctity of the Church, flowing from union with Christ, developing itself in charity, zeal, benevolence, virginity, and a thousand other ways, Christ promised to set His seal by miracles. "These signs shall follow them that believe. In My name they shall cast out devils: they shall speak with new tongues. They shall take up serpents; and if they shall drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them: they shall lay their hands upon the sick and they shall recover."[2] This sanctity of the Church, begun and really energising upon earth, was to be perfected in heaven. At the day of judgment, the wheat was to be separated from the weeds, the good fish from the bad. Then the prophet's words were to be fulfilled: "Arise, arise, put on thy strength, O Sion; put on the garments of thy glory, O Jerusalem, the city of the holy one: for henceforth the uncircumcised and unclean shall no more pass through thee."[1] The marriage of the Lamb, of which St. John speaks in the Apocalypse, will be solemnised, and the bride of Christ will take her proper place in His glory.

The Catholic and Apostolic character of the Church in the New Testament need not detain us long; we have only to point out that these marks are included in the picture already drawn. The Jewish Church was national and therefore particular. The Church of Christ received a commission to teach all nations; the wall of partition between Jew and Gentile was broken down; the Church was to be Catholic or universal. To this Catholic Church the Apostles gave laws. When questions and disputes arose as to the obligation of the Jewish law, the Apostles with the "ancients" gave a decisive judgment, accompanying it with the words, "It hath seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us."[2] On the foundation of prophets and apostles "the Church was built," "Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner-stone."[3] The influence of the Apostles was felt in every part of the Church, because all doctrine and all authority to teach descended from them. It was to the Apostles Christ had entrusted the commission of teaching and baptising all nations. They in turn ordained others and gave them power to hand on like authority to "faithful men" who were to represent Christ in future generations. "For this cause," St. Paul writes to Titus, "I left thee in Crete, that thou shouldst set in order the things that are wanting, and shouldst ordain presbyters in every city, as I also appointed thee."[4] Thus, the orders and mission of the whole Church were to be apostolic, and the teaching or doctrine of the Church was to be apostolic also. What St. Paul said to the Thessalonians, he said virtually to all Christians with whom he was connected, directly or indirectly. "Stand firm: and hold the traditions which you have learned, whether by word or by our epistle."[5] One word more is needed before we quit this part of our subject. It is sometimes objected that, after all, the Roman Catholic Church is not really Catholic, because it does not, in matter of fact, include within its pale all mankind, or even all who profess themselves Christians. The fact is indisputable, but no inference against the Roman Catholic Church can be deduced from it. The Church of the Apostles was not Catholic in this sense. It was Catholic, not because it embraced all mankind, but because it claimed universal jurisdiction; because it asserted its right to control the hearts and consciences of all the children of Adam; because it claimed to speak in the name of Him who had received the nations for His inheritance. No obduracy on the part of the heathen, no apostasy on the part of Christians, could alter the character of the Catholic Apostolic Church. Let sects increase ever so much, and spread and flourish in human estimation, still the Church remained the bride of Christ and the sole heir to His promises. To each new sect the Church could say, "Prior veni: I was here before you: I, not you, have received the commission to teach and rule the nations."

Another gift was necessary, without which the Church's unity could not have continued, and even if it could have been maintained, would have been an evil rather than a blessing. There is no real advantage in an iron constraint which forces men to repeat the same formulas and acquiesce in the same decisions; there is no advantage in unity, unless it be unity in the truth. Accordingly, our Lord made His Church infallible. Against her He promised that "the gates of hell"—i.e. the powers of evil and of error issuing forth from the gates of the infernal city—would never prevail. He was the truth itself, the uncreated Wisdom, and to Him His disciples could boldly go, because He "had the words of eternal life." But they were not to be worse off when His visible presence left them. "Behold, I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world."[1] The Holy Ghost was to teach them "all things."[2] Hence St. Paul speaks, in a passage already quoted, of "the house of God, which is the Church of the living God, the pillar and the ground of the truth."[3] No error could ever darken the Church: no persecution could ever destroy her. Those who revolted from her were self-condemned; and those who listened to her could never be led astray by doubt or misbelief. What the Scriptures were, what the Scriptures meant—all was to be settled for them by the Church. They were favoured with a full perception of the truth and with an abundance of grace impossible under the Jewish dispensation. Just as our Lord impressed His hearers by the very fact that He spoke as one having authority and not as the Scribes, so the Church, by her lofty prerogatives as the Bride of Christ and organ of the Holy Ghost, was to win the hearts of men to love and reverence. "Thy teacher shall not flee away from thee any more, and thine eyes shall see thy teacher. And thine ears shall hear the word of one admonishing thee behind thy back: This is the way, walk ye in it; and go not aside neither to the right hand nor to the left."[1]

(B) The Church of the first Ages after the Apostles.— We have been trying to show that the Church of the New Testament was One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic, the indefectible and infallible organ of the truth, from which, and not from their private study of Biblical records, all nations were to learn the truth. Did any change occur in the rule of faith when the Apostles were no longer upon earth? When the Apostles were gone, did the Protestant religion begin to be, so that Christians went for their faith, not to the Church, but to the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments? Now, on the face of it, it is unlikely that our Lord ordained an elaborate system which was to continue for a brief space and then give place to one radically different. But this improbability rises to sheer impossibility, when we reflect that our Lord, far from preparing His disciples for such a change, distinctly promised that He was to be with His Church "all days;" that the gates of hell were not to prevail against it; and so clearly implied that the Apostles were to have successors, endowed with the same powers and with the same infallibility. If we turn from the New Testament to the writings of the first Christians, we find everything in exact correspondence with the Catholic theory of the Church. When St. John, the last of the Apostles, died, there is no trace of any revolution which occurred in the system of Christian government. We find the bishops ruling just as the Apostles had done, and making the same claims to speak in the name of Christ. St. Ignatius, the disciple of St. John, proclaims the Church's unity, and the necessity of union with and submission to her. "Do nothing," he writes, "without the bishop. . . . Jesus Christ is one. . . . Therefore, let all of you meet together, as in one temple, as at one altar, as in one Jesus Christ."[2] We are to receive one Eucharist, for there is one flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ, one altar, one chalice, as there is one bishop.[1] Our Lord breathed "incorruption into His Church."[2] In his epistles the term "Catholic Church" appears for the first time in Christian literature,[3] and it embodies the same idea which he expresses elsewhere, when he tells the Ephesians to be "united in the mind of God;" and goes on to say that the bishops established throughout the world (κατὰ τὰ πέρατα) "are in the mind of Jesus Christ."[4] In this Church he recognised a visible head, the Church which "presides (προκάθηται) in the region of the Romans."[5]

St. Ignatius is the only disciple of the Apostles who speaks ex professo on doctrinal matters in documents which still survive. St. Irenæus belongs to the second stage of the Church's history. He was the faithful disciple of St. Polycarp, who was, like St. Ignatius, the disciple of St. John. St. Irenæus wrote, not later than 190, a treatise "against heresies," the earliest dogmatic treatise which has been preserved to us. He stood face to face with developed systems of heresy, and this forced him to state at length and with precision the Catholic rule of faith. This rule in his estimation certainly was not the "Bible and the Bible only." "We must not," he says, "seek from others the truths which it is easy to obtain from the Church, since into her, as into a rich treasury, the Apostles poured, as into a full stream, all which pertains to the truth: so that all who will may drink at her hands the water of life. She is the gate of life; as for all the rest, they are thieves and robbers."[6] He even puts to himself the imaginary case that "the Apostles had left no Scriptures," an hypothesis which on the Protestant theory would have made true Christianity impossible. Irenæus judged differently. "Suppose," he says, "the Apostles had left us no Scriptures, should we not follow the order of tradition which they handed down to those into whose hands they entrusted the churches?"[7] "The true knowledge is the teaching of the Apostles and the ancient constitution of the Church over the whole world (τὸ ἀρχαῖον τῆς ἐκκλησίας σύστημα κατὰ παντὸς τοῦ κόσμου)."[8] This Church, "planted even to the ends of the world by the Apostles and their disciples, inherits [their] faith."[9] He regards the character of the Church's tradition, as in itself the witness to its truth. Each heretic in turn "wished to set up for a teacher, and seceded from the sect in which he found himself at first. . . . No man could tell the number of those who, each on a different plan, separated from the truth."[1] "But the Church, dwelling, so to speak, in one house, as with one soul and one heart, constantly teaches, preaches, delivers this [Apostolical tradition] as with one mouth. There are divers languages in the world, but still the force of tradition is one and the same." In Germany, in Gaul, and Spain, in the East, and in Africa, the Church holds the same faith.[2] God Himself has bestowed the faith upon her, and with it the "Holy Spirit, the pledge of incorruption and confirmation of our faith. . . . Where the Church is, there is the Spirit of God, and where the Spirit of God is, there is the Church and all grace; and the Spirit is truth."[3] Hence to be outside of the Church is the same thing as to be outside of the truth. The quotations given abundantly prove that Irenæus believed the Church to be one, Catholic, infallible in her teaching, and the source of sanctity. He is no less exp[illegible] in laying down her Apostolic cha[illegible] Indeed, he makes this last th[illegible] n of all the Church's prerogative [illegible] ist obey those who have the suc[illegible] the Apostles." It is from those [illegible] ave this succession from the Ap[illegible] ness of doctrine, conversation w[illegible] reproach, speech pure and incorruptible, that we must learn the truth." "They are the men who expound the Scriptures for us without danger of error. And, if we ask how we are to know that the bishops have retained sound doctrine and the true tradition, the answer is that "with the succession of the episcopate they have received a sure gift of truth (charisma veritatis) according to the good will of the Father."[4] We cannot put the belief of St. Irenæus better than in the words of a learned Protestant far removed from any sympathy with it. "Irenæus[5] makes the preservation of sound doctrine and the presence of the Holy Ghost dependent upon the bishops who in legitimate succession represent the Apostles, and . . . this manifestly because he wants at any price to have a security for the unity of the visible Church." St. Irenæus finds the centre of this unity in the Roman Church, "with which, because of its more powerful principality, every Church must agree—that is, the faithful everywhere—in which the tradition of the Apostles has ever been preserved by those on every side." But the interpretation of these words belongs to the article on the Pope.

Other testimonies may be added from the same period. Clement of Alexandria tells us that "the true Church is one, the Church which is really ancient."[1] It is one, he says, because God is one, though men try to split it up into many heresies. He speaks of heresies "which abandon the Church which is from the beginning," and avers that "he who falls into heresy, goes through a desert without water."[2] Tertullian holds similar language in controversy with heretics. Over and over again he appeals to the Apostolic foundation of the Catholic Church. "We communicate with the Apostolic Church, because there is no difference of doctrine between us; this is an evidence of truth"—i.e. a proof that what we teach is true.[3] The Apostles knew all truth,[4] and taught it to the churches.[5] He proves the truth of Catholic doctrine from the fact that the Church is preserved from error by the Holy Ghost, whose office it is so to preserve her; from the very fact that all Catholics hold the same doctrine, arguing that if the churches had fallen into error, they would not all have fallen into the same error, since "that which is found one [and the same] among many, is not an error, but a tradition."[6] Finally, to return to Tertullian's teaching on the Apostolicity of the Church, with which we began, he urges that Catholics can, heretics cannot, claim communion with any Church of Apostolic origin.[7]

We have said enough perhaps on this division of the subject; but from Tertullian we may fitly pass to him who used to call Tertullian his master, the great St. Cyprian. He defines the Church as "the laity united to their bishop (sacerdoti) and pastor." The Church is one and undivided, "being bound in one by the adhesion of bishops in mutual communion."[8] The saying which is regarded as expressing the very essence of Popish bigotry, and which has ever been specially offensive to Protestants, viz. "no salvation outside the Church" ("extra ecclesiam nulla salus") is found word for word in Cyprian.[1] Heresy is a stain which even blood shed for the truth of Christ cannot wash away.[2]

(C) The Catholic Roman Church, the Church of the New Testament and of the Fathers.—The real difficulty in the controversy with all who are not Catholics is to prove that the four notes of the Church given in the Constantinopolitan Creed, "one, holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church," are the true marks by which the Church of Christ may be distinguished from the sects. When that is done, the question between Catholics and their opponents is almost at an end, for a Protestant body can scarcely pretend with seriousness to be the "one, holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church." In fact, no single Protestant body, so far as we are aware, professes to be the one Church. But neither can it be maintained that Protestant bodies taken together, or Protestants and Catholics together, or Anglicans, Greeks and Roman Catholics together, form the one Church. These different bodies are not one in doctrine; they hold no visible communion with each other; much less are they ruled by one visible government; they cannot, therefore, form one visible body. Just as little can any of the bodies which are severed from the unity of the faith, claim the title of Catholic. No Protestant sect asserts its right to universal dominion; such sects are essentially national or local in their character, and exhibit a certain amount of toleration to each other. The Scotch Presbyterian Church is not aggressive in England: the English Episcopalian Church makes no attempt to exercise jurisdiction over the French or Italian nations. No Protestant body dares to say, "I am the Catholic Church; out of my pale there is no salvation; all men must hear me and submit to me: if they refuse, it is at their peril." Even the Greek schismatical Church does not seriously attempt to convert the French or even the English to its special form of Christianity. Similarly it might be shown that no separated body can rightly call itself holy or Apostolic; but we need not enter at length on the treatment of these points, because we shall have to point out presently that the Catholic Roman Church is in exclusive possession of these marks, which serve with the other two to distinguish the true Church. Suffice it to say that no single Protestant body, no schismatical body of any kind, can by any possibility have received its mission from the Apostles. At some time or other, each separated itself from the unity of the Church and started a new and independent life, so that its present doctrine and its present independent state cannot have come down to it in unbroken succession from the Apostles of Christ. Indeed, no Protestant Church professed to have received its doctrine in unbroken succession from the Apostles. The Anglican body, for example, declares expressly that Christianity was grossly corrupted; that this corruption affected the English church among others, and that she at the time of the Reformation reverted to the simplicity of primitive doctrine. The mark of sanctity was conspicuously absent in the founders of the Greek schism and of the Protestant churches. Nor can any body which is not Catholic possess the means of holiness. Even if the true sacraments are given, they are given and taken against Christ's will, for the simple reason that they are given outside of the Church which He founded and by those who hold no commission to administer them. They are therefore given and received sacrilegiously and cannot profit the recipient, unless he is excused by invincible ignorance.

The Catholic Roman Church, on the other hand, claims with good right to be "one, holy, Catholic and Apostolic." She is one because all her members are united under one visible head, the Bishop of Rome, who is the centre of unity, and who has received supreme power to rule and govern the Church of God. He does so along with the bishops whom the Holy Ghost has appointed also "to rule the Church of God," an office which they exercise in union with, and in subordination to, the successor of St. Peter. The Church, then, if we look at its constitution, is one, as truly as, indeed far more truly than, any nation can be one. Some years ago a great deal was said about the unity of Germany, which was eagerly desired by many. Germans had many points in common: they all spoke the same language; the same blood flowed in their veins; they were proud of the same literature; they were bound together by many ennobling recollections, and, in some measure, by common aspirations. But the German States were not one, because they were not under one government. After a military struggle, the unity of the empire was, at least to a great extent, secured, because the great majority of Germans were placed under one single rule. This unity Christ provided for His Church by placing it under Peter and his successors. But, whereas earthly governments cease to be, and nations may be severed and divided, Christ took care that the government of His Church should never fail—that it should continue to the end of time, one and indivisible. He made Peter the rock, and promised that the gates of hell shall never prevail against the Church built upon it. That this unity of government is possessed by the Catholic Roman Church at this day, is an unquestioned and unquestionable fact. No less clear is the Church's unity in faith. All Roman Catholics believe the Church in communion with the Pope to be infallible in faith and morals. The freest discussion is permitted on matters of opinion—even of theological opinion. But all the faithful, by the very fact that they are Catholics, admit that they are bound to hear the voice of the Church, and when the Pope solemnly issues a definition of faith, when the pastors united teach a truth as of faith, then all controversy is at an end. The Protestant principle of private judgment is, from the very necessity of the case, a principle of division. A belief in the gift of infallibility which our Saviour has bestowed on His Church is in its own nature a principle of unity. This unity of government and belief is perfected by unity of worship. The Catholic Church all over the world offers to God the one worship really worthy of Him—viz. the sacrifice of the Mass. Everywhere she administers the same sacraments with the same essential rites.

The Catholic Roman Church is also holy. She gives the true sacraments, and it is in the unity of the Church, and there only, that these sacraments are means of grace. Because of her infallibility she teaches, and is sure to teach, a holy doctrine, thereby differing from the Protestant Reformers, who taught that man is justified by mere faith without good works; that man's will is not free; that God has predestined some to eternal ruin without any fault of theirs. It may be safely said that if a Protestant is virtuous, it is not because, but in spite of, the heresy taught by those who founded the Protestant religion, while a bad Catholic is bad because he does not practise the faith which he holds. Further, the holiness of the Church is seen in the sanctity of Christ and His Apostles who founded her; in the constancy of the martyrs who sealed her faith with their blood; in the lives of the great saints, who have adorned her in all ages; in the lofty perfection to which her priests and religious are called. The Reformers ought to have been—considering the exalted mission which they professed to have received direct from heaven—men of manifest and heroic sanctity. Let the reader study the character of Luther as portrayed by learned Protestants, such as Hallam or Sir William Hamilton in his Essays: let him then peruse the defence of Luther against his Protestant assailants, by Archdeacon Hare: and he will see how far Luther fell short of the ordinary moral standard, let alone heroic sanctity. Is it credible that God used such a man as the great instrument for reintroducing the gospel into Europe? Then let the reader turn to the lives of the great Catholic saints—St. Ignatius, St. Charles Borromeo, St. Francis Xavier, and many others—whom God raised up at the very time when so many were deserting the Church of Christ and stigmatising her as apostate and corrupt. Or, again, let anyone impartially consider the state to which a priest is called, and compare it with that of a Protestant clergyman. The former is forbidden the enjoyment of domestic life, that he may give himself entirely to the service of God and his brethren. Day by day he must recite the Divine Office; practically he is obliged to offer frequently the holy sacrifice, so that he has the most powerful motive for keeping his conscience pure. The life of a priest is utterly unlike that of other men. A Protestant minister, on the other hand, scarcely differs, so far as his state goes, from the laymen around him, and if, as is often the case, he is a man of exemplary zeal and self-denial, it is not his Church which makes him so. Lastly, the Catholic Church at all times produces eminent servants of God, who, according to Christ's promise, perform works of wonder, like His own. So confident is the Catholic Church that she possesses a succession of saints whose sanctity is evidenced by miracles, that she actually possesses a regular tribunal for the investigation of their heroic virtues and the miracles which attested it. It is certain that no heretical sect, no church except the Catholic Roman Church, would venture, in the broad light of civilisation, to set up such a court.

The Church is continually aggressive, and she will acknowledge no rival. Wherever it is possible she sends her missionaries and plants churches. She claims universal jurisdiction. The common sense of mankind acknowledges her Catholic character. Various sects claim the name of Catholic, but they never succeed in persuading others to acknowledge this claim, and they scarcely seem to believe in it themselves. They are known as the Church of a particular country, as the Church of England, the Church of Scotland, &c.; by the name of some heretical founder, Calvinists, Lutherans, &c.; never as Catholics. Even separatists who have maintained the priesthood and the Catholic rites are not known to the world generally as Catholics, but as Jansenists, "Old Catholics," &c. The argument of St. Augustine holds as good now as in his own day. He says he was kept in the Church by the "very name of Catholic which not without cause among so many heresies that Church alone has obtained; so that, although all heretics wish to be called Catholic, no heretic, if a stranger asks the way to the Catholic Church, dares to point out his own basilica or house."[1] The Church in no way remits her claim to be Catholic when she also speaks of herself as Roman. It is the distinctive mark of Catholics to be in communion with the Roman see. And this use of Roman as equivalent to Catholic is not of recent date. "The Catholics," Cardinal Newman writes, "during this period [viz. that of the Arian Goths] were denoted by the additional title of Romans. Of this there are many proofs in the histories of St. Gregory of Tours, Victor of Vite, and the Spanish councils." . . . After giving one accidental reason for which the Catholics at that time were called Romans, Cardinal Newman proceeds: "The word certainly contains also an allusion to the faith and communion of the Roman See. In this sense the Emperor Theodosius, in his letter to Acacius of Beroea, contrasts it with Nestorianism, which was within the empire as well as Catholicism; during the controversy raised by that heresy, he exhorts him and others to show themselves 'approved priests of the Roman religion.'" Later on similar passages are adduced from the Emperor Gratian and St. Jerome.[2] [2] Development, p. 280, seq.

[1] August. Ep. Fundam. c. 4, quoted by Billuart.

The Roman Church is Apostolic, because her doctrine is the faith once revealed to the Apostles, which faith she guards and explains, without adding to it or taking from it; because the orders of her clergy come by unbroken succession from the Apostles; because she is in communion with Rome, the Apostolic see by pre-eminence, for the Roman bishop is the successor of St. Peter, to whom Christ entrusted His flock, to whom He gave the keys of His house, so that communion with Rome makes the Church's mission—that is, her authority to teach—apostolic. Other sees of Apostolic foundation have fallen away into heresy; and in the Catholic Roman Church the See of Peter remains the unfailing centre of unity. Sects may preserve the Apostolic succession of bishops, and so may have true orders; but no sect can have Apostolic mission and so be Apostolic, because all mission is lost the moment that a separation from the Roman See is effected.

(D) The Constitution of the Church.—We may now dismiss controversy, and attempt a concise account of the militant Church and the belief of Catholics regarding it. It may be defined as "the society of the faithful who are baptised, and united by the profession of the same faith, participation in the same sacraments and the same worship, to each other, and who are under one head in heaven, viz. Christ, one head on earth, viz. the Pope, His Vicar." Thus the Church consists of those who "are baptised," because baptism makes us members of the Church; who are united in faith, sacraments and worship, because since the Church is intended to put men in possession of heaven, her members must be united in the means necessary for the attainment of this end—viz. faith, sacraments, and worship: her members are all under one head, otherwise the Church would not be one body; lastly, the Church, being a visible body, must have a visible head and centre of unity.

The Church then, though it consists of good and bad members, does not include heretics, schismatics, or (at least in the strict and full sense of membership) persons severed from her unity by the greater excommunication.[1] This

[1] Certain questions agitated in the theological schools are passed over here: e.g. whether "pure schismatics," i.e. persons holding the full faith of the Church, but separated by schism), may still be called members of the Church.

Church is divided into the ecclesia docens (i.e. the body of the pastors who teach the faith) and the ecclesia credens (i.e. the faithful who are taught the faith and who accept it). The teaching or ruling body of the Church is composed, (1) of the Pope, who is the vicar of Christ and successor of Peter; who is the centre of unity, so that none who are not in communion with him are Catholics at all; and who possesses immediate and ordinary jurisdiction over all the faithful—i.e. not only over all the laity, but over all other pastors, whatever their dignity may be.[1] (2) Of the bishops, who rule separate portions of Christ's flock which have been committed to their charge, with ordinary jurisdiction and in virtue of divine appointment, but still in union with and in subordination to the Pope. (3) Of the inferior clergy, who are subordinate to the bishops and represent them, but who are not necessary to the Church in the same sense as that in which the bishops are, since bishops, governing their flocks with ordinary jurisdiction, belong to the divine and unalterable constitution of the Church; not so vicars-general, parish-priests, &c. The Pope, indeed, may remove bishops, may alter the boundaries of dioceses, suppress them or unite them; a country may lose its hierarchy and become subject to Vicars Apostolic, who are mere delegates of the Pope. But there always has been and there always will be an episcopate, presiding over dioceses and ruling them, in subjection, of course, to the Pope, but still with ordinary jurisdiction.

The ecclesia credens, or body of the faithful, is infallible in its belief concerning faith and morals: i.e. in theological language, the Church has a passive infallibility; but, as the faithful are bound to learn the faith from their pastors, it follows that the Church has an active as well as a passive infallibility: i.e. the faithful cannot err in what they believe, because the same Holy Spirit which enables them to believe what their pastors teach provides that these pastors shall teach the truth with unerring voice. The pastors of the Church may exercise this divine gift in several ways. The Pope, in his supreme office of universal teacher, may define a doctrine on faith and morals, to be held by the whole Church; in which case, according to the decision of the Vatican Council, he is infallible. Again, the Pope may convoke a particular synod and in union with it define a doctrine of faith, which he afterwards promulgates to the whole Church. Once more, the Pope may convoke a general council, and confirm its decisions on matters of faith. Lastly, the Church dispersed may exercise her infallibility: i.e. the Pope and the bishops throughout the world, in the ordinary performance of their duty, and without formally concerting together, may teach certain truths to the body of the Church as of divine faith. In all these cases, Catholics without exception maintain, and are bound to maintain, that the teaching given is infallible.

It only remains to determine the subject-matter to which this infallibility extends. Clearly, neither Pope nor Church can put forth new dogmas for acceptance. The faith has been "once delivered to the saints." The Vatican Council lays down this point with great lucidity. "The Holy Ghost was not promised to the successors of Peter in order that, through his revelation, they might manifest new doctrine, but in order that through his assistance [the successors of Peter might religiously guard, and faithfully expound, the revelation handed down by the Apostles, or the deposit of the faith." The Church, then, has no inspiration: she cannot receive fresh revelations, to be imposed on the belief of the faithful. Her office is confined to expounding the original revelation, to the condemnation of new error and the drawing out of ancient truth, which may not, as yet, have been perfectly understood by the faithful. Hence when the Church defines an article of faith—such, for example, as the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin—there is a double obligation of belief. First, we are bound to confess that the doctrine is true and to be accepted without doubt; next, that this doctrine was revealed to the Apostles and preserved in the deposit of faith, as contained in Scripture and tradition. It need scarcely be said that this belief in the permanent and inalterable character of revealed truth is perfectly consistent with the theory of development as maintained by Cardinal Newman and other eminent Catholic divines. It is one thing to hold that the deposit of faith was given in its fullness to the Apostles; quite another to assert that every article of this faith has been apprehended fully and clearly by the faithful generally in all parts of the Church. On certain great and central truths—e.g. the Divinity of Christ; His presence in the Eucharist; the forgiveness of sin through baptism and penance; the unity and infallibility of the Church—the faith of Catholics has been clear from the first. On other questions a certain obscurity prevailed, and the Catholic dogmas were developed by the slow action of time and controversy. Consequences had to be drawn from principles, and only by degrees did it appear how much these principles involved. Individual Fathers might fall into exaggeration or commit themselves to incomplete and one-sided statements. They might fix their attention on the truths which it was their business at the moment to defend against the heresy of the day, and fall into inaccurate language, which could be used—unjustly, indeed, but not without a show of plausibility—by heretics who fell into error at the opposite extreme from the errors which these Fathers opposed. It may be freely admitted, then, that the definitions of councils have gone beyond the teaching of individual Fathers, but then this is precisely because these Fathers had fallen short to some extent of the original teaching of the Apostles. In the course of years heresy was met by new and adequate expression of truth, delivered from the first; but, after all, the stream of doctrine rose no higher than its source.

Thus the Church's infallibility in defining articles of faith is limited to the definition of truths already contained in Scripture and Tradition. But within this province her word, and her word alone, is decisive. To her, and not to private individuals, it belongs authoritatively to interpret Scripture. She has determined the books of which Scripture is made up; it is hers to judge of their meaning. So, too, she is the guardian of tradition, and no one can appeal either to Scripture or to history against her definition without making shipwreck of the faith and forfeiting the name of Catholic by the very act. Individuals may of course devote themselves to the study of Scriptural exegesis, and of history, and the Church in all ages has encouraged these studies and commended those who have pursued them. Moreover, few studies, if pursued in a really scientific and impartial spirit, tend more to strengthen belief in the Church's claim. But to say that a private person may on the strength of his investigations set at defiance the Church's definition is tantamount to a denial of the Church's infallibility.

We have just said that the Church's infallibility in articles of faith does not extend beyond the truths contained in the original revelation. But almost all theologians are agreed that the Church is endowed with a further infallibility, on matters which are so closely connected with revealed truth that, unless the Church were infallible in pronouncing upon them, her infallibility, in defining the faith itself, would come to nothing, or at least fail to effect the ends for which it was bestowed upon her. Thus the Church is infallible in deciding that a book contains heretical doctrine: in affirming, for example, that false and heretical propositions are to be found in the work of Jansenius on grace. Otherwise the Church's condemnation of false doctrine would be almost useless, since the faithful would be free to maintain that the Church had misunderstood the meaning of the supposed heretic, and thus they might continue to feed on poisonous pastures. So again, the Church is infallible in the canonisation of saints: i.e. in deciding that a particular individual practised virtue in an heroic degree and now reigns with Christ in heaven; else she would be proposing false models to her children, and encouraging a veneration completely misplaced: to do which would amount to nothing less than forfeiting, or at least obscuring, her note of sanctity. Similar cases in which the Church's infallibility extends beyond the deposit of faith might be mentioned. But it must be remembered that the Church is not infallible in such facts as are merely personal and historical. She may err in her judgment on the guilt or innocence of individuals who come before her tribunal; documents may be accepted as genuine in her councils which are really spurious; historical errors may exist in the offices of the Breviary, approved as it is by the judgment of the Pope and the Church. Error on such matters is possible, because they form no part of the faith, nor does error in regard to them detract from the perfection with which the Church guards that faith.

Möhler's Symbolism ("Symbolik") contains a masterly exposition of the differences between Catholics and Protestants on the subject of the Church. Cardinal Newman's "Development of Christian Doctrine" abounds with valuable matter on this subject.]

CHURCH: PLACE OF CHRISTIAN ASSEMBLY. Churches may,

in one sense, be said to be as old as Christianity itself, for places of Christian meeting are frequently mentioned in the New Testament—e.g. in 1 Cor. xi. 22, xiv. 34. At first no doubt private houses were used for this purpose, and thus St. Paul, Coloss. iv. 15, writes, "Salute the brethren who are at Laodicea, and Nymphas, and the Church that is in his house." The same expression is used of Prisca and Aquila, both at Rome, in Rom. xvi. 5; and at Ephesus, 1 Cor. xvi. 19; and also of Philemon, either at Colossæ or Laodicea (Philemon, 2). This state of things continued after the Apostolic age, though it is impossible to determine exactly when the gatherings in the houses of private Christians gave way to assemblies held in buildings erected for the purpose. Justin gives a famous description of the celebration of the Eucharist among Christians of his time, but he does not make any mention of churches in the later sense. Some light is thrown on the early Christian assemblies by the words quoted by De Rossi, "collegium quod est in domo Sergiæ Paulinæ"[1] ("the club which is in the house of Sergia Paulina"); for the Christians were first recognised by the Roman government as "Collegia" or burial clubs, and protected by this legal toleration they no doubt held their first assemblies for public worship. However, at the beginning of the third century, we find clear proof that churches properly so called began to be erected. Thus Ælius Lampridius in his Life of Alexander Severus (222-235) relates that this Emperor confirmed the Christians in possession of a place of worship. St. Gregory the wonder-worker is said by his namesake of Nyssa, to have built several churches; and when the persecution of Diocletian broke out, the sight of Christian churches was familiar to all. The edict of that Emperor, usually assigned to the year 302, ordered their destruction. As soon as this last persecution was over, and the peace of the Church secured by Constantine, Christians began to erect churches on a magnificent scale, and thus seized the first opportunity of manifesting that outward respect to God and His house which is characteristic of Catholics. Eusebius has left an elaborate description of the church built at Tyre between 313 and 322. He tells us of its great wall of enclosure, which has left its traces to this day; of its portico opening into the atrium, in the centre of which there was a fountain for the purification of the worshippers as they entered; of the great doors, the nave, the aisles with galleries above them; of the "thrones" for the clergy, and of "the most holy altar" surrounded with railings of exquisite work.[1] In short, the Church exhibited the pomp of Catholic worship as soon as it was possible to do so.

The changes of style in church-building at different epochs do not concern us here; but it is worth while to note the arrangements of the earliest Christian churches.

According to the rule laid down in the Apostolic Constitutions,[2] the church was to have the sanctuary at the east end, the reason being that by this means the Christians in church were enabled to pray as they were used to pray in private, i.e. facing the east.[3] However, this rule was by no means universally observed. The church at Tyre, of which we have already spoken, had the entrance at the east and the sanctuary of course at the west; and ancient churches in Rome (e.g. St. John Lateran) are preserved, that are arranged in this manner. The fact is that, as we shall presently see, it was impossible, according to the position which the bishop occupied, that both he and his flock should pray facing in the same direction. If the rule in the Apostolic Constitutions was followed, the people faced east, the bishop west; if the church was placed like that built at Tyre, or like those said to have been erected by Constantine at Rome, then the people had to face westwards, but the celebrant looked towards the east. The form of the church described in the Apostolic Constitutions was an oblong, terminating at the inner end in a semicircular projection, called concha or apse. In this apse the altar was placed; behind the altar the bishop's throne was placed; the priests occupied seats which formed a semicircle, the bishop's seat being in the midst, and the bishop and the priests being so placed as to look towards the people. Origen calls this place in which the seats of the bishops and priests were set round the altar, presbyterium. It corresponds to what we now call the sanctuary, a name which was not introduced till the middle ages. Of the deacons, some stood in the presbyterium, others were stationed in the body of the church to keep order among the people. In the church of St. Agnes in the Roman Catacombs, we can still discover this ancient arrangement of the presbyterium. At each side of the apse—i.e. at the north and south corners, if the apse looked east—there were παστοφόρια or cells for the reservation of the Blessed Sacrament and for keeping the sacred vessels.

The laity were placed in the nave, a name which has arisen from the comparison of the Church to a ship, which we meet with even in the Apostolic Constitutions. "In the middle stood the reader on a raised place." Since the bishop also is said to have sat in the middle, although his throne really stood at the east end, we are justified in supposing that the reader's pulpit was between the north and south sides of the nave—in other words, at the east of the nave, and so, close to the presbyterium. St. Cyprian[1] describes the conspicuous position of the reader, as he stood on the pulpit (pulpitum) in the sight of the congregation.

Nearest to the presbyterium, places were reserved for the virgins, widows, and aged women.[2] The next part of the nave was parted off into two spaces, each with separate doors: one of these portions was for men, the doors being guarded by ostiarii; the other for women, the doors being placed in charge of deaconesses. We learn from the direct testimony of Origen that the last place, i.e. the most remote from the altar—was given to the catechumens. No doubt, however, the catechumens were placed nearer to the altar than the penitents, though it is difficult to determine the position occupied by the different classes of penitents. Tertullian[3] speaks of criminals, who were driven not only from the threshold, but from any place under the roof of the church; and Cyprian says of penitents, "Let them come to the threshold of the church, but by no means pass over it."[4] We may perhaps conclude that the more advanced class of penitents (the "hearers") were placed in the porch (νάρθηξ), while persons under excommunication were put outside of the church altogether. The buildings attached from ancient times to the church, such as the sacristy, baptistery, &c., are described in separate articles.

As has been already said, we are considering the church from the theological or ecclesiastical, not from the architectural point of view, so that we say nothing of the different styles which have prevailed in the East and West. Accordingly, having described the arrangements of a Christian church in primitive ages, we may now pass on to speak of the modern regulations on the subject of church-building. We shall follow as our guide a recent writer on this subject, Msgr. de Montault, in his "Traité pratique de la Construction des Églises."

A church is a building intended for the general use of the faithful, and is for this reason distinct from a chapel, which is intended for the convenience of some family, college, &c.; or from an oratory, which is essentially domestic or private. The principal churches are called basilicas, and these again are subdivided into greater and patriarchal, and into minor basilicas. The chief church of a diocese is called a cathedral, and a cathedral may be patriarchal, primatial, metropolitan, according to the dignity of the prelate who holds it. An abbatial church is the seat of an abbot; if served by a chapter, a church is called collegiate The title parish-church explains itself The greater basilicas are called "most holy," while "most illustrious" and "illustrious" (perinsigne and insigne) are names of honour given respectively to lesser basilicas and collegiate churches, by favour of the Holy See.

The place on which a church is to be built is to be designated by the bishop, as is expressly ordered both by the Pontifical and canon law. There must be an open space all round the church, but this prescription of the Pontifical does not forbid the placing of houses for the bishop or clergy at the side. There should be no window or door opening into a private house, unless permission to that effect has been obtained from Rome. There is no rule which requires the sanctuary to be placed at the east end, though Ferraris considers this arrangement more suitable. In the middle ages, pains were taken to place the sanctuary so that it looked towards the point at which the sun rose when the foundations were traced. During the last three centuries this orientation, as it is called, has been much neglected. Nor, again, need the church be of any particular style, since the Church has sanctioned by use all kinds of ecclesiastical architecture. Moreover, churches are built in all forms and shapes: that of a Latin cross, of a Greek cross (which is a cross with four equal branches), of a rectangle, circle, &c. The plans when completed must be submitted to the bishop and approved by him.

The laity are placed in the nave of the church. The separation of the sexes, which, as we have seen above, dates from the infancy of the Church, continued during the middle ages. It was the custom to place the women on the north, the men on the south side of the nave. This separation of men from women in church is now very generally neglected, but it is required by the Roman Ritual and the "Ceremonial of Bishops," when it can be managed without inconvenience.

Catholics are of course bound to show respect to the church as the house of God. Men must uncover their heads, women, according to St. Paul's rule, must have their heads covered. Ecclesiastical authority from time to time has intervened to suppress abuses contrary to this respect, and has severely interdicted unnecessary talking, the sale of pious objects, begging, &c., in the church. It is, however, to be observed that ecclesiastical authority permits certain reunions which are not of a strictly religious character to take place in church. Thus in 1669 the Sacred Congregation of Rites "declared that it was not contrary to the ecclesiastical rite, nay, that it was praiseworthy," for the medical college of Salerno to "confer the Doctor's degree in the church."

With regard to the repair of churches, the expense must be met, according to Benedict XIV. and other canonists, (1) from the revenues of the church, if sufficient for the purpose; (2) by those who are obliged, whether by custom or particular statute, to do so; (3) by the parish priest if his professional income allows of it, the assistant clergy being also bound to contribute on the same condition; (4) by the patron; (5) failing all these, a tax must be imposed on the parishioners. For the rebuilding of churches, the Congregation of Rites sometimes permits the people of the place to work on holidays of obligation according to the discretion of the ordinary, provided that the work on these days is done gratuitously. In order to change the site of a church, very grave reasons are required, and often, particularly if a cathedral church is in question, leave must be obtained from Rome.

The particular parts of the church, choir, porch, &c., and the furniture, altars, images, &c., are treated of in separate articles. Of the early history of churches, a good account will be found in the recent work of Probst, "Kirchliche Disciplin in den drei ersten Jahrhunderten."

CHURCH PROPERTY (bona ecclesiastica). The right of the Catholic Church, equally with any other corporation or moral person, to acquire and possess property, seems obvious to common sense; but since this right is often contested in theory and withheld in practice in our own day, it may be desirable to go into the matter in some detail: to examine the principle in human nature on which the temporal endowments of the Church are founded; to distinguish the various kinds of ecclesiastical property, and the purposes for which such property is required; then, after sketching the history of Church endowments in Europe, to give some account of the efforts which mediæval and modern legislation has made to arrest their increase and oust their possessors.

How the Church came to possess property any person who is a Catholic in more than name can discover by merely analysing the feelings which spontaneously arise in his own mind when he is invited, or has the opportunity, to make an offering for some religious object. In making it he feels that it is not he who lays the Church, but the Church that lays him, under an obligation; enabling him by such acts to unite himself to her glorious cause, assist her in fulfilling her divine mission, help to have the divine praises celebrated with greater frequency and splendour, minister to the poor and suffering, and participate in the merits of her ministrations labouring amongst the heathen. "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Such being the natural sentiments of everyone who knows what being a Catholic means, there is no reason to fear that temporal possessions will ever be wanting to the Church, although the spoliations which she has had to endure, and is still enduring, in every part of Europe, cannot but cause great local embarrassment and temporary arrest of her activity. Wherever there are Catholics deserving the name, there the Church will have property, whatever infidel legislation may contrive. The real danger is, lest the persevering efforts of the modern State to shut out religion from education should succeed in training up a generation of men and women to whom the genuine spirit of Catholicism would be unknown, and who would consequently starve the Church by their own illiberality, and observe her persecution by their rulers with complacency. On this subject some remarks will be found under EDUCATION and SCHOOLS.

Property is of two kinds, moveable and immoveable. The so-called Liberals of our day cannot deny that the Church must possess some amount of the former at least, if her functions are to be performed at all. Christ's kingdom, though not "of this world," is in this world; its ministers and subjects are human beings, its medium is social life, its local habitation is the world of sense; it therefore, while its end is heavenly, needs external and material resources. Money, if not exceeding the limits of "evangelical poverty," and church requisites of all kinds, it is admitted even by her enemies that the Church must possess. But they draw a line between moveable and immoveable property—between money and land; pretending that it is the duty and interest of the State to debar her from the enjoyment of real property, lest, we suppose, she should become too powerful, or lest wealth should corrupt her ministers and divert them from their true vocation.[1] This last plea, of course, is hypocritical. On the other side, we shall quote an admirable passage from Card. Soglia, in which he has shown for what purposes the Church requires property, and by what an indisputable right she acquires and enjoys it. "It is asked," he says, "whence does the Church derive the right of acquiring and possessing real or landed property (bona stabilia et frugifera)? Is it from the civil law, or from some other system of law, human or divine? Unless I am much mistaken, a terse and solid answer to this question can be drawn from a consideration of the divine constitution of the Church. We know for certain, from sacred literature and tradition, that there is in the Church a supreme power of administering religion and society, peculiar to it, instituted by Christ, and entirely distinct from the civil power. It is also a certain and established truth that she possesses an inherent right to provide herself with all those apt and suitable means which may be necessary for the preservation of religion itself and of Christian society. But, in order to the worship of God and the salvation of souls in the Christian society, churches and altars must be built; sacred vessels, ornaments, and other things subsidiary to the Divine worship must be provided; the bishops, priests, and ministers who serve the Church and apply all their energies to the promotion of the eternal salvation of men, must be supported; clerks must be trained in letters and ecclesiastical discipline; the poor, the sick, widows and orphans must be taken care of; hospitality must be practised towards the faithful; captives must be redeemed, and many similar works carried on: all which things cannot be done without buildings, revenues, abundant resources, and large expenses. It follows that the Church possesses by her very constitution, and by the will of her divine Founder, the right of procuring, acquiring, and possessing property, whether personal or real, in order that she may have at hand what is necessary in order to defray the expenditure above mentioned; just as civil society has the right of demanding taxes and levying imposts, or even of possessing landed property, if public necessity and utility require it."[1] The Cardinal goes on to maintain that the Church has at all times exercised this right, even in the teeth of the prohibition of the civil power; and as a case in point, he cites her acquisition of property during the third century, when, as a "collegium illicitum," she could not, according to the Roman jurisprudence, legally hold it. That the Church acted wrongly in making these acquisitions it would be absurd and impious to maintain; but the rightfulness of her action can be vindicated on no other principle than one which asserts her right to hold property to be jure divino, and independent of the consent of the civil power.

The historical aspect of the subject must now be briefly treated. It is the remark of St. Austin,[2] that when our

[1] The innumerable unjust spoliations of which the Church has been made, and is still being made, the victim in Italy, and especially at Rome (of which the robbery of the estates of the College of Propaganda is a recent and flagrant instance), are justified on some such flimsy reasoning as that described in the text; the real reason of course being that Italian Liberals hate religion, and hatred, as Aristotle says, desires for its objects annihilation—τὸ μὴ εἶναι.

[1] Institutiones Canonicæ, iii. 1, § 8.

[2] Quoted by Ott, in the art. "Biens Ecclésiastiques," Wetzer and Welte.

Lord, who could have provided for Himself and the Apostles in other ways, sanctioned the use of a bag or purse, in which the offerings of His followers were kept, and from which money was taken for the poor and the requirements of festivals, He desired to teach His Church that she had the right of possessing property. We learn from the Acts of the Apostles that they received, dating from the day of Pentecost, large sums of money which the new believers poured into their hands; that in those first days of fervour private property passed temporarily into abeyance, and the Apostles distributed to "every one according as he had need;"[1] moreover, that when the "serving of tables" threatened to become so onerous as to divert the Apostles from their proper work, they appointed deacons[2] to receive and administer under their direction the Church funds. It is also explicitly stated in the New Testament that "the labourer is worthy of his hire;"[3] that if the clergy sow to the laity spiritual things, it is no great matter if they reap their carnal things,[4] and that "the Lord ordained that they who preach the Gospel should live by the Gospel."[5] The principle of Church endowment and Church property is thus seen to have full, explicit and undeniable Scriptural warrant.

Space does not admit of our showing in detail the manner in which this principle was applied from age to age: how Church funds, from being in the beginning purely diocesan, came to be also capitular, parochial, and monastic; and how the admission of the feudal customs endowed—if we might not say burdened—the Church, not only with broad lands, but with a vast temporal jurisdiction in the shape of lordships and principalities. It may be interesting, however, to note the position in which the question stood at the time when peace was restored to the Church by Constantine. In the imperial ordinances preserved by Eusebius, it is commanded that the sites of all their churches shall be restored to the Christians; and this is followed by the significant proviso that "since the Christians are known to have had not only those places where they were accustomed to meet, but other places also, belonging not to individuals among them, but to the right of the whole body of Christians, you [the prætors, procurators, &c.] will also command all these, by virtue of the law before mentioned, without any hesitancy, to be restored to these same Christians: that is, to their body, and to each conventicle respectively." In another ordinance, addressed to Anulius, the Emperor intimates that this restitution is to be made in favour of "the Catholic Church of the Christians in the several cities or other places," and that Anulius is to "make all haste to restore, as soon as possible, all that belongs to the churches, whether gardens or houses, or anything else."[1] We here see the civil power recognising the legality of those acquisitions which, as mentioned in a previous paragraph, had been made in contravention of the civil law.

The unrestricted right to enjoy property thus recognised in the Church opened the way to abuses, as was only natural; these abuses were restrained by edicts of the Emperors Valentinian and Theodosius. An edict of Marcian (†457) removed many of these restrictions, and allowed all persons ample facilities for endowing the Church with any description of property, whether by will or disposition inter vivos. In the West, as each nation was converted, it voluntarily and joyfully enriched with lands and goods the Church which had brought to it the message of salvation. In the ninth and tenth centuries the incursion of Pagan Danes, Normans, and Hungarians, and the confusions thence arising, caused great havoc and waste of the Church's patrimony; but the unity of the ecclesiastical organisation being preserved, and heresy kept at bay, the damage done was speedily repaired on the return of peace. From the eleventh century to the fifteenth extended that marvellous period of European development in which the Church, pouring out her treasures with a free hand[2] covered the face of the Continent and of our own island with a network of cathedrals, convents, colleges, and parish churches, the beauty and majesty of which later and colder ages admire but cannot emulate. The inroads made upon the Church's fortune by the Reformation and modern revolutions can only be indicated in general terms. In England the Church was deprived of the cathedrals, parish churches, universities, hospitals, see-lands, glebes, and a variety of other property, moveable and immoveable; all which were transferred to the new church founded by Elizabeth. With regard to the monasteries, their lands passed chiefly into the hands of private persons, their personal property to the Crown. In France, the enormous landed possessions of the Church were confiscated at the Revolution, and the Catholic religion for a time suppressed. By the Concordat which the First Consul concluded with the Holy See in 1802, the latter agreed to recognise the title of the holders of all Church lands alienated up to that time, and the French State on the other hand undertook to pay an annual grant from the public revenue for the support of the clergy. This grant amounts at the present time to about two millions sterling, a sum bearing but a small proportion to the rental of the property lost. In Spain, the tithe has been abolished in recent times, and the greater part of the lands belonging to the clergy, both secular and regular, sold. But the position was somewhat ameliorated by the Concordat of 1851, which, while providing a new "dotation" for the clergy by means of a special tax, leaves the Church free to administer the property still remaining to her, and to make fresh acquisitions. In Portugal the state of things is much the same as in Spain, but rather less favourable to the Church. In Italy, the tithe, or a portion of it, is still payable to the clergy; this is also the case in Austria and Bavaria. In Prussia the ancient patrimony of the Church was all lost during the wars of the French Revolution, and was replaced by an annual grant of very moderate dimensions. The practical effect of the May laws of 1877, which imposed upon the bishops and clergy conditions which it was impossible for them to comply with and remain at the same time faithful to Christ and His Vicar, was to retrench this moderate endowment very seriously, and to leave several sees and hundreds of cures destitute of occupants. Happily they are now, for the most part, repealed. In Ireland, the Protestant Church, which it was the policy of the statesmen of Elizabeth to force upon the people, and to endow with the tithes and lands of the ancient Church, has recently (1869) been disestablished. No part of the recovered fund has been returned to the Catholics; but indirectly, from the appropriation of a considerable portion of it to the encouragement of intermediate schools, which are to a large extent Catholic, some advantage has accrued from disestablishment to the cause of religion.

Laws of mortmain, having for their object either to restrict or entirely prohibit the acquisition of landed property by the Church, have formed a prominent feature in secular legislation in most countries of Europe, from the thirteenth century down to the present day. But it will be convenient to treat of such legislation under the Art. WILL (2).

CHURCHING OF WOMEN AFTER CHILDBIRTH. A blessing which the priest gives to women after childbirth according to a form prescribed in the Roman Ritual. He sprinkles the woman, who kneels at the door of the church holding a lighted candle, with holy water, and having recited the 23rd Psalm, he puts the end of his stole into her hand, and leads her into the church, saying, "Come into the temple of God. Adore the Son of the Blessed Virgin Mary, who has given thee fruitfulness in childbearing." The woman then advances to the altar and kneels before it, while the priest, having said a prayer of thanksgiving, blesses her, and again sprinkles her with holy water in the form of a cross. The rubric in the Ritual reserves this rite for women who have borne children in wedlock. Women are under no strict obligation of presenting themselves to be churched, though it is the "pious and laudable custom," as the Ritual says, that they should do so. Properly speaking, the churching of women is not counted among strictly parochial rights; still it ought to be performed by the parish priest, as appears from a decision of the S. Congregation of Rites, December 10, 1703.

This rite was suggested probably by the prescriptions of the old law in Levit. xii. In the Christian Church, the first mention of the rite is said to be found in the so-called Arabic canons of the Nicene Council. Among the Greeks, the blessing after childbirth is given on the fortieth day after the birth of the child, and the child must be brought with the mother to the church.

CIBORIUM. The use of the ciborium, or canopy over the altar, has been already described in the article BALDAC-

CHINO. In England ciborium is the name commonly given to the pyx in which the Blessed Sacrament is kept. Pyx (also Vas) is the recognised name in our present liturgical books, and under that head the subject will be treated. The name "Ciborium minus" is first used for the receptacle of the Blessed Sacrament in the middle ages. It is found in an Ordo Romanus printed in the "Bibliotheca Patr." Lugdun. vol. xiii. 724. (Kraus, "Real-Encyclopädie.")

CIRCUMCELLIONES. A name given to certain Donatist fanatics [see DONATISTS]. These heretics were naturally enraged and embittered when Constantine deprived them of their churches and banished the most distinguished among their bishops. Their fury increased when Constans renewed his father's laws in their full severity; and hence crowds of Donatists, belonging to the lower classes, gathered together under the leadership of some cleric or layman, made open war on the Catholics, and brought immense suffering upon them. These Donatists called themselves Agonistici, "men eager for the fight;" their adversaries called them Circumcelliones, because they wandered "round the country huts" ("circa cellas rusticas") to do all the mischief they could. They exacted provisions by force, put out the eyes of Catholic clerics, possessed themselves of their churches, &c. &c. They themselves were actuated by a morbid craving for martyrdom; so much so that they not unfrequently inflicted death on themselves. This fanaticism lasted beyond the middle of the fourth century. Mention is made of it by Optatus, "De Schism. Donat." ii. c. 18, seq. iii. c. 4, and by Augustine in his works against the Donatists. Besides Circumcelliones, we also find the forms Circelliones and Circuitores. (Kraus, "Real-Encyclopädie.")

CIRCUMCISION, FEAST OF. The connection of circumcision with grace and the removal of original sin will be discussed in the article on the SACRAMENTS OF THE JEWISH CHURCH. Here it is enough to say that circumcision was the rite by which every male Jew entered into the covenant of God with Abraham, and became a partaker in its privileges and blessings; and that it was also instituted as a remedy for original sin. The law of circumcision was imposed on the Jews under the penalty of excision from the people of God. This law could not in any way bind our Lord. He was absolutely sinless, and therefore stood in no need of any remedy for original sin. He was the Son of God by nature, and therefore did not require adoption into the number of God's children. Still, as St. Luke relates, our Saviour was circumcised eight days after His birth, according to the precept in Levit. xii. 3, and then He received the holy name of Jesus. The rite no doubt was performed at home, probably in the cave at Bethlehem, and Benedict XIV. remarks that painters err in representing the scene as taking place in the Temple. Circumcision was sometimes performed by the father of the family: Abraham, for example, in Gen. xvii. 23, is said to have circumcised "Ishmael his son and all that were born in his house;" sometimes by the mother, as appears from Exod. iv. 25, and 1 Mach. i. 63; so that Christ may have received the rite either from His Blessed Mother or St. Joseph.

Various reasons are given by theologians and spiritual writers which made it fitting for our Lord to be circumcised. As it pleased God to send His Son, "made under the law, to redeem those who were under the law," so it became Christ to submit to the yoke law by receiving circumcision, that He might free His brethren from subjection to that law. Moreover, He came "in the likeness of flesh of sin," and therefore He allowed Himself from the first to be numbered in appearance with sinners, and thus to afford a perfect model of obedience and humility. Lastly, although in His circumcision Christ did not actually redeem us by the blood which He shed, still the drops which then flowed were a pledge of all the blood which was to follow, when He hung upon the cross. Thus, in the beautiful language of a mediæval writer, Peter of Blois, once Archdeacon of London, "He who for thirty years was to work salvation in the midst of the earth, from His very cradle and from the breasts of His mother, began the business of our salvation, and tasted the first-fruits of His Passion."

We find the first mention of the feast by its present name in Canon 17 of a council which met at Tours in 567. "In order," so the canon runs, "to tread under foot the custom of the heathen, our fathers ordained that private litanies should be held (fieri) at the beginning of January (in Kalendis), psalms sung in the churches, and at the eighth hour on the first of the month (in ipsis Kalendis) the Mass of the Circumcision, pleasing to God, should be said." It is clear from this canon that the feast was already ancient in the sixth century. In the "Codex Sacramentorum Ecclesiæ Romanæ," which Benedict XIV. attributes to St. Leo and to his predecessors, and in a Roman Calendar not later than the middle of the ninth century, the feast is named the "Octave of our Lord," and this name is used along with that of the Circumcision in the "Corpus Juris." But it is evident from the prayers, gospel, &c. appointed for this "Octave of the Lord" that the Circumcision was commemorated on that day. In the Martyrology of Usuard, the feast is mentioned by its present name. In the Roman Martyrology the double title is used, "the Circumcision of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the Octave of His Nativity."

In some ancient Missals we find two Masses appointed for January 1: a Mass of the Blessed Virgin, and another for the Circumcision of our Lord. Durandus, writing in the thirteenth century, speaks of this custom as still continuing in his time. Connected with it is a name given to the feast, or rather to the day, in an ancient Roman Calendar, viz. Natale S. Mariæ, "the feast of Holy Mary." The origin both of the name and of the custom of saying the Mass de Beata Virgine are thus explained in the Micrologus: "Lately, when we celebrated our Lord's Nativity, we could not give any special office to His Mother. Therefore not unsuitably do we venerate her more specially on the Octave of our Lord [i.e. on Jan. 1]; lest she should seem to have no share in the solemnity of her Son, though we do not doubt that in that same solemnity she deserves the chief honour after our Lord." A curious and interesting relic of this ancient usage still survives. The Mass of the Blessed Virgin, indeed, can no longer be said on that day, but there is, both in the Mass and Office of the Circumcision, a marked and repeated reference to the Blessed Virgin, which seems strange and almost inexplicable till we see how it arose.

The Circumcision used to be kept as a fast, though probably the fast was not prolonged beyond three in the afternoon. St. Augustine in his second sermon for Jan. 1, St. Peter Chrysologus, and other Fathers, inveigh against the heathen revelry on this day, connected as it was with the idolatrous worship of Janus and Strenia and with immoral excesses. This no doubt occasioned the institution of the fast. Certain Sacramentaries contain a Mass for Jan. 1 "ad prohibendum ab idolis." (Benedict XIV. "De Festis.")

CISTERCIANS. Of the ancient and illustrious order of Citeaux, the most flourishing and prolific of all the offshoots from the great Benedictine trunk, there are now but scanty traces remaining. The monastery at Citeaux itself has been turned into a Reformatory and Penitentiary, managed by secular priests, after the failure of a Socialist experiment made by the Fourierists to establish what in the jargon of the sect is called a phalanstère within those venerable walls. Sic transit gloria mundi!

St. Robert, the son of a gentleman of Champagne, devoted himself at an early age with all his heart to the service of God. He took the Benedictine habit, and studied carefully the rule of the great founder, from many things in which he found that the majority of the French monks deviated considerably. The chief points of difference seem to have regarded the use of trowsers and furred garments, eating meat, and using fat in cooking, none of which things were allowed by the rule, yet were generally practised in France. In several monasteries over which he presided St. Robert and the monks could not agree, on account of the strict observance of the rule which he desired to introduce. In 1075 he founded a monastery, consisting of a group of cells, in the forest of Molesme, near Chatillon. Here he and other fervent hermits lived many years; but his thoughts still ran on the necessity of closer conformity to the rule, and as most of his followers saw things differently,[1] he at last quitted Molesme, and, followed by twenty zealous adherents, formed a new monastery in a desert then covered with forest and thickets, at a place called Cistercium (Citeaux), five leagues from Dijon. This was in 1098, which is regarded as the date of the foundation of the order. St. Robert was not to water the shoot which he had planted, for in the following year, the monks of Molesme having applied to Rome and represented the forlorn condition in which his departure had left them, the Pope directed St. Robert to appoint his successor at Citeaux, and return to his former charge. St. Robert obeyed, and for the rest of his life remained at Molesme, where he died in 1110. Alberic, his successor at Citeaux, drew up the first code of Cistercian statutes; it was he who changed the habit from brown to white; and in his time the order took the Blessed Virgin for their special patroness, and the first Cistercian nunnery was founded. Alberic dying, in 1109, was succeeded by Stephen Harding, an Englishman from the monastery of Sherborne, a man of great energy, wisdom, and virtue, who in his twenty-five years of office governed Citeaux with so much ability and success that he is usually regarded as the second founder of the order. Stephen, who is honoured among the saints on April 17, had been prior under Alberic. In his time, and in great part by his exertions, were founded the four famous monasteries of La Ferté (1113), Pontigny (1114), Clairvaux (1115), and Morimond (1115), which maintained, after Citeaux, a kind of superiority in the order down to the time of its destruction. St. Stephen, in whom the instinct of government was strong, took care that all the new abbeys, wherever founded, should be subordinate to the mother house, and that the abbots should often confer together on common affairs; he is said to have first instituted "general chapters." He wrote the account of Cistercian observances called the "Charte de Charité," and caused the "Usages" and the "Exordium" of Citeaux to be compiled. The Usages, according to Alban Butler, "have always made the code of this order." A touching story is told about the arrival of St. Bernard at Citeaux in 1113. The sturdy English abbot had given offence at the Burgundian Court by objecting to its too frequent visits to the monastery; the monks were left in extreme poverty; sickness laid many of them prostrate; no new subjects presented themselves; and it seemed as if the order, too austere for the weakness of human nature, must speedily perish. Stephen betook himself to prayer, and soon afterwards the youthful Bernard, with some thirty of his kinsmen and friends, presented himself at the gate of Citeaux and requested admission, the attraction of the place to these high-minded men having been that very austerity which appalled souls less firm. The accession of such a novice was in itself an invigoration of the order; and the abbot, who soon discovered his merit, sent Bernard two years later, at the head of a colony of twelve monks, to found a new monastery at Clairvaux. By the middle of the twelfth century there were five hundred abbeys of the filiation of Citeaux; soon after 1200 the number had increased to eighteen hundred. In England the order soon took deep root; the first abbey founded here seems to have been that of Furness in Lancashire, which the united exertions of Stephen of Blois and the abbot his namesake erected in 1127. Several military orders—e.g. those of Calatrava, Alcantara, and Avis—were subject to the jurisdiction of the abbot of Citeaux. For two hundred years, says Alban Butler, the order admitted no relaxation of its observances. The rule of St. Benedict was followed in all its rigour; there was little sleep to be had, much hard labour to be done; fasting was observed from Sept. 14 to Easter; meat, fish, eggs, and grease were never touched, and even milk but rarely. Their churches, instead of being profusely adorned with sculpture and painting according to the fashion of the times, were distinguished by a bare simplicity, as may be seen at Pontigny to this day.

In the fourteenth century the prevalence of wars in Europe caused many abbeys to be disturbed, plundered, and impoverished. Discipline suffered, for under such circumstances the rule could not possibly be observed. Long controversies arose in the order as to the lawfulness or the expediency of dispensing with the rule, especially as to eating meat. The Papal decrees called the Clementine (1265) and the Benedictine (1333), while changing several matters of jurisdiction confirmed the observances, which certain abbots had even then begun to infringe. But the tendency to relaxation gradually became too strong to be resisted, and in 1475, a brief of Sixtus IV. authorised the general chapter and the abbot of Citeaux to permit to any monks who applied for it, the use of meat. The variety of practice which ensued was so embarrassing, that in 1485 the general chapter decreed that meat should be used in all the convents on three days in the week. Meanwhile a counter-current of austerity exhibited itself in many places, and a reformation, reviving the primitive Cistercian rigour, was introduced by Martin de Vargas in Spain (1430), and spread towards the end of the same century through the provinces of Tuscany and Lombardy. In later times there were three or four celebrated reforms of this order: on one of which—instituted at La Trappe by the Abbé de Rancé—see the article TRAPPISTS. The reformed congregation of Feuillans was founded in 1577 by Dom Jean de la Barrière; that at Sept Fonds, in the following century, by the abbot Eustache de Beaufort. The convents generally, including those of the English province, followed what was called the "common observance" according to the dispense of Sixtus IV.

At the Dissolution there were upwards of a hundred Cistercian houses in England; the names are given below.[1] Unlike the Friars, who planted themselves in all the large towns, the Cistercians, whose original aim was personal sanctification in solitude through prayer and penance, usually built their houses by preference in lonely valleys and sequestered nooks.

The French Revolution swept away their foundations in most countries of Europe, but several Cistercian convents still remain in Austria, Belgium, and Poland. In England they have one house, that of Mount St. Bernard's in Charnwood Forest, Leicestershire, founded with the liberal aid of the late Mr. Ambrose Delisle, in 1844. In Ireland there are two Cistercian abbeys, both of recent foundation, and both, it is believed, in a highly flourishing condition — that of Mount Melleray, in the Co. Waterford, and that at Roscrea.

CIVIL LAW. The law of Rome, beginning with the twelve tables, and ending with the Code and Pandects of Justinian, is so called. Immense powers of mind were employed during many centuries in harmonising, rationalising, and completely adapting to the wants of social life, the laws of Rome. On this see Savigny, Walter, Phillips, &c. After the inroad of the Lombards into Italy, the increase of anarchy and barbarism in every part of Europe caused the authority of the civil law to decline. The customs of the Franks, the Burgundians, the Angles, or the Visigoths, were of more account with the conquerors of Europe than all the wisdom of Ulpian or Papinian; and out of these customs the lex loci, or common law of each country, gradually arose. In the twelfth century, society being now in a more stable condition, the study of the civil law was revived at the University of Bologna, whence it spread to other countries. The rulers of the Church have observed no uniform attitude towards this study, because, as circumstances varied, so did the duty of the Church vary. St. Chrysostom, when he was converted to God, abandoned for ever, as he tells us, the study of the Roman law. Yet St. Gregory the Great often made use of the imperial laws himself, and advised the bishops of several countries, when these laws did not conflict with the canons, to promote their observance. After the twelfth century the civil and canon law [CANON LAW] were studied pari passu; the Roman Pontiff admitted that "the laws were a support to the canons;" and Honorius III., early in the thirteenth century, ordered that there should always be a school of both laws, "utriusque juris," in the Roman Curia. On the other hand, the German and imperial legists, who were possessed by the idea of "the Holy Roman Empire" and all that the phrase involved, strove to give to the civil a universality equal to that of the canon law, and to make all national codes give way to it. As mankind, religiously, were gathered into one Church, so, civilly, according to these dreamers, they were or ought to be members of but one State, the Empire, the head of which delegated more or less of his power to the kings and princes of other lands. With such theories of the civilians the Church could have nothing to do; and there was some danger, if she should show unmixed favour and countenance to the study of the civil law, lest the Governments outside the Empire, which maintained their absolute independence, and did not mean to supersede their own codes by the Roman Law, should take umbrage at her procedure, and curtail her liberty of action within their borders. Hence we meet with various Papal briefs and orders tending to discourage or at least to place under restraint, the study of the civil law. Pope Innocent IV., in a letter addressed to the bishops of all European countries except Germany, deplored the extravagant addiction of the clergy to this study ("tota clericorum multitudo ad audiendas seculares leges concurrit"), and forbade the civil law to be publicly taught, unless by the desire of the local sovereign. Nevertheless, the intrinsic excellences of the Roman Law are so great that recourse to it could but be moderated; the Pontiffs neither could nor wished to supersede it by any other. In all countries it was introduced along with the canon law into Church courts; and the rule which the canonists still observe[1] gradually arose—namely, that where the canons are silent or obscure, if the matter under adjudication be of a spiritual nature, reference shall be made to the writings of the Fathers; but if it be of a secular nature, to the civil law. In England a line of great lawyers, commencing with Glanvile in the twelfth century, and including the names of Britton, Bracton, and Littleton, laboured to refine and harmonise the common law; and no other code was recognised in the King's courts. But in the Church courts the civil law, as already stated, was in use; and it was carefully studied, and degrees were given in it, at the two Universities.[2] At the Reformation the study of the canon law was abandoned at Oxford; the law of the land did not even yet appear to have been rationalised sufficiently for the purposes of academical study; and hence to this day the only legal degrees conferred by Oxford are in civil law (Bachelor and Doctor), a branch of learning the importance of which in legal education is, indeed, now fully recognised amongst us, but of which the actual authority and practical application are, we suppose, more limited in England than in any other European country.

CLASSICS. The word is used here to denote the great writers of Greece and Rome whose works have survived, and it is the object of this article to sketch the opinion held by Catholics concerning them as a means of Christian education.

I. The Patristic Period.—In the early days of the Church the pagan literature of Greece and Rome was, apart from the Bible, the one and only means of liberal instruction, and to renounce the study of the classics would have meant renouncing all culture and forfeiting every natural means of influencing the educated world.

[1] Soglia, lib. i. cap. 3.

[2] Among those present at the Convocation which condemned Wyclif, in 1382, were "doctores legum" (or "utriusque juris," or "juris can nici et civilis"), a bishop "vocatus incipiendum in jure civili," and "doctores decretorum" (or "in decretis") whose degree was in canon law alone. See Fascic. Zizan. p. 286.

Christians showed no disposition to adopt such a course. St. Paul himself quotes Menander (1 Cor. xv. 33); in the Acts of the Apostles a line from Aratus and Cleanthes is cited, as part of St. Paul's speech at Athens (Acts xvii. 28); and in the Epistle to Titus (i. 12) the evil character of the Cretans is given in the words of "their own prophet," Epimenides, or perhaps Callimachus. Irenæus, though bred a Christian, was thoroughly familiar with Homer ("Adv. Hær." ix. 4), and Tertullian ("De Idol." 10), fanatic though he was, admits that it is absolutely necessary for Christian children to attend the heathen schools of grammar. Clement of Alexandria recognised the high importance, even from a theological point of view, of a classical education. He lays down the principle ("Strom." i. 5) that philosophy is useful for piety, and adds that the ἐγκύκλια μαθήματα, i.e. liberal education, of which classical study was a chief part, were the proper introduction to philosophy. His extant works abundantly testify to his high appreciation of the classics. Origen taught the classics personally at Alexandria (Euseb. "H. E." vi. 2). He himself had acquired this literary knowledge under his father, a zealous Christian, and afterwards a martyr.

The zeal with which classical literature was studied in the Church after Constantine's time is apparent from the fact that Julian the Apostate (361–363) thought it worth while, as a means of annoying the Christians, to forbid the study of the classics in the schools of the religion which he hated. The Church was determined not to allow classical study to fall into disuse. The Christian literature, called into existence as a makeshift, was soon forgotten after freedom of instruction was restored (Socrates, "H. E." iii. 16). In the East Gregory Nazianzen ("Or." 43, i. p. 777 in the Benedictine edition) and Basil ("De Leg. Libr. Gent." ed. Bened. ii. 173), in the West Jerome ("Ep." 59[1] ad Paulin.) and Augustine ("Doctrin. Christ." ii. 29, seq.), vindicated the claims of classical learning. There is abundant evidence that these enlightened theories were carried out in practice. For example, St. Fulgentius, when a boy, by the desire of his pious mother, learnt Homer and selections from Menander by heart (Bolland. Jan. i. 33), and at an earlier date St. Augustine ("Civ. Dei" i. 3) takes for granted that boys at school learn Virgil. At the same time there were persons, some even high in authority, who showed a jealousy of classical learning, especially when cultivated by the clergy. Gregory Nazianzen, in the passage quoted above, admits that most Christians had an unjust prejudice (οἱ πολλοὶ Χριστιανῶν . . . . κακῶς ἐἰδότες) against pagan learning (τὴν ἔξωθεν παίδευσιν), and St. Gregory the Great, in a letter to Desiderius, bishop in Gaul ("Ep." lib. xi. 54), says he has heard with horror that the bishop teaches literature ("grammaticam exponere"). Clearly, the Pope's objection was not merely to a bishop's employing himself in this way. "It cannot be," he says, "that the praises of Jupiter and Christ should proceed from the same mouth. Consider yourself how grievous and criminal a thing it is for a bishop to sing what would be unfit for a religious layman."[1]

II. The Monastic Schools.—In two ways the position of learning underwent a change after the fall of the Roman empire. During the Patristic period the whole of ancient literature was comprised in the classics, whereas the monks of the great Benedictine period were able to look back on a long line of Christian Fathers, on a literature represented by such names as Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, Gregory the Great. The pagan element had vanished from the face of Europe, or, where it remained, lingered only as a remnant, not of civilisation, but of barbarism. Hence the classics were no longer the one and only means of literary cultivation outside of the Bible; there were other writers whom the educated world was content to revere. Again, education was now in the hands of the monks, and there was a natural feeling that devotion to classical studies might interfere with their religious engagements. Certainly Mr. Maitland, in his fascinating work on the "Dark Ages," has collected a number of passages from monastic writers which depreciate classical study. Thus Alcuin, when a boy, is said to have vowed that he would no longer prefer Virgil to the melody of the Psalms (Maitland's "Dark Ages," p. 181).

[1] At least Jerome does so practically. He extols the classics as models of style, and quotes Cicero with high praise, besides Persius and Lucan.

[1] See, however, Neander, Kirchengeschichte, v. p. 192, seq., who shows that there are reasons for believing that Gregory's fixed judgment on classical literature was not so adverse as might appear from the quotation in the text. The story of his having the Palatine library "burnt" is an idle legend.

About the middle of the eleventh century the rigid St. Peter Damian blames monks who "go after the common herd of grammarians" and prefer the rule of Donatus to that of St. Benedict (ib. p. 184). "It grieves me," says the author of the famous "Gemma Animæ," perhaps about 1120, "when I consider in my mind the number of persons who, having lost their senses, are not ashamed to give their utmost labour to the abominable figments of the poets and the captious arguments of the philosophers. . . . Moreover," so this charitable and enlightened author proceeds, "how is the soul profited by the strife of Hector, or the argumentation of Plato, or the poems of Virgil, or the elegies of Ovid, who now, with their like, are gnashing their teeth in the prison of the infernal Babylon under the cruel tyranny of Pluto?" (ib. 185). It is plain, however, that these very denunciations witness to the zeal for classical study in the monastic period. Long before, Origen ("In Levit." Hom. VII. tom. ii. p. 227) had compared heathen literature to the beautiful captive whom the Hebrew might espouse after her head had been shaved and her nails pared; and this allegorical fancy, as Mr. Maitland himself allows, was the standing excuse among mediæval monks for indulgence in secular literature, and he gives an extract from the letter of an abbot, written about 1150, which treats the matter in a more reasonable and manly tone. "Nor can I bear," he writes, "that that noble genius, those splendid imaginations, such great beauties both of style and language, should be lost in oblivion" (ib. p. 175). But we can learn more from inquiring what the actual curriculum of the Benedictine schools really was, and to this question Cardinal Newman has furnished a full answer: "In the monastic school the language, of course, was Latin; and in Latin literature first came Virgil; next, Lucan and Statius; Terence, Sallust, Cicero; Horace, Persius, Juvenal. . . . Thus we find that the monks of St. Alban's, near Mayence, had standing lectures in Cicero, Virgil, and other authors. In the school of Paderborn there were lectures in Horace, Virgil, Statius, and Sallust. . . . Gerbert, afterwards Sylvester the Second, after lecturing his class in logic, brought it back again to Virgil, Statius, Terence, Juvenal, Persius, Horace, and Lucan. A work is extant of St. Hildebert's, supposed to be a school exercise; it is scarcely more than a cento of Cicero, Seneca, Horace, Juvenal, Persius, Terence, and other writers. Horace he must have known by heart" (Newman's "Historical Sketches," ii. p. 460). Nor were the lessons forgotten in maturer age. "Let us turn," says Cardinal Newman, "to the familiar correspondence of some of those most famous Benedictines, and we shall see what were the pursuits of their leisure and the indulgences of their recreation. Alcuin, in his letters to his friends, quotes Virgil again and again; he also quotes Horace, Terence, Pliny. . . Lupus quotes Horace, Cicero, Suetonius, Virgil, and Martial. Gerbert quotes Virgil, Cicero, Horace, Terence, and Sallust. Petrus Cellensis quotes Horace, Seneca, and Terence. Hildebert quotes Virgil and Cicero. . . . Hincmar of Rheims quotes Horace. Paschasius Radbert's favourite authors were Cicero and Terence. Abbo of Fleury was especially familiar with Terence, Sallust, Virgil, and Horace; Peter the Venerable with Virgil and Horace. Hepidann of St. Gall took Sallust as a model of style" (ib. p. 464, seq.). In their correspondence the monks of that age were constantly begging the loan of classical manuscripts; they raise questions of grammar, and show "a loving curiosity about the niceties of language." Their ignorance of Greek was their misfortune and not their fault, for they eagerly seized the rare opportunities of learning it. Thus Theodore of Tarsus became Archbishop of Canterbury in the seventh century, and taught it to the Anglo-Saxon youth (Bede, "H. E." iv. 2), while Rabanus Maurus is said to have learned it from Theophilus of Ephesus. As to Latin style of that period, it falls far short of the strict classical standard, but "it is good Latin both in structure and in idiom. At any rate, the change is wonderful when we pass from the Benedictine centuries to the Dominican which followed" (Newman, p. 470).

III. The Period of the Mediæval Universities.—In the later middle ages, the period of the universities, 1150–1350, it seems to be admitted on all hands that classical study, though it did not wholly perish, languished and decayed. The old tradition was maintained by John of Salisbury and his disciple Peter of Blois (died about 1200). In the college of Navarre, founded at Paris in 1304, the classics, according to the testimony of Peter d'Ailly, were studied, and Gerson, educated there, shows a considerable acquaintance with the ancients. But the ruling passion was for dialectic or philosophy, not for grammar—i.e. literature. The ancients were valued for their matter, not for their style; and Aristotle, read in barbarous translations, ruled the schools. The faculty of arts was separated from that of grammar, and in 1456 the "grammarians" were excluded from the privileges of universities and the title of "regents."

Everyone knows the triumph which the scholars of the Renaissance obtained over the old Scholasticism, how the Greek Muses, driven from their ancient homes, found refuge in Italy, how the "new learning" brought new insight into antiquity, with a marvellous mastery of the Latin tongue, and how powerful it was for good and evil. All this does not concern us here, except so far as these new influences affected the Church. "In itself," says Cardinal Hergenröther, ("Kirchengeschichte," ii. p. 172), "the new tendency was not hurtful to the Church or theology, but, on the contrary, beneficial. For that reason it was encouraged by Popes, bishops, and theologians." After the strife between the Humanists and theologians had broken out, the Church maintained the classical discipline in her schools; nay, the seventh rule of the Index promulgated by Pius IV. in 1564, after prohibiting licentious books, says of classical authors, even if of immoral character, "propter sermonis elegantiam et proprietatem permittuntur, nulla tamen ratione pueris prælegendi sunt." This implies à fortiori that these writings, when free from moral stain or when objectionable passages have been removed, are a valuable instrument of education. The Jesuits in their "Ratio Studiorum" adopted this principle, and attained brilliant success as teachers of the classics. The "Delphin Classics" and the "Gradus ad Parnassum" may be mentioned among books familiar to the Protestant schoolboy thirty years ago which were due to the Society. Among works of a higher class we may mention the famous book of the Jesuit Viger, "De Præcipuis Græcæ Dictionis Idiotismis" (Paris, 1628). It appeared in numerous editions, it was perfected by the care of Dutch scholars, and the great Hermann edited it with annotations of his own. The study of the classics is still pursued at all the higher Catholic schools. In France, various provincial councils (e.g. that of Lyons in 1850) have recommended that the students for the priesthood in seminaries should read treatises of the Fathers as well as the heathen classics. The Abbé Gaume and Veuillot, then editor of the Paris "Univers," wished to exclude the study of the classics altogether. The cause of humane letters was defended by the celebrated Bishop Dupanloup; and when Veuillot, whose journal had been prohibited by the Archbishop of Paris, appealed to Rome, Pius IX., in an encyclical of 1853 to the French episcopate, expressed his wish that the youth should be trained in the knowledge of the best heathen as well as of the best Christian authors; the former, however, were to be expurgated, if necessary, for moral reasons. Some zealots, such as Father Ventura in his Lent discourses at the Tuileries for 1857, tried to maintain the war against the classics without contradicting the encyclical, but the controversy was virtually ended.[1]

CLAUSURA. [See ENCLOSURE.]

CLERGY, CLERICAL STATE, CLERIC, CLERK, &c. The clerical state is the rank or condition of those who are separated from the mass of the faithful, attached in a special manner to the divine service and made capable of administering the power of the Church.

The word is of course derived from the Greek κλῆρος, a lot, a word which frequently occurs in its literal sense in the LXX and New Testament. But how did the word lot come to denote "the clergy"? The answer to this question is very far from easy. St. Jerome's beautiful explanation, that the clergy are so called because the Lord himself is the lot, i.e. the portion, of clerics, does not seem to be borne out by the history of the word. The Pontifical, it is true, evidently alludes to this mystical signification, and no one will deny that such an application may most fitly and naturally be made; but it is quite another thing to maintain that the name was first given among Christians for the reason assigned by Jerome. The following seems to us on the whole the way in which the term "clergy" gradually assumed a technical and restricted sense. The notion of lot easily led to the sense of office allotted. Thus St. Peter says of Judas,[1] "he received the lot of this ministry" (τὸν κλῆρον τῆς διακονίας ταύτης) and Irenæus says of Pope Hyginus that he held "the ninth lot of episcopal succession from the Apostles" (ἔνατον κλῆρον); of Eleutherus that he obtained "the lot of the episcopate."[2] A little later than Irenæus—viz. in Clement of Alexandria[3] and Tertullian[4]—we meet with the word in its modern sense. The former relates of St. John, that he travelled from Ephesus through the surrounding country, "in some places to establish bishops, in others set up entire churches, in others to admit some one individual to the ranks of the clergy (κλήρῳ ἕνα γέ τινα κληρώσων) of those who were signified to him by the Spirit:" i.e. when a college of presbyters, &c., already existed. St. John admitted a fresh member. Tertullian speaks of those who are puffed up "adversus clerum"—i.e., as is clear from the context, "against the clergy." Thus the word appears to have meant (1) a lot; (2) an office allotted; (3) as early at least as the close of the second century, those who held the office, or perhaps to whom the office was allotted—viz. the clergy. It may be objected that the technical use of the word is much earlier, and that we find an example in 1 Pet. v. 3, where we read in the advice given to the "ancients," "neither as domineering over the clergy, but being made a pattern of the flock from the heart." But "dominantes in cleris" (κατακυριεύοντες τῶν κλήρων) cannot have the meaning given to it in the Douay version. This is shewn both by the connection, and by the fact that the word is in the plural. Estius calls attention to each of these points and interprets the passage as a prohibition forbidding the "ancients" to domineer over the "lots," or congregations placed under their care. The word "cleris" is parallel and equivalent to the "gregis" or "flock" which occurs in the latter half of the verse.[5]

[3] Clem. Al. De Divit. Servando, c. 42.
[4] Tertull. De Monog. c. 12.
[5] This explanation agrees on the whole with that given by Dr. Lightfoot, Commentary on Philippians. Baur (Kirchengesch. der drei ersten Jahrhunderte. p. 266) makes the word mean (1) lot or order; (2) rank or station—in 1 Pet. v. 3, "not domineering over the different ranks"; (3) the rank par excellence, i.e. the clergy.

While, however, the name is wanting in the New Testament, the thing intended by the name is there. The very fact that the epistles of St. Paul mention bishops who "are to rule the Church of God," and prelates whom the faithful are to "obey" and to whom they are to "be subject," is proof conclusive that the distinction between clergy and laity was fully recognised by the Apostles. The Church did but act in accordance with the revelation entrusted to her, when she separated the clergy from the laity by outward marks, and gave certain privileges to the former. [For the privileges, decorum, &c., see CLERK.]

CLERICI VAGANTES. Ecclesiastical law has required from the earliest times that before admission to holy orders a cleric shall possess a title—that is, a benefice sufficient for his subsistence, or else a patrimony, belonging to him in his own right, and competent to support him. But this requirement was often waived in particular cases, especially when a bishop wished to send priests to a remote and unsettled part of his diocese, or to preach to the heathen in a neighbouring country. Such priests would, in the majority of cases, obtain settled cures in the districts whither they went; but those who did not succeed in doing so had no choice but to return home and put themselves at the disposal of their bishop. Thus a class of "roving" or unattached priests was gradually formed, the members of which as a general rule could be usefully employed in supplementing the regular diocesan work. But it was inevitable that abuses should arise out of such a state of things; and to put an end to these, the Council of Trent decreed that "no one should in future be ordained who was not attached to that church or pious institution for the needs or convenience of which he was selected, so that he might discharge his functions there, and not wander about having no fixed abode."[1] (Ferraris, Clericus, Ordo, Titulus.)

CLERK. In a general sense, and when we are considering who are entitled to enjoy clerical privileges, the name of cleric or clerk is applicable to the whole body of the secular clergy, including persons in minor orders (Council of Trent, sess. xxiii. c. 6, De Ref.); also to monks and nuns, to lay institutes following a religious rule, to hermits leading their life under authority, to the Knights of Malta, &c. In the stricter sense, and when penalties are under consideration, the name is only applicable to the inferior ranks of the secular clergy, and does not include bishops, canons, or any ecclesiastical dignitary.

In the middle ages "clerk" was used loosely for "man of learning," the latter class being almost wholly comprised within the former. Thus Henry I. of England was called Beauclerk, and Chaucer writes—

"Frauncevs Petrark, the laureate poete, Highte[1] this clerk;"

and Wyclif, or some other,[2] says, "Lincolne [Robert Grossetête] and other clerkis proven," where all that is meant is "learned men."

Till recent times, secular rulers and legislators recognised the fundamental character of this distinction, as investing the Catholic clergy with certain immunities, and furnishing a sufficient ground for a separate system of ecclesiastical law, to which clerical things and persons should be subject. See PRIVILEGE, IMMUNITY.] The tribunals in which this law was administered were the forum externum of the Church, and all clerics, high and low, enjoyed the privilegium fori—that is, the right of trial according to the canon law. The various national codes having, through the constant pressure of Christianity and the action of the canon law, become in most things rational and humane, modern statesmen tend to the doctrine that all subjects of the State should be treated alike—that the law should be the same for all, and civil burdens be borne by all indiscriminately. Yet the failure to recognise a distinction of status which is real and fundamental, and rests on divine institution, can but lead, wherever found, to trouble, confusion, and the depravation of morals. If in every Catholic country having the conscription, the so-called Liberals succeeded in destroying the clerical immunity from military service, as they have done in France, a great decrease would soon thin the ranks of the clergy, accompanied by unspeakable distress and damage to Christian souls. The Church in Europe has lost the tithe, the greater portion of her property, and much of the consideration which she formerly received from society; the mixed motives which once tended to fill the ranks of the clergy no longer operate; the labourers are few, and their fair hire is withheld from them. Under such circumstances, it would be the wisdom of the Governments to smooth the way for young men to enter the clerical state, and to lessen the hardships which surround them in that state. Yet we see modern society, in too many once Catholic States, taking the opposite course; and "Liberal" statesmen legislating against the clergy as if they were some destructive anti-social caste, instead of the necessary and divinely-appointed guides by whom human beings are prepared in time to face eternity. They may succeed in nipping in the bud many vocations, but they will not succeed in making men happier and better, nor in strengthening the bases of social order, which, when religion languishes, are inevitably imperilled.

According to the canon law, the dress of the cleric must be sober in form and colour. Trade and secular business are forbidden to him. He is required to use great caution in frequenting the company of the other sex, and must not be present at public balls or masquerades. In the Decretum there is a prohibition against the attendance of clerics at stage plays of every description. But in the course of ages a contrary custom has arisen, which causes this prohibition no longer to bind under mortal sin, unless enforced by some diocesan or provincial law. Gambling and games of hazard are forbidden to clerics, though some modification has been introduced in later times, and an approved canonist quoted by Ferraris[1] says that "clerics who play seldom and moderately, for amusement's sake, are altogether excused from sin if the diocesan law does not prohibit to them games of chance, and local custom sanctions it." Clerics must not carry arms without just and necessary cause; hence shooting, unless for the sake of procuring food, would seem not to be allowed; but a moderate indulgence in hunting and fishing is not forbidden.

Till quite lately, the server at Mass used to be called the "clerk," even though a layman, by English and Irish Catholics, because he did clerk's work; just as the boys at Mass are called "acolytes," though not really so, because they do acolytes' work. (Ferraris, Clericus.)

CLERKS, REGULAR. The idea of a Regular Clerk is that of a combination of functions: that a man, while as clerk he converses with the world, should by obeying a rule of life attain to the virtues of a monk. This combination is generally ascribed to St. Augustine. The history of St. Lawrence shows us what great and saintly characters could arise among the clergy of the Roman Church in the third century; but we hear of no definite rule of life to which they all conformed. In the fourth century the life of cities, especially in the eastern portions of the empire, seems to have been so turbulent, so full of distractions and alarms, that it would have been difficult to introduce in any urban clergy a peaceful methodical plan for the distribution of their hours. About the end of the fourth age Roman Africa was very peaceful and prosperous; and when St. Augustine, in 395, was elected to the bishopric of Hippo, it seemed to him that the religious interests of the city would best be promoted if all its clergy were to live under the same roof with himself; minister, each in his own place and station, to the spiritual needs of the population; and observe a common way of life, so far as was compatible with this ministration, in what regarded prayer, diet, sleep, and other matters. The saint, with that force of character and intelligence which distinguished him in all things, soon carried out his purpose; see his "De Moribus Eccl. Cath.," and the Life by Possidius. "He harmonised," says Thomassin,[1] "in a wonderful union the functions of clerics with the virtues of monks." This is considered to have been the first original and pattern of all bodies of regular clerks and canons that have since existed in the Church [AUGUSTINIAN CANONS]. Under the former designation fall the Regular Clerks of Somascha, founded by St. Jerome Æmiliani, the Barnabites (see that article), and other communities.

CLINICAL BAPTISM. A name given in the early Church to baptism received on the bed of sickness, those who received it being called clinici or κλινικοί. The first notice which we have of baptism so conferred is contained in a letter of Pope Cornelius written about the middle of the third century to Fabius of Antioch. The subject is important from two distinct points of view, for it throws light both on the doctrine and the discipline of the early Church.

With regard to the former, the custom of conferring clinical baptism proves that baptism given, not by immersion, but by sprinkling the recipient, or by pouring water over him (by aspersion or perfusion), although unusual, was still considered valid. This validity is clearly laid down by Cyprian, in Ep. lxix., when he answers the question whether those who had not been "washed with the water of salvation, but had had it poured over them," were "Christians in the strict sense" (legitimi Christiani). He replies that we need not be concerned because the baptised person in case of sickness has been sprinkled or had water poured over him (instead of being immersed), since in any case he receives the "grace of the Lord."

However, the discipline of the Church made a difference between clinici and other Christians, and did not allow the former to be ordained, on the ground that they probably had received the sacrament rather from fear than from a higher motive. In the letter already mentioned Cornelius states that it was against the law for one who had received clinical baptism to enter the ranks of the clergy.[1] The Council of Neocæsarea (can. 12), in the early part of the fourth century, renews this ancient prohibition, making, however, an exception in the case of clinici who signalised themselves by zeal, and for times when there was great want of clergy. This canon was received into the "Corpus Juris," c. 1. Dist. 57.[2]

CLOISTER. An enclosed space, usually square, surrounded by covered passages, which have continuous walls on the outer side, and rows of pillars on the inner side facing the square, in connection with monastic, cathedral, or collegiate buildings. We do not possess any in this country of earlier date than the thirteenth century. They doubtless first appeared in monasteries, furnishing monks with the means of exercise under cover in wet weather. The interior space was sometimes used for a cemetery, as at Salisbury. Schools are said to have been held in them, though they can scarcely, at any rate in this climate, have been very suitable for the purpose. In no country in Europe have so many fine specimens of Gothic cloisters been preserved as in England. That at Gloucester is of remarkable beauty; the cathedrals of Durham, York, and Lincoln, and New College, Oxford, furnish fine examples.

CLUNY, CONGREGATION OF. This branch of the Benedictine order attained in the middle ages to a pitch of greatness and influence which entitle it to a separate article. It was founded by Berno, abbot of Gigny, in 912, with the assistance of William Duke of Aquitaine, who endowed the new monastery with his whole domains, forests, meadows, vineyards, &c., at Cluny, fifteen miles from Macon-sur-Saône. A succession of great and saintly abbots—Odo, Aymard, St. Mayeul, St. Odilo, and St. Hugh—procured for the Abbey of Cluny a world-wide reputation, great wealth and political influence, and a filiation of many hundred monasteries. The bond of dependence was strictly maintained in all the houses founded from or connected with Cluny; in nearly every instance they were governed by priors, not abbots. Urban II., the Pope who preached the first crusade, had been educated at Cluny under St. Hugh. The great Earl of Warenne, the friend and companion in arms of the Conqueror, founded the first Cluniac house in England, at Lewes, in 1077, dedicating the church in honour of St. Pancras. Under Peter the Venerable, the ninth abbot, the contemporary and friend of St. Bernard, Cluny reached its apogee. Peter drew up a reformed rule; two thousand convents recognised him as their superior; and in 1131 the Pope himself, Innocent II., came to Cluny and consecrated the new church, the master-piece of Gothic architecture and one of the wonders of the world. At the Revolution, the town of Cluny bought the church from the Republican Government, and pulled it down; nothing but the two towers and a few other fragments were left standing. Some time afterwards the people of Cluny invited Napoleon to visit their town; the emperor replied, "No, no, you are Vandals."

There were thirty-two Cluniac houses in England at the time of the suppression;[1] the list is given below.[2] Only one was an abbey—Bermondsey; the rest were priories or cells. (Hefele's art. in Wetzer and Welte; Tanner's "Notitia.")

[1] The Cluniac houses in England were originally subject to the abbot of Cluny, on which account many of them were suppressed in the fourteenth century as "alien priories." Those that remained were gradually "discharged from all manner of subjection and obedience" to the mother house. Tanner's Notitia, xv.

COAT, THE HOLY (tunica inconsutilis, der heilige Rock, la sainte Robe). This celebrated relic is in the treasury of the cathedral of Treves, and a very ancient tradition asserts it to be identical with the seamless coat which our Saviour wore at the time of his Passion. The empress Helena, having come into possession of it in the Holy Land, is said to have given it to the city of Treves, where she resided for a considerable time. The earliest written testimony to this effect is found in the Gesta Trevirorum, a chronicle of the first half of the twelfth century, where Helena is said to have presented the relic to the church during the episcopate of Agritius (314–334). Several other notices of the Holy Coat are found in documents mounting up to, or nearly to, the twelfth century. But the most remarkable and interesting piece of evidence, in support of the authenticity of the relic, is an ancient ivory belonging to the cathedral (lost for some time but recovered in 1844), on which the Empress is figured, seated at the church door, and awaiting the arrival of a procession closed by a chariot in which are two ecclesiastics guarding a chest. Above the chariot is the face of Christ, by which some relation between our Lord and the contents of the chest seems to be indicated. This ivory was examined by the Archæological Society of Frankfort in 1846, with the result of fixing its date at the end of the fourth or beginning of the fifth century.

We read of the translation of the relic from the choir to the high-altar of the cathedral in 1196. After an interval of more than three hundred years, it was exposed in 1512, and on several other occasions in the sixteenth century, for the veneration of the faithful. During the wars of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, it was deposited for safety in the castle of Ehrenbreitstein, or at Augsburg. In 1810, with the permission of Napoleon, the bishop of Treves, Mgr. Mannay, brought the sacred relic back from Augsburg to his own city; and, in spite of the confusion of the times, a multitude of pilgrims numbering over two hundred thousand visited Treves to celebrate this joyful restoration. But the most striking and successful exposition was that of 1844, when eleven bishops and more than a million of the laity flocked to Treves from all sides during the period (from August 18 to October 6) for which the Holy Coat was exhibited. Several miraculous cures were reported, and the joy and piety of the believing throng must have been a very moving sight. Certain unstable Catholics, with a secret leaning to rationalism, took offence at the proceedings, and wrote against the authenticity of the Holy Coat. Among these were Czerski, an ecclesiastic from Posen, and Ronge, a suspended priest of Breslau. A long controversy arose, in the course of which these men seceded from the Church and founded a sect which they called the "German Catholic Church." The movement made a great noise at the time, but is now seldom heard of. The well-known Catholic writer, Görres, published a pamphlet on the question, entitled "The Pilgrimage of Treves," in 1845.

At the period at which we write (Sept. 1891), another exhibition of the Holy Coat is going on at Treves, under the sanction of Mgr. Korum, the bishop. A million pilgrims have visited the relic up to the middle of this month. Several cures, apparently miraculous, are reported. [Wetzer and Welte.]

CODEX CANONUM ECCL. AFRICANÆ. This collection of canons, 138 in number, consists substantially of the disciplinary decisions of the great African council which sat at Carthage between 419 and 422. Dionysius Exiguus [see CANON LAW] admitted the greater part of them into his first collection. The synod in Trullo (691) approved and adopted these canons, with those of many other councils, as suitable for use in the East. They were first published at Paris by Justeau in 1615; Mansi included them in his collection; they have been discussed by the brothers Ballerini, De Marca, &c.

CODEX CANONUM ECCL. UNIVERSÆ. Under this title the two Justeau (1610–1661) published the canons of which the Fathers of Chalcedon made chief use (namely, those of Nicæa, Ancyra, Neo-Cæsarea, Gangra, Antioch, Laodicea, Constantinople II., and Ephesus) on the implied assumption that they intended to, and did in fact, erect these canons, along with their own twenty-nine, into a code receivable and binding throughout the Church. For such an assumption there was no foundation. The collection contains altogether 207 canons.

CŒNOBITE. St. Jerome distinguishes cœnobites from anachorites or hermits. He translates the former word by "in communi viventes." The word is derived from κοινὸς βίος, common life. The place in which they lived was called cœnobium or κοινόβιον, and the superior, κοινοβιάρχης. Cœnobites were also named συνοδῖται, which answers to the Latin conventuales. The word cœnobite is thus equivalent to our word "monk." (Kraus, "Real-Encycl.")

COGNATE; COLLATERAL. [See CONSANGUINITY.]

COLLATION TO A BENEFICE. This, as we have seen [BISHOP, II.], is a right ordinarily belonging to bishops. It may be either free and voluntary (collatio libera), or restricted to the institution of a clerk presented by a third person (collatio necessaria, non libera). Collation by lay persons is null, except in a few cases where, by a special privilege granted by the Holy See, a king or an abbess confers a particular benefice as the procurator or vicar of the Pope.

The right of conferring the higher ecclesiastical dignities is now in the greater part of Europe regulated by Concordat between the Holy See and the respective Governments. In Austria the Emperor has the right of nominating to most canonries; occasionally this right is exercised by the municipality. In France the nomination as well as collation to all benefices is usually in the hands of the archbishops and bishops; but the appointments made are subject in the case of the curés cantonaux to the approbation of the Government; which on the other hand nominates to the almonerships of public establishments, subject to episcopal approval.

"The rulers of the Church," says Soglia, "confer benefices by a triple right, plenary, ordinary, or delegated: the Pope by his plenary, the bishops by their ordinary, cardinals and others holding a Papal indult by their delegated right." (Soglia, "Instit. Jur. Can." iii. 2, 18.)

COLLATION. [See FASTING.]

COLLECT (collecta) occurs in several senses in ecclesiastical writers. (1) It signifies "collection." Thus St. Paul mentions the "collectæ quæ fiunt apud sanctos," where the Greek has λογία. (2) For the assembly of the faithful. Thus we meet with "collectam agere," "adesse ad collectam," &c. Hence (3) for the prayer said in the Mass after the Gloria and before the Epistle.[1] The name so used (collectio or collecta) is found in the Mozarabic Missal and in the old Sacramentaries. Many of the collects now said in the Mass were composed by St. Gelasius or St. Gregory.

Originally only one collect was said. Ritual writers lay it down that the number of collects must not exceed seven. They must always be unequal, the odd number, it is said, denoting unity. In the Roman Church the collect used to be followed by certain other prayers, for the Pope, Emperor, &c., which prayers were called "laudes."

Almost all the collects are addressed to the Father, and end with the words "through our Lord Jesus Christ," &c.; only a few and those of recent date are addressed to the Son; none to the Holy Ghost. "The Mass," says Cardinal Bona, "represents the oblation by which Christ offered Himself to the Father, and therefore the prayers of the liturgy are directed to the Father Himself." (Benedict XIV. "De Missa," ii. 5.)

COLLEGE. Collegia, i.e. corporations or guilds of persons united in pursuit of a common object, were common in the Roman empire from its commencement. The Government took cognisance of, and controlled them. When Christianity appeared everywhere, the churches, regarded by jurists as collegia, were held to be unlawful (collegia illicita) and to belong to them was reckoned a misdemeanour. (Smith and Cheetham.)

COLLEGIATE CHURCH. After the practice had become general for the clergy of cathedral churches to live in common, under the rule formulated by the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle (816), and with the title of canons, the churches of many large towns, besides those which were the residences of bishops, adopted a similar organisation, and were called collegiate churches. [See CANON.] Thus Darlington, to which some of the canons whom the bishop William of St. Carilef (1080–1096) replaced by monks at Durham retired, became, with Papal sanction, a collegiate church with dean and prebendaries, and flourished as such till the Reformation. At that time (1547) a great number of collegiate churches in this country were suppressed, and their revenues confiscated, with the exception of a small portion employed in founding schools, of which King Edward VI.'s School at Birmingham is an instance. Since the seventeenth century it has been invariably ruled that a collegiate church can only be erected with Papal sanction. Among the conditions for obtaining this sanction are—that the locality should be of sufficient importance; that there be a numerous and well-disposed population and a large body of clergy; that the endowment be sufficient; that the church be of suitable size and dignity; and that all things necessary for the divine worship be provided in abundance. (Ferraris, Collegium.)

COLUMBANUS, ST., RULE OF. The "Regula Monachorum" of St. Columban (†615) was printed by Goldast from a St. Gall MS. in his "Paræmetici Veteres" (Insulæ, 1604). It consists of only fourteen short chapters. Though it speaks much of the beauty of moderation and discretion, and of the preservation of a mean between excess and defect, practically it prescribes a life of extreme austerity. The keynote is obedience to the abbot (capp. 1, 2, 3, 14); when a monk acts in obedience, even if what he does is open to censure, he cannot be blamed; while, if he act on his own responsibility, though he may take the right course, his indocility deprives him of all merit. Chapter 4 prescribes perpetual silence, except so far as speech is absolutely necessary. The one meal (cap. 5) is to be taken at even; it was to consist of common vegetables, pulse, dough, and a small twice-baked loaf ("cum parvo pane paxmate"). The true "mortificatio" of a monk (cap. 14) extended to his thoughts, his words, and his movements; he should be ready always to say to his superior, even when giving contrary orders, "Not as I will, but as thou wilt."

COMB. The liturgical use of the comb is, so far as we know, mentioned once only in our present books—viz. in the Pontifical, where the rubrics for the consecration of a bishop require an "ivory comb" to be provided. But Ducange (ad voc. "Pecten") shows that its use was once far more general. "It was," he says, "counted among the sacred instruments, and was used by priests and clerics for combing their hair before they went [from the sacristy] into the church." Thus Ducange quotes a will of Count Everard, A.D. 837, leaving a comb among the other "ornaments of his chapel." So in the will of Bishop Riculfus, A.D. 915, a charter of 1231, a charter of John, bishop of Capua, A.D. 1301. Mr. Maskell ("Mon. Rit." ii. p. 256) gives other examples—e.g. from an inventory of St. Paul's, London, A.D. 1295—and he quotes a rubric from the Pontifical of Archbishop Bainbridge of York, which directs the bishop, when about to say Mass, to comb his hair after putting on his sandals, and before he assumes the amice. The combing of the bishop's hair was as much a part of the ceremonials as putting on his mitre, and was done by the deacon or subdeacon, sometimes by both. (Mabillon, "Museum Italicum," ii. p. 292.)

COMMANDMENTS OF GOD (in Hebrew of Exodus xxxiv. 28, Deut. iv. 13, x. 4, "the ten words," of which "the Decalogue," οἱ δέκα λόγοι, τὰ δεκα λογια, τα δέκα ῥήματα, is a verbal translation) were given to Moses by God on Mount Sinai. They were written by the finger of God on two tables of stone, which were placed in the Ark. Thus the commandments formed the centre and kernel of the Jewish religion. They were given more directly by God than any other part of the Jewish law, and they were placed in the most holy place, which none but the high-priest could enter, and he only once a year. The Roman Catechism (iii. 1, 1), quoting St. Augustine, points out that all the rest of the Mosaic law depends on the decalogue, while the ten commandments, in their turn, are based on two precepts —the love of God with the whole heart, and the love of our neighbour as ourselves.

Two questions about the commandments must be mentioned. the former of which concerns the binding force, the latter the division and arrangement, of the decalogue.

As to the former question, the Council of Trent defines, against antinomian heretics of ancient and modern times, that the ten commandments bind the consciences of all mankind, Christians included. "If anyone say that the ten commandments have nothing to do with Christians, let him be anathema." "If anyone say that a man, though justified and ever so perfect, is not bound to observe the commandments of God and the Church, let him be anathema."[1] The reason on which this obligation rests is manifest. God did not give a new law to Moses; He only republished a law written originally on the conscience of man, and obscured by his sinful ignorance. The ten commandments, then, did not begin to bind when proclaimed to the people of Israel, and they have not ceased to do so now that Christ has done away with the Jewish law.[2]

The second question turns on the division of the commandments, and here there are three principal views. It is well to remind the reader, first, that there are several differences in the exact words of the commandments as given in Exodus xx. and Deuteronomy v., one of which is of special moment. In Exodus, the last prohibitions run, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house: thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, nor his servant, nor his maid, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that is thy neighbour's." In Deuteronomy, the order is changed thus: "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife; and thou shalt not desire" [a different word in Hebrew from that translated "covet," though the Vulgate obliterates the distinction] "his field, or his servant, or his maid, his ox, or his ass, or anything that is thy neighbour's." We may now proceed to consider the different modes of division.

(1) Philo and Josephus, followed by Origen and other early Christians, by the Greek Church, and all Protestants except Lutherans, divide the commandments into two tables, containing each five precepts: viz. 1, on strange gods; 2, on image worship; 3, on taking God's name in vain; 4, on the Sabbath; 5, on honouring parents; 6, on murder; 7, on adultery; 8, on stealing; 9, on false witness; 10, on covetousness.

(2) The Talmud, the Targum of Jonathan, and many rabbinical commentators, make the preface, "I am the Lord thy God," &c., the first "word;" they regard the prohibition of strange gods and images as one single "word,' viz. the second; for the rest they agree with the division of Philo, &c.

(3) Augustine places in the first table three commandments, relating to God—viz. 1, on strange gods and images (so that he regards the prohibition of idols as a mere application of the principle, "Thou shalt not have strange gods before me"); 2, the name of God; 3, the Sabbath. In the second table he places seven precepts, relating to our neighbour—viz. commandment 4, on parents; 5, on murder; 6, on adultery; 7, on stealing; 8, on false witness; 9, on coveting our neighbour's wife; 10, on coveting our neighbour's goods. This division has prevailed in the Catholic Church, and has been retained by the Lutherans, except that they, following the order in Exodus, make commandment 9, on coveting our neighbour's house; 10, on coveting his wife or goods: a division to which Augustine himself in some places gives support.

What has been already said shows that ignorance alone can charge Catholics with introducing a new mode of division in order to give less prominence to the prohibition of idol-worship. The division was current long before any strife on images had arisen in the Church.

Next, the Catholics, in this division of the first and second commandments, have the whole weight of rabbinical tradition on their side.

Thirdly, the modern Catholic division is the only one consistent with the Hebrew text, as usually found in MSS. and printed editions. The text is divided into ten sections, which correspond precisely with our Catholic division. These sections are admitted to be very ancient, older even than the Masoretic text, and the Protestant scholar Kennicott found them so marked in 460 out of 694 MSS. which he collated.[1]

Lastly, the wording of the text both in Exodus and Deuteronomy strongly favours the Catholic division. The promises and threats, "I am the Lord thy

[2] Cat. Rom. iii. 1, 3. An exception must be made of that clause in the third commandment which fixes the seventh day for divine worship. As to the apparent prohibition of images, see Petav. De Incarn. xv. 6. Here it is enough to say that if, with Josephus, we hold that the commandment absolutely prohibits sculpture and painting, so that Solomon broke it when he made the twelve oxen under the brazen sea or the lions for his throne, then we must also hold that this ceremonial part of the commandment no longer binds.

[1] There is no doubt that the prohibition of polytheism and of image-worship always forms one section. In some MSS., however, of Exodus there are only nine sections in the text of the decalogue, our ninth and tenth commandments forming one section. Kennicott, says Keil, found the division wanting in 234 out of 694 MSS. which he collated, and an examination of Kennicott's Bible confirms Keil's statement. Dillmann's assertion that Kennicott found the division between the ninth and tenth commandments wanting in most of his MSS. seems to be wholly inaccurate.

God, mighty, jealous," &c., are much more suitable on the theory that the prohibition of strange gods and idols forms one commandment, while in Deuteronomy, after the prohibition of coveting our neighbour's wife, the change of the verb mentioned above seems to indicate the beginning of a new commandment; nor is there any difficulty in distinguishing carnal desire from coveting another man's goods. (The facts as here given will be found in Kalisch, Knobel, and Keil in their commentaries on Exodus. The first is a very learned Jew, the second a Rationalist, the third an orthodox Protestant. All are opposed to the Catholic mode of division. Dillmann's Commentary (1881) has also been consulted.)

COMMANDMENTS OF THE CHURCH. Parents, and other persons invested with lawful authority, have power to make rules for those placed under them, so that things lawful in themselves become unlawful by their prohibition. The Scripture teaches plainly that the Church has this power. We are to hear the Church (Matt. xviii. 17). The Holy Ghost has placed bishops to "rule the Church" (Acts xx. 28). St. Paul commanded Christians to keep the "precepts of the Apostles and the ancients" (Acts xv. 41).

The Roman Catechism makes no special enumeration of the commandments of the Church; but such an enumeration is generally found in popular Catechisms, which have followed in this respect the example set by the Catechism of Canisius. The English Catechism, like the French ones of Fleury, &c., counts six commandments of the Church. Many other Catechisms reduce them to five. In our English Catechism they are given as follows: 1, to keep the Sundays and holidays of obligation holy, by hearing Mass and resting from servile works; 2, to keep the days of fasting and abstinence appointed by the Church; 3, to go to confession at least once a year; 4, to receive the Blessed Sacrament at least once a year, and that at Easter or thereabouts; 5, to contribute to the support of our pastors; 6, not to marry within certain degrees of kindred nor to solemnise marriage at the forbidden times.

COMMEMORATIONS OF FEASTS &c. As the Church celebrates many feasts, some moveable, some fixed, it may often happen that two of them fall on the same day; or again the Church may institute the feast of a saint, just canonised, on a day already occupied by the feast of another saint. Further, as semi-doubles and all feasts of higher rank have first and second vespers, the second vespers of one feast would often have to be said at the same time as the first vespers of another. As it would be difficult to say the Mass and office of two feasts on the same day, the Church, as a rule, celebrates the greater feast, and merely commemorates the inferior one.[1]

We must begin by distinguishing special from common commemorations, the former being subdivided into partial and complete commemorations.

Partial commemorations are made when the first vespers of one feast coincide with the second vespers of another. In that case, the vespers of the feast higher in rank are said, while the other feast is commemorated by the recital of the antiphon before the Magnificat, the versicles and the prayer.

Complete commemorations are made when two feasts fall on the same day. In that case, the collects of the lesser feast are added in the Mass of the day, and on certain occasions (e.g. if a Sunday or greater feria is commemorated) the Gospel from the Mass of the day commemorated is said at the end of Mass instead of the Gospel of St. John. Moreover, the antiphons for the Benedictus and Magnificat, with the versicles in the office omitted, are added in the lauds and vespers of the office which is said. Finally, the Gospel of a Sunday or greater feria, with the homily and the lections of a simple feast containing the life of the saint (provided such lessons are "proper" and not merely taken from the common) are substituted for the ninth lection in matins. Supposing that a simple feast and a Sunday or greater feria have both to be commemorated, the ninth lection is taken from the latter in preference to the former. The life of the saint commemorated is also omitted if the matins of the office said does not end with the Te Deum.[2]

The common commemorations consist of antiphons, versicles and prayers relating to the Blessed Virgin, St. Joseph, St. Peter and St. Paul, the Patron or title of the church, and peace; such commemorations are made on semi-doubles, simples, and ferias, at the end of lauds

[1] A greater feria or octave may also have to be commemorated.

[2] Gavant. sect. iii. 11, 33, "De Commemorationibus."

and vespers, except during octaves, and except from the first Sunday of Advent till the octave of the Epiphany, and from Passion Sunday till Trinity Sunday. They are preceded on ferias by a commemoration of the Cross; while in Paschal time a special commemoration of the Cross is made, although the other commemorations are omitted.

Commemorations are made in the following order: a double is commemorated first, then a Sunday, then a semi-double, an octave, a greater feria, a simple; last of all come the common commemorations.

Many of the rules on this subject, some of which are very elaborate, have been left out here for want of space. They are fully discussed by Gavantus and Meratus. We may, however, mention the general principle, that the greater the solemnity of a day or season, the more it absorbs attention and therefore tends to exclude commemorations. (See Gavantus, with Meratus' note, p. 11, sect. iii. cap. 11.)

COMMEMORATION OF THE LIVING AND OF THE DEAD IN THE MASS. [See DIPTYCHS.]

COMMENDA. It is a Low Latin word, formed from the verb commendare, signifying the custody of a church or convent in the absence of a regular incumbent. A church, &c., so treated, was said to be held in commendam. This commendation had nothing abusive in its origin, which was perfectly natural: thus when a bishop of Fundi was driven from his see by the barbarians, Pope Gregory the Great nominated him to the vacant see of Terracina, at the same time commending Fundi to his care. A Council of Merida commended to the metropolitan the churches of certain bishops who had been ordered to retire from their sees and do penance, for absenting themselves from a provincial council. In process of time the Roman See claimed the right of allowing a bishop, or other dignitary, to hold other benefices in commendam with his own preferment. For this there might often be reasonable and sufficient cause; but the practice became much too common. Matthew Paris complains (a. 1246) of this permission to a well-beneficed ecclesiastic to retain his benefices in commendam with a bishopric to which he might be appointed, as an abuse of recent origin. The Council of Constance, in its last year (1417), strove to put an end to reservations, expectatives, and commendams, but only succeeded in obtaining from the new Pope (Martin V.) a promise that all these favours should be brought under more strict control. But political reasons (e.g. the anger or good will of an emperor or king, incurred by thwarting or gratifying his wishes respecting the cumulation of benefices on some favourite churchman) made, or seemed to make, the complete abolition of the practice impossible. Even the Council of Trent, honestly zealous as it was for reform, ventured no more than to express its confidence that "the Roman Pontiff in his piety and prudence would, so far as he saw the times could bear it, set over monasteries at present held in commendam [by seculars] monastic persons belonging to the respective orders, capable of representing and ruling the communities."[1]

Since the destruction of Church property which recent times have witnessed, the practice of commendation has greatly dwindled, if not wholly ceased, throughout Europe.

COMMENDATION OF THE SOUL (Ordo commendationis animæ). A form of prayer for the dying contained in the Roman Ritual. The practice of bringing the priest to the bed of dying persons is coeval with the Church itself, and Amalarius tells us that several of the ancient Antiphonaries contained prayers for the dying. Parts at least of the present form are very ancient. The words "Subvenite," &c., "Come to his help, all ye saints of God; meet him, all ye angels of God," &c., occur in the Antiphonary of St. Gregory the Great; the beautiful address, "Go forth, O Christian soul," &c., is found in a letter of St. Peter Damian, written to a friend of his who was near death.

COMMENDATORY LETTERS (συστατικαὶ ἐπιστολαί, 2 Cor. iii. 1). The Christians of Ephesus, when Apollo the newly converted Jew wished to pass into Achaia, wrote to their fellow-believers at Corinth, that they should receive him (Acts xviii. 17). While the general society of the empire was still heathen, the bond between believers was close, and the distinction between Christians and non-Christians had to be firmly and sharply drawn. Commendatory letters —"letters of introduction" as we should now say—were required for everyone who travelled to a foreign country, if he wished to receive hospitality there, and to be admitted to communion. They were given by the bishop. For a long time after the conversion of Constantine the prevalence of Arianism and other heresies made it necessary still to adhere to the practice, lest those should be unawares admitted to communion whom St. John had warned Christians not so much as to bid God-speed to (2 John i. 10). It is the crowning argument of St. Austin against the Donatists, that "their letters would not be received in any churches but their own." The Councils of Elvira, Chalcedon, and Arles framed regulations about these letters, on which so much importance came to be laid that no one, whether clerk or layman, was received in any city who came unprovided with them. They were also called canonicæ, and communicatoriæ. The ἐπιστολαὶ εἰρηνικαὶ recommended the bearer specially for alms. The ἀπολυτικαὶ (dimissoriæ), first mentioned in the Council in Trullo (691), referred to a permanent settlement of the bearer in the country visited; the συστατικαὶ to a temporary sojourn. Commendatory letters are still given to a cleric passing from one diocese to another. They testify not only to his lawful ordination and freedom from canonical faults, but also to his character and ability. (Smith and Cheetham, art. by Prof. Plumptre.)

COMMISSARY. An ecclesiastic who, by delegation from the bishop, exercises a portion of the episcopal jurisdiction in a particular part of the diocese, especially with reference to licences, institutions, the examination of witnesses, &c.

COMMON. [See BREVIARY, MISSAL.]

COMMON LIFE, CLERKS AND BROTHERS OF THE. A holy deacon of Deventer in the Netherlands, Gerhard Groot (†1384), was the founder of this remarkable institute. He had sat at the feet of Ruysbroek, one of the most eminent mystics of that age, and had been deeply impressed by the spectacle of love, peace, and joyful co-operation presented by the Augustinian brotherhood which he directed. Not long before, Ruysbroek had obtained a similar influence over the celebrated Tauler. Gerhard applied his fortune to the work of establishing and endowing a building to receive clerics, and also laymen, who, without taking perpetual vows, were desirous of leading an austere Christian life in common. Great preachers, besides Gerhard himself, came forth from this institute; among them was Thomas à Kempis, or of Kempen (†1471), supposed by many to be the author of the "Imitatio Christi." In the schools of Deventer was also trained Nicholas of Cusa, afterwards Cardinal, the most learned theologian at the Council of Basle, author of "Concordantia Catholica" and many other works. Gerhard's chief convent was at Windesheim; whence some of the canons were invited into France at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and established at Château Laudon. The order spread far and wide in the Netherlands, and was not unknown in Germany. Houses of nuns were aggregated to the institute, which is represented by celebrated monasteries in Belgium even at the present day. (Hélyot, vol. iv.; Möhler, "Kirchengesch.")

COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM (also communio idiomatum—and in the Greek Fathers ἀντίδοσις). The appropriation of divine attributes to Christ as man, and of human qualities to Christ as God, because one and the same Person is at once God and man. Thus we may say "God died," "Mary is the Mother of God," though it was as man that Christ died and had a mother; or again, "The man Christ Jesus is the Creator of the world." This usage is consonant with Scripture, which speaks of the Lord of glory as being crucified; of the Son of God as being delivered for us, &c.; and with the definition of the Council of Ephesus, that Mary is the Mother of God. The reason on which the usage rests is that "the man Christ" implies, not only human nature, but also the divine Person united with it; "God," when we think of God the Son incarnate, implies, not only the divine Person, but also the human nature, which he made proper (ἴδιον, hence ἰδίωμα) to himself. Observe, however, that we cannot say "the Divinity suffered," "the Manhood is eternal," &c. (See Petavius, "De Incarn." iv. 15.)

COMMUNION. That the body, soul and divinity of Christ are given in the Communion, and that Christ is received whole and entire under either kind—i.e. under the form of bread alone, or wine alone—is an article of the Catholic faith, explained and proved under the article Eucharist. In this place we shall only treat of the rite according to which Communion is given. At every Mass the celebrant is bound to communicate, because his communion is necessary for the completion of the sacrifice. [See EUCHARIST, II.] In the Roman rite, the priest, after the words "Domine, non sum dignus," bowing low, but still standing, receives the body of Christ, saying "Corpus Domini nostri," &c., "May the body of our Lord Jesus Christ preserve my soul unto everlasting life." Then, having collected any particles of the Blessed Sacrament which may remain on the corporal or paten, He puts them into the chalice and takes the precious blood with the words, "May the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ," &c. Afterwards, if any of the people desire to communicate, the clerk says the Confiteor,[1] the priest pronounces a form of absolution, holds the Blessed Sacrament before the people, saying, "Behold the Lamb of God," &c., and finally gives them communion under the form of bread, using the words "May the body of our Lord Jesus Christ," &c. The clergy, servers, &c., usually communicate on the altar-steps; the people at the altar-rails, on which a white cloth is placed for the communicants to hold up near the face and so to prevent any particle from falling to the ground. In some churches a small tray, carried by the clerk from one communicant to another, is substituted for the white cloth —(this is in reality a return to the more ancient custom: Benedict XIV. "De Miss." iii. 22, 3). Communion is given to all who are sufficiently old to understand the nature of the Sacrament; and, although the communion of the people is in no way essential, either to the integrity or lawfulness of the sacrifice, still the Council of Trent (Sess. xxii. cap. 6) desires that the faithful should communicate at every Mass. Of course this desire implies as a condition that the faithful should be fervent enough to communicate often with advantage. Communion may be given on all days of the year, except Good Friday—(the ancient usage permitted the faithful to communicate even on Good Friday: Benedict XIV. "De Fest." i. 339)—when it cannot be given except in dangerous sickness: and at any hour of the day: not, however, at night.[2] Communion may be given out of Mass, by the priest, wearing a surplice and stole of the colour of the day (a red stole is used in the Ambrosian rite), and with almost the same form of words which is used in giving Communion during Mass, except that he adds the antiphon "O sacred banquet, in which Christ is taken," and concludes by blessing the people. This blessing is omitted if the priest gives Communion before Mass in black vestments.

We may now go on to trace the history of the administration of Communion. The essential points have remained unchanged from the time of the Apostles; still several striking changes have undoubtedly been made.

(1) The ordinary minister of the Sacrament is the priest, nor can a mere deacon, according to the present discipline, give communion without grave necessity.[1] In early times, leave to administer this Sacrament was given to deacons much more freely. Justin ("Apol." i. 65) speaks of them as distributing the consecrated bread and wine. A little later, Cyprian ("De Laps." 25) and the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 12) describe the celebrant as administering the body of Christ, while the deacons gave the chalice. The Council of Nicæa, canon 18, forbids deacons to give Communion to the priests—who, according to the wont of that time, joined with the bishop in celebrating Mass—or to receive Communion themselves before a bishop who might be assisting at the sacrifice.[2] In times of persecution, the faithful took the Blessed Sacrament away with them, so that even women gave themselves Communion at home.[3] Ordinarily, the deacons conveyed the Holy Communion to the sick, but sometimes even laymen did so.[4] Pius V., in modern times, is said to have allowed Mary Queen of Scots to receive Communion from her own hands in prison.[5] By the present law of the Church, the parish priest is bound to give his parishioners the opportunity of communicating, and no other priest can lawfully give Communion without his consent, except in case of necessity. In England, where there are no parishes, the leave of the priest in charge of the mission is required in order to give Communion.

a state of grace, and fasting, and who are sufficiently instructed, may receive communion. In ancient times all who assisted at Mass were obliged to communicate, and it was only the highest class of penitents who did not come under this rule.[1] However, in Chrysostom's time the charity of Christians had already grown cold, and many heard Mass without communicating. Afterwards, the faithful were only required to communicate three times in the year; and finally the Fourth Lateran Council introduced the present rule of communicating once at least in the year, and that about Easter time. Further, it is to this day the custom in the East to communicate infants just after baptism, and this use, Fleury says, continued in the West till the opening of the ninth [2] century, while even in the thirteenth Communion was given to children in danger of death. The Council of Trent (Sess. xxi. cap. 4, De Commun.) declares that children who have not come to the use of reason need not receive Communion. At present, children usually make their first Communion between ten and twelve years of age. Very often this first Communion is accompanied with the renewal of baptismal vows: the children hold lighted candles in their hands, and an address is made to them by their pastor, but none of these observances are prescribed by the Church.

(3) The church was the place of administration, although in sickness and, as we have seen, in times of persecution Communion was given in private houses. Usually, the priests and deacons communicated at the altar, the rest of the clergy in the choir, the laity outside the choir. But in the East the Emperor by ancient privilege, when he made his offering, approached and remained at the altar [3]; while in some parts of Gaul the laity generally did the same.[4]

(4) The time for Communion was usually early in the morning, and it was always, in virtue of an Apostolic tradition, received fasting. The one and only exception was the practice in the African Church of celebrating Mass and giving Communion on the evening of Maundy Thursday [see AGAPE]. Natural reverence forbade Christians to receive the body of Christ after common food.

(5) The ceremonies in the administration have varied considerably and still are very different in different rites. At the cry "Holy things to the holy," Christians drew near with bent body but still standing, and received the Holy Sacrament in the hollow of the right hand, supporting it with the left.[1] When the administrant said, "The body, the blood of Christ," the communicant answered "Amen."[2] The longer form, now employed, viz. "The body of our Lord Jesus Christ, preserve thy soul unto everlasting life," came into use in the time of Gregory the Great, though even after this date the form of words was by no means uniform throughout the West. Under Pope Agapetus († 536) the custom began of placing the Blessed Sacrament in the mouth: a council of Rouen, assigned by Mansi to the middle of the seventh century, forbids it to be given in any other way.[3] Benedict XIV.[4] mentions the fact that the Popes in solemn Mass used to communicate sitting on their throne and facing the people. At present, the Pope, on these occasions, communicates standing at his throne profoundly inclined; but Benedict XIV. does not say when this change in the Papal rite was made.

(6) We now come to the most important of all changes in the discipline of the Church on this matter. Down to the middle ages, the faithful throughout the whole Church usually received the Eucharist under both kinds. That the celebrating priest should consecrate and receive under both kinds is of divine institution and therefore unalterable [EUCHARIST, II.]. But writers of the eleventh and following centuries notice the custom springing up in the Latin Church, of giving the Eucharist to all communicants except the celebrant under the form of bread alone, partly to counteract the heretical error that Christ is not received whole and entire under either kind, partly to prevent the spilling of the Precious Blood. St. Thomas [5] († 1274) says that in his day Communion under one kind prevailed "in some churches." The Council of Constance, to meet the errors of Hus and Jerome of Prague made this custom of universal obligation in the West [see HUSSITES]; this decree was renewed by the Council of Basle against the Taborites and Calistines, and by that of Trent against the Lutherans and Calvinists. Exceptions have been made by special privilege. Thus, Clement VI. gave the kings of France leave to communicate under both kinds. In solemn Mass celebrated by the Pope, the deacon and subdeacon receive the Precious Blood, and so even in the last century the deacon and subdeacon used to on Sundays and solemn feasts in the church of St. Denis near Paris, and in the church of Clugny.[1]

We take for granted here that Christ is given whole and entire under either kind [see EUCHARIST]; but it is often alleged that in any case the Church has altered the custom of communicating under both kinds which was imposed by our Lord. To this we reply with the Council of Trent that there is no divine precept binding anyone, except the celebrant, to receive both species. Communion under one or both kinds is a matter of discipline, which the Church may alter as she sees fit. This Catholic truth is indicated in Scripture and fully certified by tradition. It is indicated in Scripture, for our Lord says, on the one hand, "Unless ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye will not have life in you;" "He who eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life;" but also, on the other hand, "If anyone eat of this bread he shall live for ever;" "The bread, which I shall give, is my flesh for the life of the world," "He who eateth this bread, will live for ever." It is fully certified by tradition, because the Church, from the beginning, has permitted both modes of communicating. Children received Communion under the form of wine alone;[2] the sick, and the faithful generally who communicated at home, under the form of bread alone.[3] True, Popes Leo and Gelasius emphatically condemned persons who abstained from the chalice, but this because they did so on private authority and in consequence of the Manichean error, which made them look on wine as evil. Moreover, the present use of the Greek and Oriental Churches makes it as clear as day that they do not consider it a matter of necessity to give Communion under both kinds, though it is their usual practice to do so. Thus the Church has ever faithfully maintained the same principles on this matter; her discipline has, indeed, changed from time to time, but never in any essential particular; while, on the contrary, those who charge her with innovation are themselves convicted of introducing a new principle, directly opposed to the unanimous teaching of antiquity. (In the works of Bossuet, there is a short but masterly treatise on Communion under one kind. On the whole subject of Communion much interesting matter will be found in Benedict XIV. "De Missa"; Denzinger, "Ritus Orientalium"; Chardon, "Histoire des Sacrements," &c.)

COMMUNION (liturgical term). The antiphon which the priest says after the ablutions, at the Epistle side of the altar. Formerly, it used to be sung, while the people communicated: hence the name. The "Communion" is mentioned in the Roman Ordines. Cardinal Thomasius quotes an example of a "Communion Psalm," which was sung in alternate verses, till the Pontiff, the people having communicated, gave the choir a sign to end with the "Gloria Patri," after which the antiphon was repeated.

COMMUNION OF SAINTS is mentioned in the ninth article of the Apostles' Creed, where it is added, according to the Roman Catechism, as an explanation of the foregoing words, "I believe in the holy Catholic Church." The communion of saints consists in the union which binds together the members of the Church on earth, and connects the Church on earth with the Church suffering in Purgatory and triumphant in heaven.

(1) The faithful on earth have communion with each other because they partake of the same sacraments, are under one head, and assist each other by their prayers and good works. Even the personal merits of a just man profit his brethren, because the greater his goodness, the greater the efficacy of his prayer for others, the more fitting it is that, as he does God's will, so God should deign to do his by increasing the graces or converting the souls of those for whom he prays.

Catholic commentators understand St. Paul to refer to this communion in good works when he encourages the Corinthians to help their needy brethren at Jerusalem. "Let your abundance," he says (2 Cor. viii. 14), "supply their want, that their abundance also may be the filling up of your want"—i.e. that you may share in their spiritual, as they have shared in your temporal, riches.[1] Again, God spares his people for the sake of the saints among them, just as He was ready to spare Sodom had ten just men been found in it; or forgave Job's friends at the sacrifice and prayer of Job himself; or so often restrained his wrath against his people for his servant David's sake. Of course also many graces are given primarily for the edification of the Church.

CONCELEBRATION. Under the head of EUCHARIST and the subdivision Ministration, it will be found that in early days the bishop in conjunction with his presbytery celebrated Mass. Until about the beginning of the thirteenth century it was customary for several priests to unite in offering the same Mass, concelebrate, on the more solemn festivals of the year. The custom still prevails in the Oriental Churches, but the only vestige of it in the Latin Church is found in the Masses said by priests on the day of their ordination and by bishops on the day of their consecration.

CONCEPTION. [See IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.]

CONCLAVE (Lat. conclave; properly, a chamber that can be closed with one key). The term is applied both to the place where the Cardinals assemble for the election of a new Pope, and to the assembly itself. Several questions relating to the election of Popes—e.g. whether the Roman Pontiff can legally nominate his successor; who is or is not eligible; what would happen in the event of all the Cardinals dying before the election; &c.—are considered under POPE; in this article we shall treat exclusively of the mode of election, as finally settled by Gregory X. In the course of the dark ages the secular rulers of Rome made various attempts to interfere with the freedom of Papal elections. A statement even appears in the Decretum of Gratian (and was used in argument by James I. and Bishop Andrewes, when attempting to justify the subjection of the Anglican Church to the crown), to the effect that Pope Hadrian granted to Charlemagne the right of electing the Pope and regulating the Apostolic See. But this canon was shown by Bellarmin to be spurious; it was probably invented by Sigismond of Gembloux, a strong supporter of imperial pretensions, and, being found in his chronicle, imposed upon the unwary Gratian. Another canon also found in Gratian, which states that Leo VIII. granted a similar privilege to Otho I., soon after the commencement of the revived "Holy Roman Empire," at once falls to the ground when it is remembered that Leo VIII., for the unanswerable reasons given by Baronius, is not to be accounted a true Pope. In 1059 an important decree was made by Nicholas II. in a council at Rome, assigning the election of future Popes to the Cardinal Bishops, with the consent of the other Cardinals and the clergy and people of Rome, saving also the honour due to Henry, King of the Romans, and to any of his successors on the imperial throne in whose favour the Holy See should make the same reservation. This partial recognition of a right to interfere in the election proved to be fertile in antipopes and vexations of every kind; and Alexander III., having experienced what trouble an arbitrary emperor could cause, in his long struggle with Frederic Barbarossa, resolved with a wise boldness to take away from the imperial line the locus standi in Papal elections which the canon of 1059 had allowed, and to vindicate her ancient freedom for the Church. In a General Council held at the Lateran in 1179, it was decreed that the election should thenceforth rest with the Cardinals alone, and that, in order to be canonical, it must be supported by the votes of two thirds of their number. In the following century, the Lateran decree was confirmed and developed at the Council of Lyons (1274) presided over by Gregory X.; and in all its substantial features the discipline then settled is still observed.

In the election of a Pope, it is obvious that there are certain conditions the exact fulfilment of which is of the utmost consequence. These are such as the following:—that all those qualified to vote, and only those, should take part in the election; that the election should not be unnecessarily delayed; that it should not be precipitated; that the electors should be in no fear for their personal safety, which would prevent the election from being free; lastly, that they should be subjected to no external persuasion tending to make them vote, or at least come under the suspicion of voting, from motives lower than those which ought to actuate them. All these conditions, the regulations for the conclave fixed in 1274 endeavour, so far as human forethought can ensure it, to cause to be observed. After the death of a Pope the Cardinals who are absent are immediately to be summoned to the conclave by one of the secretaries of the Sacred College; the election is to begin on the tenth day after the death. In whatever city the Pope dies, there the election must be held. Within the ten days the conclave must be constructed in the Papal palace, or in some other suitable edifice. The large halls of the palace are so divided by wooden partitions as to furnish a number of sets of small apartments (two for an ordinary Cardinal, three for one of princely rank), all opening upon a corridor. Here the Cardinals must remain until they have elected a Pope. On the tenth day a solemn Mass of the Holy Ghost is said in the Vatican church, and after it the Cardinals form a procession and proceed to the conclave, taking up their respective apartments as the lot has distributed them. For the rest of that day the conclave is open; crowds of persons flock in and circulate among the apartments and corridors; and the ambassadors and delegates of foreign States, besides their personal friends, visit the Cardinals for the last time. In the evening everyone is turned out except the Cardinals and those authorised to remain with them, and the conclave is closed. This is done under the superintendence of two guardians of the conclave—one a prelate previously appointed by the Sacred College, who is called the governor; the other a lay official, designated the marshal. Each Cardinal is allowed to have two members of his household in personal attendance upon him; these are called conclavists. A number of other attendants and minor officials—a carpenter, a mason, a sacrist, a monk or friar to hear confessions, two barbers, eight or ten porters and messengers, and several others—are in the common service of the whole body of Cardinals. All the entrances to the building but one are closed: that one is in the charge of officials who are partly prelates, partly officials of the municipality, whose business it is to see that no unauthorised person shall enter, and to exercise a surveillance over the food brought for the Cardinals, lest any written communication should be conveyed to them by this channel. After three days, the supply of food sent in is restricted; if five days more elapse without an election being made, the rule used to be that the Cardinals should from that time subsist on nothing but bread, wine, and water; but this rigour has been somewhat modified by later ordinances. Morning and evening, the Cardinals meet in the chapel, and a secret scrutiny by means of voting papers is usually instituted, in order to ascertain whether any candidate has the required majority of two-thirds. A Cardinal coming from a distance can enter the conclave after the closure, but only if he claim the right of doing so within three days of his arrival in the city. Every actual Cardinal, even though he may lie under a sentence of excommunication, has the right to vote, unless he has not yet been admitted to deacon's orders. Even in this case, the right of voting has sometimes been conferred by special Papal indult. There are three valid modes of election—by scrutiny, by compromise, and by what is called quasi-inspiration [see ACCLAMATION]. Compromise is, when all the cardinals agree to entrust the election to a small committee of two or three members of the body. Scrutiny is the ordinary mode; and although, since the thirteenth century, elections have usually been made by this mode with reasonable despatch, yet in times of disturbance, the difficulty of obtaining a two-thirds majority has been known to protract the proceedings over a long period, as in the celebrated instance of the conclave of 1799, described in Consalvi's Memoirs, which lasted six months, resulting in the election of Pius VII. (Ferraris, Papa; Zoepffel, "Die Papstwahlen," Göttingen, 1871).

CONCOMITANCE. [See EUCHARIST I. δ.]

CONCORDAT (Lat. concordata, things agreed upon). A treaty between the Holy See and a secular State touching the conservation and promotion of the interests of religion in that State.

It were to be wished that Christendom did not require concordats, for a treaty between two powers implies some felt divergency of sentiment and principle, which, having already resulted in opposition and contention more or less serious, dictates to the contracting parties the necessity of coming to an understanding as to the limits beyond which neither will give way to the other. Such divergency of sentiment only arises, speaking generally, when the secular State aims at excluding the Church from its rightful share of control over human affairs—an aim which familiar experience shows to be eminently pernicious and disastrous. When Ethelberts or St. Louises rule in temporals, we do not hear of concordats with the Holy See, for such rulers desire to see religion more, not less, in the ascendant among their subjects. Nevertheless, considering the actual condition of things in Europe and America, it is generally a subject of congratulation when the Pope concludes a fresh concordat; we know that, at any rate for a time, religion and its ministers will be treated with some justice and moderation in the treaty-making State; that if the Church has been robbed there in time past, some modicum of a yearly grant will now be given by way of restitution; and that the churches and convents will be made over to her—at any rate till the next revolution.

Among the more celebrated concordats of former times are the following:—

1. That of Worms in 1122, between Calixtus II. and the Emperor Henry V., by which the abusive right of appointing bishops and abbots "by ring and crosier," long usurped by the emperors, was resigned, and only the investiture by the sceptre, in token of the grant of their temporalities, retained. On the lines of this concordat the question of investiture was settled throughout Europe in such a way as to leave intact in theory the universal pastorate of the successors of Peter, however seriously it may have been here and there compromised in practice.

2. That of Frankfort or Vienna (1446–8), called the Concordat with the German Nation, by which the Popes Eugenius IV. and Nicholas V., employing Nicholas of Cusa [BASLE, COUNCIL] and Æneas Sylvius as negotiators, agreed with the emperor Frederic III. to divide in a particular manner the patronage of ecclesiastical dignities in Germany, and as to the payment of firstfruits and other matters.

3. That of 1515, between Leo X. and Francis I., by which the latter agreed to abolish the pragmatic sanction of Charles VII. (limiting appeals to Rome, and pretending to set a general council above the Pope), and the former resigned to the crown of France the nomination to vacant bishoprics and abbeys, with the proviso that the persons named should be acceptable to the Holy See.

In later times, the concordat of 1801, between Pius VII. and the first Napoleon, restoring to the French nation the public practice of the religion of their fathers, which the detestable wickedness of the revolutionists had proscribed since 1790, is a treaty of primary importance. Under its terms the Holy See agreed to a new demarcation of the boundaries of French dioceses, reducing their number from over 100 to about 80, and declared (art. 13) that neither the reigning Pope nor his successors would molest the purchasers or grantees in the peaceable possession of Church lands alienated up to that date. On the other hand the French Government agreed to the free and public exercise of the "Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman" religion in France; consented (art. 4, 5) to the canonical institution by the Pope, under the ancient discipline, of the bishops whom the Government should nominate; promised (art. 14) a suitable annual grant for the support of the French bishops and clergy; and undertook to facilitate (art. 15) fresh endowments on the part of any French Catholics desiring to make them. These were the principal articles of the concordat signed by the Papal envoys on behalf of the Holy See. The Government of Napoleon soon afterwards added to the concordat a number of clauses called "organic articles," the tenor of which was of course highly Erastian, and by which it has been often maintained by the French and other publicists that the French clergy are bound. This, however, since the Holy See never ratified the "organic articles," is not the case.

In an interesting supplementary article in vol. xxvi. of Wetzer and Welte's Dictionary on Concordats, the texts of several modern conventions of this kind (with Russia, 1847; with the republic of Costa Rica, 1852; with Austria, 1855) is given in full.

CONCUPISCENCE. Concupiscence according to St. Thomas, $1^{a}\ 2^{æ}$, qu. 30, a.2, is the appetite which tends to the gratification of the senses ("bonum delectabile absens"). This tendency is in itself neither good nor evil, because the object may be either lawful or unlawful. The desire of eating and drinking in moderation is good: that of eating and drinking to excess is evil; but in the one case and in the other we have an instance of concupiscence. However, the word concupiscence is constantly used for that appetite which exists in fallen man and is an incentive to sin, because it seeks forbidden objects, or permissible objects in a forbidden way. St. Paul, in Rom. vii., speaks of it as "the flesh," and again as the "law of sin, that is in my members." Such concupiscence, in rebellion against reason and against the commandments of God, did not exist in Adam, till he had fallen from original justice. From him it has passed to all his descendants; it remains even in those who have been born again by baptism, so that the saints themselves have had to fight against this tendency in the sensual appetite to forbidden pleasures, without being able to eradicate it.

We now come to the difference on this matter between Catholic doctrine and the tenets of the Reformers. The latter taught that concupiscence, even if the will did not consent to harbour or encourage it, had the nature of sin. Catholic doctors on the other hand, following the principle of St. Thomas, that no action can be moral or immoral except so far as it depends on the free-will of the agent, deny that concupiscence which remains, in spite of the efforts made by the will to subdue it, is to be considered sin. It is plain that the Catholic doctrine is the only one consistent with belief in the moral freedom of man. It is, moreover, the only one consistent with experience and common sense: for who can believe that a man engaged in heroic struggle with the temptations of the flesh, is all the while offending God? The Council of Trent lays down the doctrine of the Church with great clearness, in the following words:—"This holy synod confesses that concupiscence or the fuel of sin (fomes peccati) remains in the baptised; but since it is left that they may strive against it, it cannot hurt those who give no consent, but resist manfully by the grace of Jesus Christ; nay, more, he who strives lawfully will be crowned. The holy synod declares that this concupiscence, which the Apostle sometimes calls sin (Rom. vi. 12, vii. 8), has never been understood by the Catholic Church to be so called because it is truly and properly sin in the regenerate, but because it is from sin and inclines to sin. But if any man hold a contrary opinion, let him be anathema."[1] Propositions of Baius renewed the error of the Reformers with a difference of terminology—e.g. Prop. lxxv.: "The evil motions of concupiscence have been prohibited for the state of fallen man [in the words], Thou shalt not covet. Whence, a man who feels them and does not consent, transgresses the precept, Thou shalt not covet; although the transgression is not reckoned as sin."

CONCURSUS. An examination into the qualifications of candidates for ecclesiastical benefices with cure of souls. The Council of Trent ordered[2] that a board of six examiners should be appointed every year in the diocesan synod; and that when any parish became vacant, within ten days, or such period as the bishop might appoint, candidates having been duly invited to attend, an examination should be held by any three selected by the bishop from the board above mentioned. A list of those found qualified having then been made by the examiners, it was competent for the person or persons to whom the patronage appertained to select from among these the candidate of their choice, and present him to the bishop for institution. (Art. by Permaneder in Wetzer and Welte.)

CONFERENCES OF THE CLERGY. In the ninth century when dioceses became much larger than they had been in early times, the diocesan synods were no longer sufficient for the maintenance of discipline, ecclesiastical spirit, &c., among the clergy. Accordingly in many parts of Europe—e.g. in France, Germany, Italy, and England—the clergy of each district were required to meet under the archpriest or dean, and these meetings were called "Calendars" (because held on the first of every month), also consistoria, synodi, sessiones. The clergy were summoned originally by the archpriest or archdeacon. They consulted on difficult cases of conscience and the like, but besides this they often investigated crimes which had occurred since the last meeting, and announced the penalties attached to them by the Church. These Calendars seem to have fallen out of use about the thirteenth century. The last mention of them is said to be found in the Acts of a council held at London in 1237.

St. Charles Borromeo revived these assemblies of the clergy, or rather introduced conferences in the modern sense for the discussion of questions in morals, ritual, &c., with the object of providing that the clergy engaged in the cure of souls should have the knowledge necessary for their duties. The example of St. Charles was followed very soon by councils in France, Italy, the Low Countries, &c. Such conferences again fell into disuse at the end of the last century, but have been once more revived in many countries. All the dioceses of England are now divided into districts, each with its conference, which meets at stated intervals.

[1] Concil. Trident. sess. v. De Peccat. Origin.
[2] Sess. xxiv. c. 18, De Reform.

CONFESSION, SACRAMENTAL. This consists in accusing ourselves of our sins to a priest who has received authority to give absolution. It is the pious custom of the faithful to accuse themselves of all post-baptismal sins, mortal or venial, so far as they can remember them, and the priest, if duly commissioned, has power to absolve from all. But there is an absolute obligation imposed, not only by the law of the Church, but also by divine institution, upon all Christians, of confessing all mortal sins committed after baptism, so far as the penitent is able to recall them by diligent examination of his conscience. So the Council of Trent has defined (sess. xiv. can. 7).

The proofs of this obligation from Scripture and tradition will be found below in the article on the SACRAMENT OF PENANCE. Here it suffices to say that sacramental confession must be

(1) Entire. It must include the different kinds of mortal sin committed and the number of sins under each class, so far as it can be ascertained. One mortal sin wilfully concealed vitiates the whole confession. If, however, mortal sins are omitted unintentionally and without fault, they are forgiven when absolution is pronounced; only, if they occur to the penitent's recollection afterwards, he must mention them in his next confession. Further, various causes may excuse from this completeness of enumeration. Thus in shipwreck, before a battle, when the penitent is unable to speak, or can only say very little from physical weakness, a very general confession of sin may be enough for absolution; but the confession must be completed afterwards, if the opportunity offers itself.

(2) It must be vocal, though for a grave reason the penitent may make it by presenting a written paper, or by signs.

(3) It must be accompanied by supernatural sorrow and firm purpose of amendment.

(4) It should also be humble and sincere; as short as is consistent with integrity; in language which is plain and direct, but at the same time pure and modest.

The form of confession is as follows. The penitent, kneeling at the confessor's feet, says, "Pray, Father, bless me, for I have sinned." The priest gives the blessing prescribed in the Roman Ritual, "The Lord be in thy heart and on thy lips, that thou mayest truly and humbly confess thy sins, in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." The penitent then recites the first part of the Confiteor, enumerates the sins of which he has been guilty since his last confession, and then adds, "For these and all my other sins which I cannot now remember I am heartily sorry; I purpose amendment for the future, and most humbly ask pardon of God, and penance and absolution of you, my spiritual Father."

CONFESSION (THE TOMB OF A MARTYR). The word was used from early times as equivalent to μαρτύριον, the actual tomb in which a martyr was buried. If an altar was erected over the grave, then the name "confession" was given to the tomb, the altar, and the cubiculum or subterranean chamber, in which they stood. In later times, a basilica was sometimes erected over the cubiculum or chamber beneath; the high-altar was placed over the altar on the tomb below, and so this high-altar also was called a "confession," though it was not till the middle ages that the entire building received the name of "confession." Sometimes, when the "basilica" was set up in a different place, the relics of the martyr were removed to it, and the name "confessio" was transferred to the spot in which the remains rested. In such cases, the relics were placed in a crypt under the high-altar, or else they were deposited in a hollow space under the high-altar in the church itself, this hollow space being enclosed with a grating or with perforated marble, and room left for the faithful to approach and touch the shrine with cloths (Brandea). Such an arrangement, which was possible because Mass was said at the further side of the altar, is still found in the Roman churches of St. Clement and St. George in Velabro. Lastly, the name "confession" was given to that part of an altar in which the relics are placed. Thus the Pontifical, even in its present form, speaks of "the confession, i.e. the sepulchre of the altar."

The most famous "confession" is that of St. Peter in the Vatican basilica. Anacletus is said to have constructed "the monument of the Blessed Peter" ("memoriam B. Petri"); it is mentioned by Caius,[1] a writer of the second or the beginning of the third century, while a new "confession" was set up by Constantine when he built the Vatican basilica. On this "confession" the reader may consult Card. Borgia's work "Vaticana Confessio B. Petri, chronologicis tam veterum quam recentiorum scriptorum testimoniis illustrata" (Romæ, 1776). (Kraus, "Real-Encyclopädie.")

CONFESSIONAL. The seat which the priest uses when hearing confessions. According to the Roman Ritual it ought to be placed in an open and conspicuous part of the church, and to have a grating between the priest and the penitent. "The present form of confessionals is somewhat recent in the Church, for in more ancient times people confessed in the open church (à découvert), kneeling before the priest or simply seated by his side, as is still usual among the Greeks. The division [of the confessional] into compartments does not appear to go back further than the sixteenth century and the time of St. Charles Borromeo, who left ordinances on that matter, but this arrangement did not become general till the following century." (Mgr. de Montault, "Traité pratique de la Construction, &c., des Eglises," i. p. 233.)

CONFESSOR (species of Saint). A name used from the earliest times for persons who confessed the Christian faith in times of persecution, thus exposing themselves to danger and suffering, but who did not undergo martyrdom. For a time the martyrs were the only saints who received special and public honour after death from the Church, and martyrs only (with the Blessed Virgin and the Apostles) are mentioned in the canon of the Roman Mass, though the Ambrosian canon has the names of other saints also.[2] But at the beginning of the fourth century, public honours were also given to persons of heroic sanctity even if they had not been martyred. Thus St. Antony, as St. Jerome tells us, directed that his body after death should be concealed, because he did not wish a "martyrium" erected in his honour. Hilarion kept the vigil and feast of St. Antony; he himself after death received the same honour. Thus the name "Confessor" got the technical meaning which it now has in the Missal and Breviary—i.e. it was applied to all male saints who do not fall under some special class, such as Martyr, Apostle, Evangelist. The names of confessors were added to the Martyrology after the time of Gregory the Great.[1] St. Martin was the first, or at least among the first, of the Confessors whom the Church honoured with an office and feast.[2]

In the office on Good Friday "confessor" means "singer," because in the Scriptures "confessing to God" is used for singing His praises. That "confessor" had this meaning is certain from the 6th canon of a council of Toledo which met in the year 400.[3]

CONFESSOR (in Sacrament of Penance). The priest who hears confessions. He must have received faculties from the ordinary of the place. Formerly by the canon law the faithful were bound to confess once in the year to their parish priest ("proprio sacerdoti") Afterwards, various religious orders received privileges which enabled them to hear confessions of seculars at all times; and by the present law seculars may always choose any approved priest for their confessor. (St. Liguori, "Theol. Moral." vi. 564; where, however, another interpretation of the words "proprio sacerdoti" is given.)

CONFIRMATION. A sacrament of the new law by which grace is conferred on baptised persons which strengthens them for the profession of the Christian faith. It is conferred by the bishop, who lays his hands on the recipients, making the sign of the cross with chrism on their foreheads, while he pronounces the words "I sign thee with the sign of the cross and confirm thee with the chrism of salvation, in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Besides conferring a special grace to profess the faith, it also sets a seal or character on the soul [see CHARACTER], so that this sacrament cannot be reiterated without sacrilege.

Protestants have universally denied that confirmation is a sacrament; either rejecting it altogether, or retaining a spurious imitation of it, in which young people renew and confirm the promises made for them in baptism. In opposition to this error, the Council of Trent (Sess. vii.) defines that it is a "true and proper sacrament," and we shall endeavour to establish this point from Scripture and tradition before entering upon questions of detail.

We read in Acts viii. that when Philip the Evangelist had baptised the Samaritan converts, St. Peter and St. John, going down from Jerusalem, "laid their hands upon them, and they received the Holy Ghost." Thus the gifts conveyed to the Apostles and their first converts at Pentecost were imparted by the ministry of the Church to all Christians willing to receive them. It is true that when the Apostles imposed their hands miraculous gifts often accompanied the communication of the Holy Ghost. But this was an accident, and, just as the miraculous signs promised at the end of St. Mark's gospel to those "who believe" afterwards ceased without prejudice to faith, so when miraculous signs no longer accompanied the imposition of hands, confirmation still bestowed the presence of the Holy Ghost in increased measure; it still gave that power and courage to make confession which will always be essential to the Christian calling. Hence in the Epistle to the Hebrews the "laying on of hands" is numbered among the elementary articles of the Christian religion, and placed in immediate proximity to baptism, in order to distinguish it from the "laying on of hands" in Holy Order. In allusion to the same sacrament of confirmation, the Epistle to the Hebrews, in the same context, describes Christians as "partakers of the Holy Ghost;" and, with at least a probable reference to confirmation, St. Paul tells Christians that they were "sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise."[1] Thus the miraculous gifts were only intended to make men recognise and believe in a presence of the Holy Ghost which was afterwards to be recognised by faith alone.

The Scripture is thus in perfect keeping with the Tridentine doctrine that confirmation is a "true and proper sacrament." We have the outward sign, viz. the laying on of hands; the inward grace, viz. the communication of the Holy Ghost, already given in baptism, with greater fullness; divine institution, for the Apostles could not have used an outward sign as a certain means of giving grace, unless they had received authority to do so from Christ, the author of grace; lastly, the sign and the grace which accompanied it were to continue permanently in the Church, as appears from the Epistle to the Hebrews. The earliest tradition illustrates the teaching of Scripture on this head. Thus Tertullian mentions the imposition of hands on the baptised which "called and invited the Holy Ghost."[1] Elsewhere,[2] in a remarkable passage, he places "the sealing of the soldiers on the forehead" between baptism and the Holy Eucharist, plainly indicating that he believed confirmation to be a true sacrament. Many quotations might be added from Cyprian.[3] In the earliest councils we meet with formal legislation on confirmation, but here one instance will suffice. The Council of Elvira, in 306, in canon 38, decrees that persons baptised in case of necessity by laymen are afterwards to be brought to the bishops and "perfected by the imposition of hands." Here the effect of the sacrament (which makes us perfect Christians), and its ordinary minister (viz. the bishop), are plainly expressed. Further, the fact that the Church never allowed the sacrament to be reiterated proves the ancient belief in the indelible character or mark with which confirmation stamps the soul.

We will now examine certain points with regard to this sacrament, following as our chief guide in the historical portion Chardon, in the second volume of his "Histoire de Sacrements."

(1) The ordinary minister of the sacrament is a bishop, as is defined by the Council of Trent, and this statement is grounded on Scripture, which speaks of the Apostles, but never of simple priests, as imposing their hands to give the Holy Ghost. In the West, confirmation has always been given by bishops. Permission, however, to confirm was given to some abbots—e.g. to the abbot of Monte Cassino—and there was an exception to the general rule of the West in Sardinia, where Pope Gregory I. for a time forbade, but later, to avoid greater evils, permitted, simple priests to confirm. In Chrysostom's time it was customary in the East also to reserve the administration of this sacrament to bishops. But a writer of the fourth century—the author of a commentary on St. Paul at one time attributed to St. Ambrose—remarks that "in Egypt priests confirm (consignant) in the bishop's absence." This custom must have been well established before the schism, for Photius reproached Pope Nicholas with causing the Bulgarians who had been confirmed by priests to be reconfirmed. At Florence nothing was done to alter the Greek custom of allowing priests to confirm (though the Latin usage had been imposed at Constantinople by Innocent III. and in Cyprus by Innocent IV.), and at present it continues not only among the Greeks, but also among the Oriental Christians generally.

Such are the facts, and the following are the principles held by Catholic theologians on the minister of confirmation. In ordinary cases, a bishop only can confirm, but the Pope may empower, and has repeatedly empowered, a simple priest to do so, provided at least the chrism which he uses has been consecrated by a bishop. It is commonly held that the Pope alone can give simple priests this power, so that if they attempt to confirm without permission from the Pope, or in any case without his tacit consent, the act is null.[1] Confirmation given by a bishop according to the rite of the Church is always valid, but it is unlawful unless given by the bishop of the diocese, or with his leave.

(2) There has been much dispute among theologians as to the essential matter of confirmation. Some, with the learned Jesuit Sirmond, make it consist in the mere imposition of hands, arguing that this alone is mentioned in Scripture, and appealing to the canon of Elvira, already quoted, as well as to the Council of Orange (anno 441), canon 2, which seems to deny in express terms that anointing with chrism is necessary.[2] Others, and they are much more numerous, contend that anointing with chrism is a necessary part of the sacrament. They urge that the Greeks have no special imposition of hands, apart from the unction; that St. Cyril of Jerusalem in his third "Catechesis" never mentions the imposition of hands, though this "Catechesis" is entirely occupied with confirmation; that the Greeks have always regarded the chrismation as the principal matter; that Cyprian makes the unction a matter of necessity; while it is prescribed in all Latin Sacramentaries. This latter opinion seems far the more probable. Unction is almost certainly needed for the validity of the sacrament, imposition of hands being also required, but only such imposition as is implied in the act of putting the chrism on the forehead.

(3) The present form of confirmation in the West has been already given; the Greek form is, "The seal of the gift of the Holy Spirit," and this they have employed from very ancient times. The present Latin form, on the contrary, is not older than the twelfth century. In an Ordo Romanus of the eighth century we find the form, "I confirm thee in the Name of the Father," &c.; in a Pontifical of Egbert, Archbishop of York, "Receive the sign of the holy cross with the chrism of salvation in Christ Jesus unto eternal life;" in the Sacramentary of Gelasius, "The sign (signum) of the cross with eternal life." All of these forms have been permitted, because all sufficiently indicate the grace given, and were therefore valid.

(4) All baptised persons are capable of receiving this sacrament, though to receive it with fruit they must be in a state of grace. The Greeks and Orientals give it immediately after baptism, and in the West down to the thirteenth century a child was confirmed as soon after baptism as possible. A synod of Worcester (1240) forbids parents, under pain of exclusion from church, to leave their children without confirmation more than a year. But the Roman Catechism advises that confirmation should not be given till the age of reason, when Christians have to begin their warfare with sin, and it suggests the twelfth year as a suitable time for confirmation. This sacrament is not necessary for salvation, though so great a means of grace cannot be neglected without sin.

(5) The ceremonies accompanying confirmation are these. The bishop, who wears an amice, stole and cope, of white colour, spreads his hands over those he is to confirm, praying that the Holy Ghost may descend on them; immediately after confirming them, he gives them a slight blow on the cheek, in token that they must be ready to suffer for Christ, and finally dismisses them with his blessing. Those to be confirmed are brought to the sacrament by their god-parents (specially appointed for this sacrament, each male having a god-father, and each female a god-mother), and, if old enough to do so, place their foot on the right foot of the god-parent. In ancient times a white cloth bound round the forehead after chrismation was kept on for seven days afterwards. This custom is mentioned in Egbert's Pontifical and in many other places. The ceremony of the blow on the cheek is comparatively modern. It is usual to take another Christian name at confirmation, which, however, is not used afterwards in signing the name; and the Pontifical says the "confirmandi" should be fasting.

(6) The place for giving confirmation is the church. Formerly it was sometimes given in the baptistery, but occasionally the old basilicas had a special place between the baptistery and the church called "Consignatorium"—i.e. place for giving the seal of confirmation. Such a "Consignatorium" may still be seen at Salona.

CONFITEOR. A form of prayer ("I confess to Almighty God, to blessed Mary ever Virgin," &c.) used in the sacrament of penance and on many other occasions, particularly by the priest in the Roman rite at the beginning of Mass, before he ascends the steps of the altar. This practice of making some general confession before Mass is grounded on the Jewish use of making confession before sacrifice, and is very ancient, being found in the liturgies of St. James, St. Mark, St. Chrysostom, St. Basil, &c., although (at least in the liturgies of St. James and St. Chrysostom) this confession was made by the priest while preparing for Mass, and before approaching the altar. The present form of the Confiteor came into general use during the thirteenth century. A council of Ravenna (anno 1314) mentions that a variety of forms was current, and imposes the present one. A difficulty has been raised by Protestants against confessing to the Blessed Virgin and the saints. But it is reasonable to do so, not only because we need their prayers for pardon, but also because the saints, as St. Paul tells us, will judge the world. (From Merati, "Novæ Observat. in Gavant." tom. i. p. 174.)

CONFRATERNITY. An association, generally of laymen, having some work of devotion, charity or instruction for its object, undertaken for the glory of God. The Roman jurisprudence, instinct as it was with the spirit of centralisation, looked with little favour on independent corporations; originally a Christian church was in its eyes a collegium illicitum; and in the face of this strong political sentiment it was a great thing that the Church, the diocese, and the parish, did in the course of the first four centuries succeed in establishing their right to exist, grow, and energise by their own laws, and not according to the dictation of the State. The Roman empire was broken up; its centralisation gave place to feudalism; under which local privileged corporations, circumscribed in area, but all the more intensely active within that area, tended to multiply themselves over the face of Europe. There now arose, by the side of the organisation of the parish, which on the whole had survived the storm of barbarian invasion, minor organisations, governed by by-laws and endowed with privileges, which laboured earnestly to repair the ravages and reform the confusion of the times. Hence arose confraternities; which, under the names Gildonie and Confratriæ, appear to be first mentioned in the writings of Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims in the ninth century. Hincmar laid down rules for them, prescribing to the members frequent oblations, alms, prayers, and Masses. They were to interest themselves in every religious work and ministration—in providing lights, ordering funerals, in the collection and distribution of alms, &c. If they desired to meet together, it was to be in the presence of the parish priest, who was to exhort them to concord, give them bread to eat, and after one drink dismiss them ("semel potos dimittat"). In the three succeeding centuries little is on record as to the progress of confraternities. In the thirteenth century they received a sudden and amazing development. Odo, Bishop of Paris (†1208), is recorded as having fixed the annual fête for a Confraternity of the Blessed Virgin in his diocese. In Italy the Confraternity of the Standard (del Gonfalone) was erected at Rome about 1260, and the example was so extensively followed that in a short time there was no city or town in Italy, and hardly even a parish, that was without its confraternity.

Canon law contains a great number of decisions given for the regulation of confraternities. Thus it is forbidden to erect more than one confraternity of the same kind in the same place; they may not have processions without the licence of the ordinary; nor can the members have confessors whom he has not approved. In many other ways their free action is subjected to the assent of the bishop.

The ends which confraternities propose to themselves are extremely various: they include personal sanctification by means of special religious practices and exercises, and works of charity of many kinds, for the relief of the poor and sick, the payment of the last rites to the dead, the support of orphan and abandoned children, &c., &c.

When a confraternity reaches the stage at which filiations, similar to itself, are formed in other places, and adopt its rules, it takes the name of arch-confraternity, and acquires certain particular privileges.

The most important arch-confraternities at present existing are—that of the Most Holy and Immaculate Heart of Mary for the conversion of sinners, founded in 1837 by the saintly Abbé Desgenettes, curé of Notre Dame des Victoires, Paris; that of the Scapular [see SCAPULAR]; that of St. Francis Xavier, or of the Missions, instituted to assist in the work of the propagation of the faith; and that of Christian Mothers (1859), instituted by the Abbé Theodor Ratisbonne. Confraternities of the Most Holy Rosary can only be established with the sanction of the authorities of the Dominican order. The Society of St. Vincent de Paul [see that article] is really an arch-confraternity; and the "Conferences" of which it consists are confraternities. CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIIS. [See GRACE.]

CONGREGATIONS, RELIGIOUS. A congregation is a community or order bound together by a common rule, either without vows (as the Oratorians, the Oblates of St. Charles, &c.), or without solemn vows (as the Passionists, the Redemptorists, &c.).

In France this term is extended to lay associations, whether of men or women, which, having a religious end in view, devote themselves to some work of instruction or charity. So understood, it would comprise all confraternities. In England, the use of the term is in practice more restricted, and perhaps the only lay association to which it is here applied is that of the Christian Brothers, founded by the Ven. J. B. de la Salle, which, however, since the brothers take the three vows, partakes of the monastic character. Among the more noted congregations are the following:—

1. The Oratorians of St. Philip Neri, a congregation of secular priests founded in 1564. [See ORATORY OF ST. PHILIP.]

2. The French Oratorians, founded by Cardinal de Bérulle in 1611. [See ORATORY, THE FRENCH.]

3. The Dames Anglaises, founded by the Countess Luigia Torelli in 1530. [See INSTITUTE OF THE B. V. M.]

4. The "Fathers of the Mission," founded by St. Vincent of Paul in 1624; they are usually called Lazarists, q.v.

5. The Oblates of St. Charles, founded by St. Charles Borromeo. [See OBLATES.]

6. The Passionists, founded in 1720 by St. Paul of the Cross. [See PASSIONISTS.]

7. The Redemptorists, founded by St. Alphonsus Liguori. [See REDEMPTORISTS.]

8. The Marists, founded by some priests of Lyons in 1836. [See MARISTS.]

9. The Brothers of the Christian Schools, founded in 1681 by the Blessed J. B. de la Salle. [See CHRISTIAN BROTHERS.]

Another kind of religious congregation is a group of monasteries belonging to some great order, which agree together to practise the rule more strictly in their respective houses, and to unite themselves together by closer ties of government and discipline. Such was the great congregation of Cluny [CLUNY], that of St. Maur [BENEDICTINES], and that of La Trappe [CISTERCIANS. TRAPPISTS].

CONGREGATIONS, ROMAN. From the earliest times the chair of Peter has been resorted to by Christians who, being in doubt on some matter of religion, desired an authoritative solution of that doubt. In later times the number of converted nations and tribes having on the whole, in spite of the losses of the sixteenth century, been much increased, and the means of communication extended—the amount of business of all kinds which the divinely appointed centrality of the Holy See brings upon it has become far too great to be dealt with except by means of an organisation, planned and framed with consummate prudence and skill, which permits the Pope to use the eyes, ears, and judgments of a great number of trained and competent assistants, while retaining that initiative and that complete cognisance in every question, of which he cannot divest himself. This organisation consists in the main of the congregations into which the Cardinals are distributed. The decisions of these congregations, when duly authenticated, are final in any case for the individual, and must be taken as the decisions of the Pope himself. If, however, they pass beyond interpretation, and grant or forbid anything beyond what the words of the law warrant, they have not the force of a general law unless they are issued by the special mandate of the Pope.

According to the enumeration of Ferraris, the Roman congregations are the following:—

1. The Congregation of the Consistory (consistorialis). [See CONSISTORY.] Its duty is to prepare the business (chiefly relating to the erection, removal, and discontinuance of churches, and to the preconisation or translation of bishops) which is to be brought before the Consistory.

2. The Congregation of the Holy Office of the Inquisition. [See INQUISITION.]

3. That of the Index (Indicis librorum prohibitorum). This congregation, established by St. Pius V., consists of a competent number of Cardinals, with a secretary belonging to the Dominican order, and a number of eminent theologians as Consultors. [See the article INDEX, &c.]

4. The Congregation of Rites (sacrorum Rituum) was instituted by Sixtus V. towards the end of the sixteenth century. The Council of Trent (sess. XXV.) ordered that the bishops and metropolitans should watch with anxious care all that was done respecting the invocation of saints, and the use of images and relics, and sanction no novelty without consulting the Roman Pontiff. Moreover it defined, with especial reference to the Mass, that the Church has instituted certain rites and ceremonies, "such as mystical benedictions, lights, incense, vestments, and many other things of the like nature, in accordance with Apostolical discipline and tradition, so that both the majesty of so great a sacrifice might be recommended, and the minds of the faithful aroused by these visible signs of religion and piety to the contemplation of those deep and high things which are hidden in this sacrifice."[1] The object of the congregation is to promote a general uniformity (which is consistent, however, with the permission of innumerable differences of detail, according to the customs and traditions of different nations) in the externals of divine worship, since by this uniformity the unity of faith is mirrored and more easily retained. With regard to all such matters the congregation is ordinary, and is assisted only by Consultors, among whom are the Papal Sacrist and the Master of the Sacred Palace; with regard to the beatification and canonisation of saints it is extraordinary and is assisted by a promotor fidei, three auditors of the Rota, theologians, medical men, professors, &c. [See BEATIFICATION.]

5. The Congregation of Immunities (immunitatis Ecclesiæ et controversiarum jurisdictionalium), instituted by Urban VIII. All matters connected with the right of asylum and clerical immunity come under this congregation, but this branch of its business is less important than formerly, owing to the tendency of modern civil legislation to do away with all these immunities. It is now chiefly concerned with matters relating to ecclesiastical jurisdiction, where it comes in contact with the civil power. Before the time of Sixtus V. there was a special congregation of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, but it was abolished by that Pontiff.[1]

6. The Congregation of the Fabric (reverendæ Fabricæ D. Petri), founded by Clement VIII., has under its charge everything that relates to the conservation of the Vatican basilica.

7. That of the Council (interpretum Concilii Tridentini). In its last session the Fathers of the Council of Trent expressed their confidence that the Roman Pontiff would take care, if doubts and difficulties should arise with regard to the meaning and due execution of anything contained in their decrees, that these should be solved and smoothed away by whatever means might seem to him most suitable for the purpose. Pius IV. accordingly, soon after the dispersion of the Council, instituted the above-named congregation for the purpose of interpreting such of its decrees as related to discipline; of those concerning faith he reserved the interpretation to himself and his successors.

8. The Congregation of Bishops and Regulars (episcoporum et regularium). This also was instituted by Sixtus V.; its chief business is to take cognisance of the differences that arise from time to time between bishops and the regular communities within their dioceses, in regard to exemption, visitation, and other matters.

[1] Sess. xxii. c. 5.

[1] Ranke, Hist. of the Popes, bk. iv.

9. The Congregation of Discipline (super disciplina regulari), established by Innocent XII., superintends all that relates to the interior discipline of monastic communities.

10. That of Propaganda (propagandæ fidei) will be treated in a separate article. [See PROPAGANDA.]

11. The Congregation of Indulgences (indulgentiarum et reliquiarum), established by Clement IX., superintends the examination of relics and the certification of their authenticity, as well as the grant of indulgences, any abuses connected with which it is required to check.

Two other congregations of minor importance are—that of the heads of orders, presided over by the Pope, which selects the subjects which are to be brought before the consistory; and that of prelates, attached to the Congregation of the Council by Benedict XIV., to assist them in their multifarious labours.

The Roman Pontiff sometimes constitutes a special congregation ad hoc; this was lately done by His Holiness Leo XIII., who selected cardinals from the congregations of Bishops and Regulars, and of Propaganda, and formed them into a special congregation to examine sundry points of controversy between the bishops and regular missionaries of England and Scotland. See the Constitution Romanos Pontifices of May 8, 1881. (Ferraris, Congregationes.)

CONGREGATIONS AT GENERAL COUNCILS. When a Council meets, congregations of bishops must be appointed, by or with the approval of the Pope, for drawing up rules for the orderly despatch of business, determining when and where the sessions shall be held, preparing the questions to be debated, and many other matters of the same kind. A different kind of congregation came prominently into view at the Council of Constance—that of the Nations. The Latin Church was at that time understood to be divided into four nations—the Italians, French, English, and Germans—and the vote was taken in the Council by nations, not by individuals. The bishops of each nation, therefore, formed themselves into a congregation, in order to prediscuss all questions about to come before the Council, in the light of their bearing on the interests of their respective countrymen,

CONGRUISM. [See GRACE.]

CONSANGUINITY is taken here in its widest sense, to include all that theologians mean by cognatio. Natural consanguinity (cognatio carnalis) is the bond between persons descended from the same stock. By the law of nature, marriage is prohibited—and, indeed, a true marriage is impossible—between parent and child. Many theologians consider further that the law of nature nullifies marriage between all persons related in the "direct line"—i.e. between grand-parent and grand-child—and also, in the "collateral" line, between brothers and sisters. They argue from the horror of such unions which nature itself seems to inspire.

The Levitical law forbids a man to "approach" one who is a blood relation, and specially interdicts marriage with the mother, grand-daughter, sister or half-sister and aunt.[1] Probably these prohibitions are no more than instances, meant to be extended on analogy, for the marriage of a man with his daughter is omitted; and we can scarcely suppose that this is an enormity which did not require to be considered, since it is not more unnatural than the marriage of a man with his mother, and yet that is specially forbidden. As a matter of fact, the Levitical prohibitions were extended by the Talmudists.[2]

In the Roman law the degrees of collateral relationship are calculated by summing up the number of persons in each line, omitting the person from whom they descend. Thus, brothers and sisters are akin in the second, cousins in the fourth degree. Several changes were made in the Roman prohibitions of marriage. That between cousins was not allowed in early times, though not infrequent after the second Punic war.

Such a union was prohibited by Theodosius, though his son Arcadius repealed this interdict and Justinian adhered to the more lenient view. Marriage between uncle and niece was unlawful among the Romans. Claudius, to contract a marriage of this kind, exercised strong pressure on the senate, and so got the law altered on this point; and later authorities restored this general prohibition.

In the Eastern Church, the Council in Trullo forbade marriage between cousins.

[1] The most complete list is given in Levit. xviii. 6 seq.; but see also Deut. xxvii. 22; Levit. xx. 17 seq.

[2] However, only to a very slight extent. Marriages between uncle and niece were encouraged by the rabbins. But the Karaites, the great opponents among the Jews of rabbinical tradition, objected to the marriage of cousins.

Under the Isaurian emperors, Leo and Constantinus, alliances were interdicted between persons standing in the sixth degree of consanguinity according to Roman computation—i.e. between the grandchildren of brothers and sisters. Not long afterwards the seventh degree likewise was forbidden, and so the law stands to this day among the Greeks.

In the West, the old Teutonic mode of computing collateral consanguinity obtained, according to which brothers and sisters are related in the first degree, cousins in the second, uncle and niece in the second, &c. The canon law prohibited marriage to the seventh degree of kindred, a prohibition which, though in words the same as the Greek rule, did in reality extend the prohibited degrees twice as far. In the year 1216, Innocent III., in the Fourth Lateran Council, reduced the prohibition to the fourth collateral degree. This ordinance continues in force, and hence at present a man cannot marry any woman from whom he is descended or who is descended from him, nor again anyone who is related to him collaterally (cousin, second-cousin, niece, grand-niece, &c.) as far as the fourth degree inclusive. The changes made in the church law by Protestant sects and Governments are very numerous and diverse. (See any of the ordinary treatises on Moral Theology; and for the historical facts the very learned essay of Kalisch on Matrimonial Laws in his "Commentary on Leviticus," vol. ii. p. 354 seq.)

Besides real consanguinity, the Church also recognises such relationships as are spiritual and legal (cognatio spiritualis et legalis). Spiritual consanguinity is an impediment to marriage between the god-parent and the god-child, and between the god-parent and the natural parents of the child, and again between the minister and receiver of the sacraments of baptism and confirmation. Such is the present law of the Church. Spiritual relationship first appears as an impediment to marriage in the sixth century, and there have been important changes in the law respecting it. Among the Greeks the impediment from this kind of affinity extends much further than among the Latins, but among the former it can only arise from baptism, for they have no confirmation sponsors. Legal affinity impedes marriage (1) between the adopter and the adopted and his children, so long as these children are under their parent's control; (2) between the adopted and the children of the adopter, so long as they are under their parent's control; (3) between the adopter and the wife of the adopted, as well as between the adopted and the wife of the adopter [see ADOPTION].

CONSCIENCE. The word "conscientia" is used in the Vulgate as the translation of συνείδησις, the latter word being scarcely found in classical writers, though it frequently occurs in the New Testament. St. Thomas and other theologians define conscience as "the judgment or dictate of the practical intellect, which [arguing] from the general principles [of morals] pronounces that something in particular here and now is to be avoided, inasmuch as it is evil, or to be done, inasmuch as it is good."

A few words are needed to explain this definition and to point out how St. Thomas's conception of conscience differs from others common among modern philosophers. The reader, then, will observe that conscience denotes an act, and so is very different from the "faculty of conscience," of which Bishop Butler[1] and others speak. Further, it is concerned with a judgment, not on general principles, but on an act to be done or omitted. Conscience, for example, does not tell me that theft is sinful. General principles are perceived, according to St. Thomas, by the intellect, and the mind recognises primary moral truths without any process of reasoning, through a habit congenital to it, which the scholastics call synderesis (i.e. συντήρησις). Conscience is the conclusion from premisses ultimately derived from this synderesis. Thus, knowing that evil acts are to be avoided, and that theft is an evil act, I form the practical conclusion, "I am bound to avoid this particular act of theft." Lastly, conscience is an act of the intellect, not of the will, though the will influences, in more ways than one, the formation of conscience.

From the definition given it is plain that conscience is not an infallible guide of action. As in speculative questions, so in morals, the reason may start from false principles or may argue wrongly from true principles. Hence conscience is said to be true or false; and, again, certain and doubtful, so far as the conclusion is formed with or without doubt; also scrupulous, if an action is judged or feared to be evil on grounds unworthy of serious consideration; and lax, if a judgment is formed on trifling grounds that an evil action is permissible or that a great sin is a little one. Other divisions of conscience are of less importance or are really included in those already given. Thus a "doubtful conscience" is either absolutely doubtful—i.e. the intellect, because it can see no reasons for enabling it to decide, or else reasons equally balanced on both sides, suspends judgment—or "probable," i.e. the intellect forms an opinion on grounds good, as far as they go, but not positively convincing.

[1] The writer attributes this to Bishop Butler from recollection, without pledging himself to its accuracy. But anyhow, the opinion that conscience is a special faculty has been maintained.

Two great principles concerning conscience are laid down by Catholic divines. First, a man is always bound to follow his conscience, even if false and erroneous. Thus St. Paul, speaking of eating food which it was really lawful to eat, says, "He who distinguisheth [i.e. this food, as unlawful, from other food], if he eateth is condemned, because it is not from faith [i.e. as is evident from the context, because it is not from conscience]; but all which is not from faith is sin."[1] The reason is obvious. We apprehend the law of God in the particular case through the dictate of conscience, and here a disobedience to conscience is an act of rebellion against God; just as a man who believed that the governor of a province conveyed the command of the sovereign would, even if the governor had altered the command, be guilty of disobedience to the sovereign if he set the order intimated to him at nought. Accordingly, a Protestant who is seriously convinced that it is a sin to hear Mass or to speak to a priest would undoubtedly commit sin by so doing. Nor can any injunction of any authority, ecclesiastical or civil, make it lawful for a man to do that which his conscience unhesitatingly condemns as certainly wicked. God Himself, Billuart says, cannot make it lawful for a man to act against his conscience, because to do so without sin is a contradiction in terms.

Secondly, a man is bound to form his conscience, or, in other words, his judgment on the moral character of his actions, with great care. It is not always a sufficient excuse to say that one who does wrong is following his conscience. If a person has grave grounds for suspecting that his conscience is erroneous, he is under a strict obligation of looking well into the matter. He is bound to take all reasonable means—such, in other words, as good and honest men do take when there is danger of offending God. He ought to pray and also, according to his opportunities, to consult others, particularly those set over him, to reconsider the grounds on which his conscience was formed, &c. If after the due use of means his ignorance cannot be overcome, it is plain that he is not responsible for the error into which he has fallen. The diligence spent on the inquiry need not be the greatest possible. The amount required depends on the gravity of the matter, the strength of his motives for doubting whether he is right, and the circumstances of the agent. (From St. Thomas, I. lxxix. 12 and 13; Billuart, "De Actibus humanis," diss. v.)

CONSECRATION. The form of words by which the bread and wine in the Mass are changed into Christ's body and blood. This technical use of the word first occurs in Tertullian, "De An." 17.[1] The form for the consecration of the bread in the Roman Missal is, "Hoc est enim corpus meum;" that of the wine, "Hic est enim calix sanguinis mei, novi et æterni testamenti, mysterium fidei, qui pro vobis et pro multis effundetur, in remissionem peccatorum." Some reckon the following words, "Hæc quotiescunque feceritis in mei memoriam facietis," as also pertaining to the form. Probably the mere words "This is my body," "This is my blood," would suffice for validity. The opinion of Scotus, that the words immediately preceding the form, viz. "who the day before he suffered," &c.; or of Touttée and Le Brun, that the validity of the consecration depends, not only on the words of Christ, "This is my body," &c., but also on the prayers of the Church, need not be discussed here. But it is necessary to say something on a special difficulty with regard to the words of consecration. It arises from the liturgies of the Greeks.

In these liturgies, as well as in those

[1] Rom. xiv. 23. So the Vulgate. The Greek really means, "he who doubts is condemned," i.e. by God. Cf. for the sense of διακρίνεσθαι, iv. 20. and ἐκ πίστεως = from Christian faith, informing the conscience. But this does not affect the argument we have drawn from the text.

[1] St. Ambrose makes St. Lawrence say that Pope Xystus had entrusted to him, though only a deacon, "dominici sanguinis consecrationem," i.e. probably "the consecrated blood of our Lord," viz. for distribution to the people.

of other Orientals, we find prayers, after the consecration, imploring the Holy Ghost to descend on the gifts, making the bread the body of Christ, and the wine His blood. This has led some of the schismatic Greeks to make the consecration depend on these prayers. But

1. No mention is made of prayers after the words of consecration by any one of the synoptic evangelists or by St. Paul.

2. The earliest Fathers, Justin, Irenæus, Tertullian, Ambrose, Chrysostom,[1] evidently make the consecration depend on the words of consecration.

3. The Greeks themselves at the Council of Florence unanimously admitted that the change was effected by the words of consecration, "Hoc est corpus," &c. convinced, as they said, by the words of their great doctor Chrysostom.[2]

4. The Oriental liturgies admit of a satisfactory interpretation. The prayers referred to are really a petition that what has been bread and wine may manifest itself by the effects produced on the souls of the communicants as the true body and blood of Christ: or, again, the prayer for the change of the gifts may be regarded as one act with the consecration. These interpretations will not appear forced to anyone familiar with the language of the Eastern liturgies. Thus in a Ritual of Severus God is asked after the actual baptism to sanctify the baptised persons with the laver of regeneration. Similar examples are collected by Meratus. (There is a special Catholic treatise on this subject, "Die Eucharistische Wandlung und die Epiklese," by Dr. Joseph Franz.)

CONSECRATION OF ALTARS. Altars and altar-stones are consecrated by the bishop with ceremonies prescribed in the Pontifical. The most essential part of the rite consists in the anointing with chrism (to indicate, according to Gavantus, the richness of grace), and the placing of relics in the sepulchre or repository made in the altar-stone and afterwards sealed up. The consecration endures till the altar-stone is broken or the seal of relics broken. Cardinal Bona contends that the practice of consecrating altars is of Apostolic origin. Putting aside doubtful decrees of early Popes, we find such consecration first mentioned by the Fathers of the fourth and councils of the sixth century. [From Gavantus, and Kraus, "Real-Encyclopädie." See also DEDICATION OF CHURCHES.]

CONSECRATION OF BISHOPS. [See ORDER, HOLY.]

CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES. [See DEDICATION OF CHURCHES.]

CONSECRATION OF CHALICE AND PATEN is made by the bishop with chrism, the prayers to be used being given in the Pontifical. This rite is very ancient, being found in the Gregorian Sacramentary, the most ancient Ordines, &c., where, however, no mention is made of the chrism.

CONSISTORY (Lat. consistorium). A meeting of official persons to transact business, and also the place where they meet. The word is classical, and was used of the privy council of the Roman emperors.[1] Before the Reformation every English bishop had his consistory, composed of some of the leading clergy of the diocese, presided over by his chancellor. The name is still retained in the Anglican Church, but the consistory is with them a court and nothing more. In the Catholic Church the term is now seldom used except with reference to the Papal consistory, the ecclesiastical senate in which the Pope, presiding over the whole body of Cardinals, deliberates upon grave ecclesiastical affairs, and communicates to his venerable brethren, and through them to Christendom, the solicitudes and intentions of the vicar of Christ as to the condition of some Christian nation, or the definition of some Catholic doctrine. The ordinary meetings of the consistory, held about once a fortnight, are secret; they are usually, but not invariably, presided over by the Pope. Public consistories are held from time to time, as occasion may require; they are attended by other prelates besides the Cardinals, and by the representatives of foreign Courts. In them the resolutions which the Pope has arrived at in secret consistory are announced, and an allocution on some matter of pressing importance is commonly delivered by the Pontiff to the assembled Cardinals.

CONSTANCE, COUNCIL OF. An attempt had been made early in the fifteenth century to close the schism in the Papacy by the convocation of a general council at Pisa (1409). Twenty-four Cardinals assembled there had claimed to depose both Gregory XII. and the antipope, Peter de Luna, and had elected Cardinal Philargi, who took the title of Alexander V. On the death of Alexander in a few months at Bologna, the Cardinals chose Balthasar Cossa, then governor in that portion of the Papal States, to succeed him. Balthasar took the title of John XXIII. Neither Gregory nor Peter de Luna consented to make a renunciation in favour of John; hence there were three persons each claiming to be the true Pope, and the action of the Council of Pisa had only resulted, for the moment, in making the confusion worse than before. The emperor of Germany, Sigismund of Luxemburg, formed the praiseworthy determination to use every means in his power to terminate so disastrous a state of things. In concert with John XXIII. he summoned a general council, with the threefold object of terminating the schism, extirpating heresy, and reforming the Church in head and members. Constance, an imperial city on the lake so named, was fixed upon as the place of meeting. John, though his blemished character made him shrink from facing the council, had been able to find no excuse against the emperor's importunity; but he trusted that it would meet somewhere in Italy, and that the great preponderance of Italian bishops, many of whom were bound to him in various ways, would suffice to screen him from attack. His heart sank when he heard that his legates had consented to the selection of a city beyond the Alps, and he went to the council with a reluctance which the result completely justified.

All through the autumn of 1414, whatever was most illustrious in Europe for piety, learning, power or enterprise—the princes of the empire, the Emperor and Pope, Cardinals, statesmen, bishops, theologians, merchants, artists, representatives of every rank and every calling in the then civilised world—was streaming from all directions along the roads that led to Constance. Among the English bishops the chief was Robert Hallam, Bishop of Salisbury. France was represented by Peter d'Ailly, the Cardinal Archbishop of Cambray, and Gerson, the famous chancellor of the University of Paris. Among the Italians, none was of greater weight than Zabarella, the Cardinal Archbishop of Florence; he, with D'Ailly, soon came to the front, and took the lead in the deliberations of the fathers.

The council was opened by John XXIII. on November 5; the first public session was held on the 16th of the same month. With regard to the form in which business should be carried on, it was prearranged that the bishops should be divided into congregations answering to the nationalities to which they belonged (Italians, French, English, German—a fifth was added for Spain in 1416), and that the voting in the council should be by nations, not by individuals. The object of this was to neutralise the overwhelming numbers of the Italian bishops, who would otherwise have been able to outvote all the rest. It must be remembered that the objects for which the council met were to a large extent political and disciplinary; there was as yet no real schism on a grand scale with regard to any point of faith. Hence a mode of voting which would have been improper at Trent might offer the best solution of existing difficulties at Constance.

John Huss, rector of the University of Prague, who had adopted many of the opinions of Wyclif, and was to justify himself if he could before assembled Christendom, arrived at Constance just before the opening of the Council,[1] furnished with a safe-conduct from the Emperor. Other Bohemian ecclesiastics also came, and denounced the preaching of Huss; before the end of the month the council ordered that he should be arrested and put in custody. A commission of three theologians was appointed to examine his teaching. In the following March he endeavoured to escape, but was retaken.

The more the antecedents of John XXIII. became known, the more evident appeared his unfitness for the Pontifical office; and the majority of the council came before long to the conclusion that he, with the other two claimants, must resign his pretensions, so that the Cardinals might proceed to a new election. This John agreed to do (1415, March 2), provided Gregory and Peter de Luna would do the same. Soon after, finding that his past career was being inquired into, he secretly withdrew (March 21) from Constance, and went to Schaffhausen, to be within reach of his friend Frederic, the Archduke of Austria. Long negotiations ensued; at length (1415, May 29, Sess. xii.), John having failed to make the cession of his office in the form prescribed—the commission appointed to inquire into the charges brought against his character having also reported most unfavourably, and John himself having admitted the truth of a portion of those charges—the council declared him guilty, and deposed him from the Pontifical office, of which he shortly afterwards made the formal resignation that he had promised.

In the fourth and fifth sessions (March 30, April 6) decrees were adopted declaring that the council, representing the Catholic Church, held its power immediately from Jesus Christ, and that everyone, even the Pope himself, was bound to obey it in all that concerned the faith, the extinction of the schism, and the reform of the Church in its head and members. These decrees have often been quoted as if they involved a dogmatic definition subordinating the Pope to a general council. Attentively considered, they appear to be carefully restricted in their range, and to apply in their fullness only to that particular group of circumstances which they were intended to remedy. Even so interpreted, they must be regarded as untenable, and as excluded from the guarded and limited confirmations given by Martin V. and Eugenius IV. Still, in the midst of the uncertainty which prevailed as to who was the true Pope—an uncertainty which the best-disposed Christians, owing to the obscurity of the facts, often could not clear up for themselves—it may be admitted that there is much to be said in extenuation of the violent and uncanonical acts and speeches which appear on the conciliar record; since, unless the council could succeed in enforcing obedience to its decisions, there seemed to be no hope of restoring unity to the Church.[1]

The commission which had been appointed to examine the opinions of Wyclif and the Lollards was aided by the learning and zeal of the great English Carmelite, Thomas Walden, author of the "Doctrinale Fidei" and the "Fasciculi Zizaniorum." The wild and monstrous opinions to which Wyclif had set his hand were maturely examined, and the report of the commission was made about this time to the council. In the eighth session (May 4) the memory of Wyclif was solemnly condemned, and it was ordered that his remains should be exhumed, and, as those of an impenitent heretic, cast forth from the place of Christian burial in which they lay.

In the thirteenth session (1414, June 15) the lawfulness and expediency of giving communion to the laity under one species were affirmed, and those who obstinately maintained the contrary were to be treated as heretics.

In the fourteenth session (July 4), Gregory XII. gave in his resignation of the Papacy. The antipope, Peter de Luna, in spite of the entreaties of the king of Aragon, refused to renounce his pretensions. He was consequently disregarded, and, abandoned by nearly all his adherents, he was left to fulminate idle censures from the rock of Peniscola.

In the fifteenth session (July 6) the doctrine of Jean Petit, who had written a book to justify the assassination of the Duke of Orleans by the order of the Duke of Burgundy in 1407, was partially condemned. A condemnation of Huss, who had refused to recant his heretical opinions, was at the same time published, and he was delivered to the secular arm. He was burnt at the stake on the same day. An outcry being raised on the ground of the violation of the safe-conduct given him, the council (sess. xviii. Aug. 17) adopted a decree by which the emperor was exonerated from all blame. He had done, it was said, all that depended on him to keep his word; and if Huss had been less obstinate, he would have gone and returned in safety. But the emperor had not the power, nor did he intend, to control the course of ecclesiastical discipline, which, when defied, executed itself by the means regarded in that age as efficacious.

About the same time the case of the margraviate of Brandenburg, vacant by the death without heirs of the last margrave of the house of Ballenberg, was brought before the council. The qualifications of several princes having been discussed, the choice of the council fell on the young Conrad of Hohenzollern, an insignificant principality in South Germany. This was the beginning of the extraordinary rise of that now celebrated and imperial house, which has of late years dealt so hardly with the Church to which it owes its greatness.

The years 1416 and 1417 were chiefly taken up with negotiations respecting the election of a Pope, and endeavours to remedy ecclesiastical abuses. The English and Germans wished to postpone the election of a Pope till after the completion of the reforms; the French and Italian nations took the opposite view. The latter, in the opinion of Moehler, were clearly in the right. At last (1417, Nov. 11), the Cardinal Otto Colonna was elected Pope by twenty-three cardinals and a representative delegation of thirty prelates, six for each nation, Spain being now included. Cardinal Colonna, who took the name of Martin V., was a man of great integrity and ability, and of irreproachable morals. The new Pope confirmed the council's acts, limiting his confirmation to what had been done "conciliariter in materiis fidei, et non aliter nec alio modo."

The bishops were now weary of their conciliar labours, and anxious to return to their dioceses. Concordats between Rome and the principal nations, regulating future relations and cutting off some of the worst abuses, were hastily framed, and the council was dissolved in its forty-fifth session, April 22, 1418. CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCILS OF. (1) General Councils.—The Second General Council (1st of CP.) A council of 150 Eastern bishops, which met in 381. It was presided over first by Meletius of Antioch, then by Gregory of Nazianzus, who had re-established the orthodox faith in the city. The true faith was maintained against Arianism in all its manifold varieties, as well as against Apollinarianism and Macedonianism. The last heresy —named from Macedonius, a semi-Arian bishop of Constantinople, deposed by the Catholics in 360—consisted in a denial of the Holy Ghost's perfect Godhead. To meet this error the council added to the Nicene Creed the words "and in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and life-giver, who proceedeth from the Father, who with the Father and Son is together worshipped and glorified, who spake by the prophets." This council had in itself no claim to be œcumenical, but it was generally recognised as such since the sixth century, because its doctrinal definitions (not its disciplinary canons) were accepted throughout the Church.

The Fifth General Council (2nd of CP.) met in 553 with 165 bishops. It condemned Theodore of Mopsuestia, the erroneous portions in the writings of Theodoret, and the letter of Ibas, because of their Nestorian tendency. [See THREE CHAPTERS.] There was no explicit condemnation of Origen's errors, though he was named and anathematised among other heretics. The decrees of this council were received by Popes Vigilius and Pelagius, but it was long before its œcumenical character was acknowledged throughout the West. [See THREE CHAPTERS.]

Sixth General Council (3rd of CP.), convoked in 680 by Constantine Pogonatus in union with Pope Agatho, and presided over by the Papal legates. It accepted Pope Agatho's definitions of "two physical wills [i.e. in Christ], without division, change, partition, confusion, the two wills not being contrary to each other, but the human will being subject to the divine." [See MONOTHELITES.] Sergius, Cyrus, Honorius [see the article], Pyrrhus, Paul, were anathematised. Pope Leo II. confirmed the decrees.

Eighth General Council (4th of CP.) met in 869, and endeavoured to heal the schism which threatened to separate the East from Rome, by deposing Photius and restoring Ignatius lawful patriarch of Constantinople. The Greeks finally refused to acknowledge the council, substituting for it a council of 879, in which the conduct and ordination of Photius were approved.

(2) Particular Councils. — Special mention is due to the synod in Trullo, which met in 691. It passed 102 canons dealing with numerous questions of discipline, and partly with the worship of the Eastern church. The decrees betray a strong animus against Rome, and though regarded as œcumenical by the Greeks, it was never received in the West. The name "in Trullo" indicates the domical building in which it was held. It was also called πενθέκτη or quinisexta, because it was meant by its disciplinary decrees to complete the labours of the fifth and sixth councils.

(3) Of schismatical councils we may name two, held in 1638 and 1642, against the Calvinistic errors of Cyril Lucar.

CONSTANTINOPLE, PATRIARCHATE OF. The church of Byzantium was originally a simple bishopric, subject to the metropolitan see of Heraclea. A new state of things began when the city became the seat of the imperial Court; the metropolitan of Heraclea could no longer exercise his authority over his suffragan of Constantinople; and in 381 canon 3 of the Second General Council assigned to the see of Constantinople a primacy of honour (πρεσβεῖα τῆς τιμῆς) after that of old Rome. The Greek canonist Zonaras frankly admits that this canon acknowledges the superiority of the Roman bishop. But did it give real patriarchal power to the bishop of Constantinople? De Marca answers in the negative; so does Cardinal Hergenröther; but Hefele considers it more likely that this canon gave, not only a primacy of honour, but also real jurisdiction in the district of Thrace to the Bishop of Constantinople.

With this power the bishops of Constantinople were not content, and they found it easy to extend their jurisdiction. In the West, Cyprian, the Council of Sardica, and other authorities, accepted the principle expressed by St. Augustin when he says, "The Lord laid the foundations of his Church in the Apostolic sees," and to such foundation Constantinople could make no plausible claim. But in the East the notion prevailed that the ecclesiastical should correspond with the civil dignity of a city, a principle clearly implied in the 9th canon of the Synod in Encæniis, which met at Antioch in 341. Moreover, bishops came from all parts of the East, to lay their petitions before the emperor. He often referred them to the bishop of the place, i.e. of Constantinople, and the latter settled the matter in a σύνοδος ἐνδημοῦσα composed of the bishops who happened to be in the capital, over which synod he himself presided. Thus very often the affairs even of other patriarchates were tried by agreement of the contending parties, and soon this custom led to a claim as of right. This power grew under St. John Chrysostom, of whom Theodoret says that he ruled Thrace, Asia and Pontus, in all twenty-eight provinces. Atticus, the second bishop after Chrysostom, was empowered by an imperial edict to consecrate metropolitans even beyond Thrace. In the earlier part of the fifth century we find Proclus of Constantinople ordaining bishops for Pontus and Asia. About the middle of the fifth century Anatolius of Constantinople actually appointed Maximus bishop of Antioch and thus assumed authority over the ancient patriarchal see. True, opposition was made to these pretensions, but without permanent effect, and at the Fourth General Council, Anatolius tried to get the claims of his see fully and formally acknowledged. The time singularly favoured such a project. The bishoprics of Alexandria and Ephesus were vacant. Maximus of Antioch was a creature of Anatolius, while Juvenal of Jerusalem was specially indebted to him. Accordingly, in canon 28 of Chalcedon, the decree of the Second Council placing Constantinople next in dignity to Rome was confirmed, and further it was determined that the bishop of Constantinople should consecrate the metropolitans of Pontus, Asia Proconsularis, and Thrace, and also the bishops in "barbarous countries." Pope Leo absolutely refused to confirm this canon, as his predecessors had ignored canon 2 of Constantinople,[1] and for long the Greeks, who had acknowledged that it needed Papal confirmation, omitted it in their collection. Still the see of Constantinople did in fact exercise the power assigned to it at Chalcedon and continued to do so, in spite of repeated protests on the part of the Popes. Gregory the Great had to protest vigorously against the assumption of the title "Œcumenical Patriarch" by John the Faster (about 587). Justinian confirmed the rank of Constantinople; while the Greek synod in Trullo repeated canon 28 of Chalcedon. Illyria during the Iconoclastic controversy was torn from the Roman, and united to the Constantinopolitan Patriarchate, under which it continued when the strife on images was over; and finally, after the schism of the East, the patriarch of Constantinople became independent head of the whole (schismatic) Eastern church, with the provinces of Pontus, Asia, Thrace, and Illyria in immediate subjection to himself. Later, he also obtained a primacy over Russia, in accordance with the canon of Chalcedon, which placed the territory of barbarians under his care.

However, in modern times, political causes, which had originally established, grievously diminished the power of Constantinople. In the sixteenth century (1589), a Russian patriarchate was instituted at Moscow, and although it exists no longer, the Russian church is governed by a "holy synod" (1721) independent of Constantinople. The church of the kingdom of Greece also secured its independence in consequence of the revolution of 1821. The Greek schismatical bishops in the Austrian territory are also independent of Constantinople. So now are the schismatics of Bulgaria and Montenegro, and the patriarch's jurisdiction is limited to Turkey in Europe and all those dioceses in Asiatic Turkey which do not belong to the other three patriarchates.

A Latin patriarchate was founded at Constantinople during the time of the Latin rule there (1204–1261). The title is still borne by one of the high dignitaries of the Papal Court. There is also a Vicar Apostolic for the Latins. In the Fourth Lateran Council Innocent III. gave the second place among the sees of Christendom to the Greek Patriarchate, and this privilege was renewed in the Second Council of Lyons and in the Council of Florence. (See Le Quien, "Oriens Christianus;" Hefele, "Concil." vol. ii., and for the present state of things an article on the Greek Church by Professor Lamy in the "Dublin Review" for July 1880. See also Cardinal Hergenröther's "Photius.")

CONSTITUTIONAL CLERGY. This was the name given to that portion of the French clergy which gave in its adhesion to the "civil constitution" provided for them by a law of the National Assembly passed in August 1790, and took the oath of fidelity to it in the manner prescribed in the law itself.

The committee which drew up this notable scheme were not atheists, nor deists, nor Protestants; they were what would be called now bad, or liberal, Catholics. They aimed at introducing what they considered principles of liberty into the religious life of the nation, by releasing the bishops from their obedience to the Pope, and the inferior clergy from their dependence on the bishops. Yet they did not desire, like the English reformers of the sixteenth century, absolutely to reject the Pope and break off communion with him. For the 19th article of the Civil Constitution, after forbidding a newly-elected bishop to obtain any confirmation from Rome, proceeds:—"But he shall write to him [the Pope], as to the chief of the universal Church, in testimony of unity of faith and of the communion which he is bound to maintain with him." Some priests, steeped in Gallican opinions, such as the Abbé Expilly and Dom Gerle, and Jansenist advocates, like Chasset and Martineau, were members of the committee, and bore an active part in framing the new law, while all the time professing great reverence for the Catholic Church, and a determination not to sever France from her communion.

The French clergy, to relieve the distress of the nation, had voluntarily renounced their tithes; of their landed property they had, on the motion of the notorious Bishop of Autun,[1] been stripped by a decree of the National Assembly. The Assembly recognised the obligation under which it lay, having expropriated the landed property of the clergy, to support them by a competent annual subvention from the public revenue. Had the bishops and the Holy See been allowed to frame the new arrangements which the change in the mode of supporting the clergy rendered necessary, it is probable that no serious difficulty would have arisen. But the Gallican party thought they saw their opportunity of erecting a church almost entirely national and self-governed; they seized it eagerly, and the result of their action was a terrible increase in the distractions of France, and a potent stimulus to the horrors and abominations of the Revolution.

The new constitution suppressed many of the French dioceses (which at that time were about 130 in number), and pretended to assign the boundaries of others, without the concurrence of the ecclesiastical authority. It decreed that the bishops should be elected by local conventions of the clergy, and confirmed by the metropolitans, without having recourse to the Holy See for canonical institution. It prescribed a number of minute regulations for the internal government of the French church, of which it is enough to say that, whether good or bad in themselves, they were such as no secular authority had any right to impose without the consent of the ecclesiastical authority. Moreover, all beneficed and employed clergy, whether bishops, priests, or others, were required to take an oath to maintain "the constitution decreed," on pain of deprivation ipso facto if the oath were refused.

The Pope (Pius VI.), on learning the nature of the law that was passing through the Assembly, wrote to Louis XVI., and to the archbishops of Bordeaux and Vienne, urging the inevitable fall into schism which must be the result of such legislation. Thirty bishops, who had seats in the National Assembly, signed a paper called "Exposition of Principles on the Civil Constitution of the Clergy," which was drawn up in a sense antagonistic to the constitution by M. de Boisgelin, archbishop of Aix. Nearly all the French bishops, and the doctors of the Sorbonne, adhered to this Exposition, and the great majority of the inferior clergy followed their example. This fidelity is in remarkable contrast with the conduct of the English bishops under Henry VIII., and with that of the majority of the beneficed clergy at the accession of Elizabeth.

The constitution was finally decreed on August 24, 1790, and the period terminating on January 4, 1791, was named as that within which the oath must be taken. The day came, and all the ecclesiastics in the Assembly, whether bishops or priests, refused the oath, and lost their seats in consequence. In the provinces also the oath was very generally refused; the only archbishop who took it was Loménie de Brienne, archbishop of Toulouse, whose weakness was imitated by three bishops, those of Autun, Orleans, and Viviers. One hundred and twenty-seven prelates remained firm and refused the oath. Among the inferior clergy a similar constancy was manifested; still the influence of the Government, of a lay society much infected by unbelief, and of the old Gallican prejudices, was strong enough to induce a large number of priests to take the oath. These were the "jurants," the "prêtres assermentés," or "constitutionnels;" while the other side were called "dissidents," "prêtres non assermentés," &c. Between the two parties a violent conflict arose.[1]

The Pope acted with great vigour; in briefs dated in March and April, 1791, and addressed to the clergy and people of France, he discussed the terms of the constitution, showed how repugnant they were to the just freedom of the Church, and how inconsistent with the rights of that divine institution which Jesus Christ established upon earth, and laid under the ban of religion both those among the actual clergy who had taken the oath, and those who, in order to obtain clerical emolument and position, might in future take it. He also degraded Loménie de Brienne from the cardinalate, as one who had soiled the Roman purple by swearing in a sense contrary to those sacred and venerable oaths by which he was before bound.

Nevertheless, the schism continued to extend itself in France; new pretended bishops were consecrated by Talleyrand and his accomplices, according to the forms prescribed by the civil constitution, and the Government soon lent its weight to the persecution which the revolutionary sect had commenced against the faithful priests. The Legislative Assembly decreed (Nov. 1791) that priests refusing the oath should be reputed under suspicion of revolt against the law and disaffection to their country; that they should be deprived of all salary, and imprisoned in such places as the departmental administrations might appoint. Further decrees in the course of the following summer condemned all ecclesiastics "non-assermentés" to banishment. More than fifty thousand of the clergy came under this proscription; they left or prepared to leave the country in great numbers. The hatred and fear of the revolutionists were aroused, and a massacre of the priests began simultaneously in many parts of France.

The schism took the downward course usual with such movements; before long several of the constitutional bishops and priests married; those of them who had seats in the Convention nearly all voted for the king's execution; and in November 1793 the Bishop of Paris (Gobet) and his grand-vicars publicly abjured Christianity in the hall of the Convention.[1] Yet these unhappy men did not save their lives by their apostacy; the greater number of them fell victims either to private vengeance or to the sanguinary patriotism of the Jacobin Government. Merged in the more horrible revolt against all law and "all that is called God," into which the Satanic energy and determination of the Jacobins plunged the whole French nation, the less criminal schism of the constitutionals almost disappears from sight. The worship of Reason and Nature was solemnly inaugurated in the church of Notre Dame; wherever the Convention had power the voice of religion was silenced, and the churches closed. When in 1801 the First Consul concluded a concordat with the Holy See for the restoration of Christian worship, twelve constitutional bishops were allowed to have sees, but only upon making the following declaration: "I declare before God that I profess adhesion and submission to the judgments of the Holy See on the ecclesiastical affairs of France." (Wetzer and Welte, article Constitution Civile du Clergé.)

[1] Carlyle describes with evident satisfaction the blows and insults which the "dissident" priests had to endure at the hands of revolutionary citoyennes in Paris. He sums up the quarrel as amounting to this: that one party held that a bishop, "his creed and formularies being left quite as they were, can swear fidelity to King, Law, and Nation;" the other, that "he cannot, but that he must become an accursed thing." The extreme unfairness of this way of putting the matter is apparent even from the short sketch of the facts that we have given. (French Revolution, vol. ii. book iv. 1, 2.)

CONSUBSTANTIAL (ὁμοούσιος). The word used by the Fathers of Nicæa, to establish the true Godhead of the Son, inserted by them in their Creed, and ever since the watchword of those who have true faith in the divinity of Christ. A man may be said to be of one substance with another because he has the same specific nature; but the Son is consubstantial with the Father in another sense, for his nature is numerically one with that of the Father; else, there would be two Gods. Hence, when we say that the Son is consubstantial with the Father, we confess His perfect equality and co-eternity with the first Person of the Trinity and at the same time exclude all imperfection from His eternal generation. A human son receives an individual nature and is separate from his father; but God the Son is ever in the Father and the Father in Him.

The word had long been used in the Church. Tertullian (Adv. Prax. 13 and 4) says the Son is "of one substance" and "from the substance of the Father," and closely similar phrases occur in Clement of Alexandria and Novatian.[1] At the same time Paul of Samosata had used the word in an heretical sense, and, so understood, it had been condemned by an orthodox council at Antioch. Probably, as Hefele, following St. Epiphanius, thinks, Paul made the Son (apart from His humanity) a mere attribute of God, not a distinct Person from the Father, and expressed his view by the word consubstantial.[1]

At Nicæa, the word was chosen because it did, which other and Biblical terms did not, exclude the Arian error, beyond possibility of evasion. The Arians were willing to allow that the Son was from God, His power, His image, even that He was eternal, because their sophistical skill enabled them to rob these words of their natural meaning, and to show that they might in a certain sense be applied to creatures. Accordingly, to put their meaning and faith beyond all doubt, the Fathers of Nicæa chose the word consubstantial.[2]

CONSUBSTANTIATION. [See EUCHARIST.]

CONTEMPLATION. A word used to describe the life of those (religious and others) who devote themselves to prayer and meditation, rather than to active works of charity. No doubt such a life, in order to be real, implies a vocation of no ordinary kind. But when Protestants or ill-instructed Catholics condemn such a life as useless, &c., they oppose themselves to the tradition of the Church, since the earliest religious—the Fathers of the desert, &c.—devoted themselves to the contemplative life and were venerated throughout the Christian world for doing so. Moreover, reason itself may teach us that a contemplative is not a useless life. Man's merit consists in loving God and man for God's sake. And in itself the life which is occupied directly in the love of God is more meritorious than that which is occupied chiefly in the love of our neighbour for God's sake. Protestants who accuse contemplative orders of idleness really take for granted that the love of God is no part of man's duty, whereas it is the noblest occupation in which he can possibly engage. And whereas the ministries of the active life cease after death, the contemplative life is perfected and continued in heaven. It is that "best part" which Mary chose and which will never be taken away. It may of course happen that a person merits more by resigning the sweetness of contemplation for a time in order to obey the call of God to the active life. (St. Thom. 2ª 2æ, 181, 2.)

CONTRITION, in its widest sense, is defined by the Council of Trent as "grief of mind and detestation of sin committed, with a purpose of sinning no more." Thus understood, it includes attrition [see the article]; but in its narrower sense contrition is used for that sorrow for sin which arises from consideration of God's goodness[1] which sin has outraged, and which includes a resolution never to offend God (at least mortally) because God so deserves our love. The Council of Trent declares that "contrition perfected by charity," and accompanied by a desire to confess and be absolved, may reconcile the sinner with God even before he receives the sacrament of penance. It is not necessary that the grief for sin arising from the love of God should be more intense[2] than other and natural sorrow; it is enough for reconciliation with God, apart from the sacrament of penance, if the sinner would rather endure any evil or sacrifice any good than offend so good a God. Thus, for example, a man may feel more intense sorrow for his wife's death than for all his mortal sins, but this is not inconsistent with perfect contrition, unless it implies that he would sin mortally against an all-holy God if by this course he could undo the calamity which has fallen upon him. (From St. Liguori, "Theol. Moral." vi. tract. 4, cap. 1.)

CONVERSION OF NATIONS. [See MISSIONS TO THE HEATHEN.]

CONVENT. The hermitages and "lauras" [LAURA] of the first ages gradually gave place to the cœnobite mode of life; only in the orders of Chartreuse and Camaldoli has the solitary life been partially retained to this day. Monachism was firmly planted in Western Europe by St. Benedict of Aniane in the ninth century, and from that time the name "conventus"—applied alike to communities of men and women living under a rule and practising the evangelical counsels—came into common use.

Different orders preferred different sites for their convents. The Culdees of Iona chose islands or lonely spots, removed from the beaten tracks of trade and travel; this pious instinct is attested by the position of Iona, Lindisfarne, and Old Melrose. The Benedictines were said to prefer hillsides; the Cistercians chose quiet valleys; the mendicant orders, who depended on alms, and made preaching one of the great aims of their institution, repaired to the cities and towns. The Society of Jesus, as a rule, is found in cities:

Bernardus valles, montes Benedictus amabat,
Oppida Franciscus, magnas Ignatius urbes.

In illustration of these preferences, the reader is referred to the lists of old English monasteries which he will find under CISTERCIANS, FRANCISCANS, DOMINICANS, &c.

The parts of a convent are: 1. the church; 2. the choir, viz. that portion of the church in which the members say the daily office; 3. the chapter-house, a place of meeting in which the rule is read, elections made, and community business discussed; 4. the cells; 5. the refectory (in old English, fraitour, or frater); 6. the dormitory; 7. the infirmary; 8. the parlour, for the reception of visitors; 9. the library; 10. the treasury; 11. the cloister; 12. the crypt.

The legislation on convents forms a large and important section of canon law. Among the chief regulations is the law of enclosure, which "separates the convent from the world by the prohibition or restriction of intercourse from without."

CONVENTUALS. [See FRANCISCANS.]

CONVOCATION. The assembly of the clergy, in the provinces of Canterbury and York, chiefly for purposes of taxation. Blackstone says[1]:—"The convocation, or ecclesiastical synod, in England, differs considerably in its constitution from the synods of other Christian kingdoms: those consisting wholly of bishops; whereas with us the convocation in each province is the miniature of a parliament, wherein the archbishop presides with regal state: the upper house of bishops represents the house of lords; and the lower house, composed of representatives of the several dioceses at large, and of each particular chapter therein, resembles the house of commons with its knights of the shire and burgesses. This constitution is said to be owing to the policy of Edward I." The origin of Convocation is treated of in Burn's "Ecclesiastical Justice" and Hody's "History of Convocation." It seems to have assumed its peculiar form owing to the endeavour of Edward I. to organise the clergy as a third estate of the realm, which should meet, deliberate, and grant the king taxes, concurrently with the two other estates, the lords and the commons.

[1] So the majority of theologians; but others think the consideration of any divine attribute may supply a sufficient motive for contrition.

[2] This may now be considered an admitted point, though it was once keenly debated.

[1] Commentaries, i. 7.

The writ of summons which he addressed to the archbishops and bishops, requiring them to call together the clergy of their respective dioceses, received, from the first word of it, the name of the præmunientes writ. He experienced great resistance from the clergy, who were indisposed to admit any right in the civil power to summon them together; and at last it was settled that while the king issued his writ of summons to the archbishops, they should issue their writs, as of their own authority, to the bishops, deans, archdeacons, colleges, and diocesan clergy of the province, calling them together in Convocation. The mode of obeying this summons was ultimately arranged thus: the bishops, deans, and archdeacons were to attend in person, the chapters and colleges to be represented by one proctor each, and the clergy of each diocese to be represented by two proctors. The archbishops and bishops sat separately in an upper house, corresponding to the House of Lords. The English clergy were in those days so careful to guard the rights and freedom of the Church that they frequently, without waiting for the king's writ, met in Convocation under the archbishop's writ alone, and transacted business. For the national Church created at the Reformation this was rendered impossible by the Act of Submission (25 Hen. VIII. c. 19), which, starting with the false assertion that Convocation had always been assembled only by the king's writ, purports that the clergy will never presume thereafter to meet in Convocation except by royal authority, nor ever attempt to pass any canons or ordinances there unless with the sovereign's assent. For the later history of Convocation, in Anglican times, see Hody.

COPE (cappa, pluviale). A wide vestment, of silk, &c., reaching nearly to the feet, open in front and fastened by a clasp, and with a hood at the back. It is used by the celebrant in processions, benedictions, &c., but never in the celebration of Mass, for the Church reserves the chasuble for the priest actually engaged in offering sacrifice, and thus carefully distinguishes between Mass and all other functions. The cope is used in processions by those who assist the celebrant, by cantors at vespers, &c., so that it is by no means a distinctively sacerdotal vestment. Mention is made of the cope in the ancient Ordo Romanus for the consecration of bishops. No special blessing is provided for the cope. (From Gavantus and Meratus.)

COPTS. The Monophysite Christians in Egypt. Dioscorus, the Patriarch of Alexandria, was deposed by the council of Chalcedon in 451, because he maintained that there was only one nature in Christ. Orthodox Patriarchs and other officials, ecclesiastical and civil, were sent from Constantinople to Egypt, but the mass of the people were fanatically attached to Monophysite error. Many fled to Upper Egypt or took refuge among the Arabs, and at last, when the occasion came, the Copts betrayed Egypt to the Saracens, who drove Greeks and Romans out of the land, and for a time treated the Copts well. But it was only for a time, and under successive Mohammedan dynasties, the Copts were subjected to cruel oppression, and had to pay an extortionate price for leave to practise their religion.

At present they form about a tenth of the population in the country. They represent the ancient inhabitants of Egypt, and celebrate Mass in the old Coptic language. In doctrine they agree on the whole with Catholics, except on the single point which led to their separation from the Church, viz. the two natures of Christ. Their supreme head is the Monophysite Patriarch of Alexandria, who has great authority and who is chosen from the monks. Then come the bishops, priests, deacons, inferior clergy, and monks. The priests are allowed to live with their wives, and, as they receive scarcely any support from the church, generally pursue an ordinary trade. They are obliged to acquire some acquaintance with Coptic, for this, the language of the liturgy, is a dead language, Arabic being the vulgar tongue. They have four fasting-seasons which they observe with remarkable strictness. Their Lent begins nine days earlier than ours, and during it they abstain from eating, drinking, and smoking, till the service in the church is over, i.e. till about one o'clock. The principal peculiarity in their ritual is in the administration of the sacrament of extreme unction, which they give along with the sacrament of penance, to heal the diseases of the soul even when there is no bodily illness. They have also a custom of blessing large tanks of water in which the people bathe. They have adopted circumcision, probably to satisfy Mohammedan prejudice.

The Egyptian Abbot Andrew went to the Council of Florence to seek reunion for the Monophysites with the Roman Church. But most of the Copts adhere to their heresy. There is, however, a Catholic Vicar Apostolic of the Coptic rite who has about 12,000 Catholic subjects.

CORDELIERS. [See FRANCISCANS.]

CORONATION. The Jewish kings were anointed for their office, and the Church has instituted the same ceremony for Christian sovereigns. The ceremony, as given in the Pontifical, chiefly consists (1) in the admonition which the bishop (usually a metropolitan) gives on the duties of the royal dignity, and the promise on the part of the sovereign elect to fulfil them; (2) the Litany of the Saints is sung while the sovereign elect lies prostrate before the altar; (3) the bishop anoints the king with oil of catechumens on the right arm and between the shoulders; (4) the bishop, after Mass has begun, presents him with the sword, places the crown on his head and the sceptre in his hand, and enthrones him. Finally, the new king makes the bishop an offering of gold at the offertory, and afterwards receives Communion, the bishop also giving him wine (not the Precious Blood) from the chalice.

Theodosius was the first Christian emperor to receive the blessing of the Church. The Gothic Wamba was anointed with the holy oil at Toledo in 672, and "this," says Fleury,[1] "is the first example that I find of the unction of kings."

CORONATION OF POPE. [See POPE.]

CORPORAL. The linen cloth on which the body of Christ is consecrated. It used to cover the whole surface of the altar, as may be gathered from an Ordo Romanus where the corporal is said to be spread on the altar by two deacons. The chalice also was covered by the corporal, a custom still maintained by the Carthusians. The corporal is and must be blessed by the bishop or by a priest with special faculties. It represents the winding-sheet in which Christ's body was wrapped by Joseph of Arimathea.

CORPUS CHRISTI. From Apostolic times the Church has celebrated the institution of the Eucharist on Thursday in Holy Week. But, since the Church at that season is occupied with the consideration of Christ's Passion, it was desirable that another day should be set apart as the feast of the Blessed Sacrament. The B. Juliana, a holy religious of Liège, believed that she had seen a vision encouraging her to use her influence with the ecclesiastical authorities for the introduction of this feast. In 1230, when she became prioress of her order, she consulted several theologians and Church dignitaries on the matter, among others the Archdeacon of Liège, who afterwards became Pope with the title of Urban IV. An office was composed, and in 1246 Robert, Bishop of Liège, ordered the day to be kept throughout his diocese.

After Juliana's death, Eve, a holy woman who had been in her confidence, induced Henry, the next bishop of Liège, to petition Urban IV. for the celebration of the feast throughout the Church. Urban IV. assented, moved in part by the miracle of Bolsena [see the article], partly by his former knowledge of Juliana, partly by his desire to stem the heresy of Berengarius, which consisted in the denial of transubstantiation: and in 1264 he published a bull commanding the celebration of the feast on the Thursday following the first Sunday after Pentecost throughout the Church. However, Urban IV. died shortly afterwards, and, as Durandus (who lived twenty-two years after Urban) is silent on the feast of Corpus Christi, probably the bull was never executed, although undoubtedly Urban himself and the Roman Court celebrated the feast. Clement V. in the Council of Vienne confirmed Urban's constitution. John XXII., who succeeded Clement in 1316, took great pains to secure the celebration of the feast; while Martin V. and Eugenius IV. promoted the devotion to Corpus Christi by grants of indulgences. The Council of Trent speaks of Corpus Christi as a triumph over heresy, and in Sess. xiii. can. 6, anathematises those who censure the feast or procession of the Blessed Sacrament. This custom of carrying the Blessed Sacrament in procession on Corpus Christi has been almost from the first a recognised part of the ceremonial, if it was not, as many authors think, actually instituted by Urban IV. The office which is still used was composed by St. Thomas of Aquin at the bidding of Urban IV.

CORPUS JURIS CIVILIS. The body of the Roman law, as it was codified and reduced to order by Justinian, in the sixth century after Christ. It consists of (1) the Digest, a classified compilation of the decisions of the best Roman jurisconsults; (2) the Code, a collection of the Imperial constitutions; (3) the Institutes, a text-book for students; (4) the Novels, or constitutions published by Justinian after the Code was completed. The Digest and Code are also called the Pandects.

sults on all points of disputed law: this, when translated into Greek, was called "Pandectæ"; (2) the Code, a general collection of the laws then in force in the empire; (3) the Institutes, a treatise, founded on the Digest, on the first principles and elements of law; (4) the Novels, a collection of the constitutions and edicts published by Justinian himself, whereby great innovations and alterations were made in the ancient law. In imitation of the Roman lawyers, the canonists have digested the great body of decisions and decrees constituting the canon law [see that article] into a Corpus juris canonici.

COTTA. Cotæ (the form Coti is also found) are mentioned, as an ordinary garment worn by laymen, in the synod of Metz, anno 888. But in the thirteenth century cotæ were regarded as identical with surplices, and the 14th Roman Ordo says the Pope's chaplain must wear a cotta or surplice ("cottam seu superpelliciuм"). The word cotta is commonly used now in Italy for surplice, and is also employed by some English Catholics. (Hefele, "Beiträge," vol. ii. p. 178. See under SURPLICE.)

COUNCIL. Concilium and σύνοδος are synonymous, and denote, first, meetings of any kind, and next, in a more restricted sense, assemblies of the rulers of the Church legally convoked, for the discussion and decision of ecclesiastical affairs. We find concilium employed in this technical sense by Tertullian about 200 A.D., and σύνοδος perhaps a century later in the Apostolic Canons. Acts xv. furnishes the first example of such a council, and we may conclude that the Apostles held it in consequence of a divine commission; otherwise they would not have dared to say "It hath seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us." Language of the same kind is frequently used by or applied to later councils. Thus Constantine professed to revere the decision of the Nicene Fathers as "the sentence of the Son of God." Athanasius and Augustine express themselves in the same way, while Gregory the Great compares the authority of the first four councils with that of the four Gospels. After the Apostolic Council, held according to the most probable chronology in A.D. 51, we next hear of councils which met in Asia about 150 and were occasioned by the Montanist controversy.

I. Classification of Councils.

(a) Œcumenical councils are those to which the bishops and others entitled to vote [see below] are convoked from the whole world (οἰκουμένη) under the presidency of the Pope or his legates, and the decrees of which, having received Papal confirmation, bind all Christians. The definition assumes the possibility that a council œcumenical in its convocation may not succeed in getting its decrees acknowledged as of œcumenical authority. Such was the case with the Robber-synod of 449, and, in part, with the councils of Constance and Basle.

(β) Synods of the East or of the West. The first Council of Constantinople was originally a mere Council of the East and ranks as œcumenical only because its decrees on faith were ultimately received in the West also.

(γ) Patriarchal, national, and primatial councils, representing a whole patriarchate, a whole nation, or, lastly, the several provinces subject to a primate.[1]

(δ) Provincial councils, under the metropolitan of a province.

(ε) Diocesan synods, consisting of the clergy of the diocese and presided over by the bishop or vicar-general.

We may add two other kinds of council, which are abnormal, viz.—

(ζ) Councils held at Constantinople and consisting of bishops from any part of the world who happened to be at the time in that imperial city. They were called σύνοδοι ἐνδημοῦσαι.

(η) Mixed councils, meeting to settle both spiritual and civil matters. They were composed of secular as well as ecclesiastical dignitaries. Sometimes, though not always, the clergy and laity voted in separate chambers. Such councils were held during the early middle age in Italy, France, England, Germany, and Spain.

II. Convocation of Councils. — The right of the bishop to convoke diocesan, the metropolitan to convoke provincial, the patriarch or primate to convoke national synods, &c., has always been clear and undoubted. Logically and according to the nature of the thing, the convocation of general councils must proceed from the head of the universal Church, viz. from the Pope. This principle was recognised in ancient times, for Socrates tells us that Pope Julius I., about the year 341, stated the acknowledged law of Christendom to be, that "the churches must not pass laws (κανονίζειν) contrary to the judgment of the Bishop of Rome." However, in early times, the emperors, who often defrayed the travelling expenses of the bishops, were allowed to take a great part in convoking general councils. "The first eight general councils were convoked by the emperors. All the later ones, on the other hand, were called and summoned by the Popes: but even in the earlier councils we see the Popes taking a certain part in their convocation, and this share which the Popes took in summoning them appears more or less prominently in individual instances." (Hefele, "Einleitung Concil." § 3). All general councils from the ninth onwards were directly convoked by the Popes; although, even in the West, lesser councils were convoked by emperors and kings. In the Fifth Lateran Council (Sess. xi.) Leo X. put great stress on the principle that the right of convoking, removing and dissolving general councils belongs to the Popes.

[1] Another class may be added, viz. those representing certain neighbouring provinces, but not all the provinces subject to the primate.

III. Members of Councils.—The diocesan synod must be distinguished from all other synods or councils. It consists (putting aside the bishop of the diocese), as a rule, only of the inferior clergy. The bishop alone decides, the other members having at most a consultative vote. The bishop is bound to summon the deans, arch-priests, vicars foran, the vicar-general, the clergy with cure of souls, and, according to the later canon law, the canons of the cathedral and collegiate churches, with their provosts, and the abbates sæculares. Cathedral prebendaries who are not canons need not be summoned, but are bound to attend if called upon to do so. The "simple clerics"—i.e. those without cure of souls or dignity—need not attend, unless the object of the synod is to reform the clergy, or to communicate the decrees of a provincial council. Members of exempt religious orders, if their monasteries are connected with others and placed under a general chapter, need not attend, unless they have cure of souls. In other cases, religious must be present at the synod.

As to other councils, they are composed

(α) Of bishops. Chorepiscopi appear at early synods. Whether titular bishops are entitled to vote has been disputed. They had, however, equal rights with other bishops at the Vatican Council, where 117 such bishops were present.

(β) Priests and deacons had a decisive vote in a council if they represented absent bishops, as appears from innumerable instances in the acts of early councils. At the Council of Trent this right was given to the procurators of absent bishops only with great limitations. At the Vatican Council such procurators were not even admitted to the Council Hall. Other clerics have been employed from early times as notaries.

(γ) The archimandrites, even if priests, had no voice at the early councils. From the seventh century the practice with regard to admitting the votes of abbots began to vary; and archdeacons sometimes were allowed to vote, even if their bishop was present. At the end of the mediæval period it was generally held that Cardinals, even if not bishops, and abbots were entitled to vote, and this right they have maintained; while a like privilege is extended to the generals of regular orders. At the last general council Abbots Nullius (i.e. of quasi-episcopal jurisdiction), mitred abbots of whole orders or congregations of monasteries, generals, &c., of clerks regular, mendicant and monastic orders, were allowed to vote.

(δ) Theologians (e.g. doctors in theology and canon law) were also called to consult at synods. But it was only in exceptional circumstances—e.g. in times of storm and confusion such as prevailed during the Synods of Constance and Basle—that they voted.

(ε) Although the earliest councils were composed merely of bishops, still in the third century laymen began to attend in Africa and Italy; and even in 1598, the Congregation of the Council expressly declared that distinguished and well-instructed laymen might be invited to attend provincial councils. Lay people, however, were merely present to give advice, make complaints, assent to the decisions, &c. They had no claim to a decisive vote, and usually did not sign the decrees. We even find the Abbess St. Hilda present at the Council of Whitby, in 664, and her successor Ælfleda at a Northumbrian council. The Roman emperors, personally or by their representatives, attended general councils. We also find kings or their commissaries present at national and provincial synods. However, Rome holds fast to the principle that no royal commissary may be present at any council, except a general one in which "faith, reformation, and peace" are in question.

IV. The Presidency at Councils.—The bishop of right presides at diocesan, the metropolitan at provincial, the Pope or his legates at general councils. True, ancient authorities do undoubtedly attribute a presidency at general councils to the Emperor. However, this is but an apparent difficulty. The presidency of the emperor was a mere presidency of honour. It was his place to provide for peace and order, to assist in giving effect to the conciliar decrees; but it was the Papal legates who presided over the council when occupied in its proper business of deciding questions on faith and discipline. Thus the Emperor Theodosius II. says, in his edict addressed to the Council of Ephesus, that he had sent Count Candidian to represent him, but that this commissary of his was to take no part in dogmatic disputes, since "it is unlawful for one who is not enrolled in the list of the most holy bishops to mingle in ecclesiastical inquiries." That the Papal legates did as a matter of fact preside at the early councils is proved at length by Hefele. The Council of Chalcedon acknowledged that Pope Leo, by his legates, presided over it—"the head over the members." At Nicæa, Osius, Vitus, and Vincentius, as Papal legates, signed before all other members of the council. It would be useless to multiply evidence on this point from later councils.

V. The Confirmation of Conciliar Decrees.—The decrees of general councils have no binding authority till confirmed by the Pope. This admits of easy proof from the nature of the case, because a council cannot be said to represent the teaching Church till the visible head of the Church has given his approval. At the same time, the evidence on this point with regard to early councils is not always conclusive, a fact which need not surprise us when we remember that the Popes were accustomed to send legates with full instructions, and that usually the Pope had already made his own mind clear on the points in debate, so that the formal approbation of the Pope did not attract special notice. Still, the principles of the early were identical with those of the present Church on this point. It cannot be denied that the Council of Chalcedon considered the Papal confirmation of its decrees a matter of absolute necessity; and the strong language in which this declaration is made shows that the Pope's right of confirmation was an understood thing in the Church. Taking this for granted, we may well believe that the Roman synod of 485 has preserved the true tradition of historical fact in its statement that the Fathers of Nicæa "reserved the confirmation and authorisation of their proceedings to the holy Roman Church" ("confirmationem rerum atque auctoritatem sanctæ Romanæ ecclesiæ detulerunt"), strengthened as this statement is by the words of Julius I. quoted above.

VI. The infallibility of general councils so confirmed follows from that of the Church [see the article]. "What God," says St. Athanasius, "has spoken through the Council of Nicæa remains for ever." St. Leo considered the "consent" of the Council of Chalcedon to be irretractabilis—i.e. to exclude all further question—and denies that anyone who rejected its decrees could be counted a Catholic.

VII. Order and Method of Voting.—Usually bishops took their places according to the rank of their sees, though in Africa they sat according to the date of their ordination. At the Vatican Council the members were arranged in accordance with their hierarchical rank. First came the five cardinal legates (unless, of course, the Pope himself was there), then the Cardinals, patriarchs, primates, archbishops, bishops (according to seniority), abbots, generals of orders, &c. As a rule, the voting at councils has always been by single voices. At Constance, however, in order to keep the Italian prelates from outweighing the rest, the voting was by nations [see the article CONSTANCE.] At Basle the members were divided into four deputations, which met separately. Decrees passed by three deputations were accepted as conciliar. At Trent the matters to be discussed were first debated and prepared for the council in special commissions, so that no disputations appear in the Tridentine acts. A similar method was pursued at the Vatican Council.

VIII. Number and Names of Œcumenical Councils.—(1) Nicæa, 325; (2) First of Constantinople, 381; (3) Ephesus, 431; (4) Chalcedon, 451; (5) Second of Constantinople, 553; (6) Third of Constantinople, 680; (7) Second of Nicæa, 787; (8) Fourth of Constantinople, 869; (9) First Lateran, 1123; (10) Second Lateran, 1139; (11) Third Lateran, 1179; (12) Fourth Lateran, 1215; (13) First of Lyons, 1245; (14) Second of Lyons, 1274; (15) Vienne, 1311; (16) Constance, 1414–1418. This council was only œcumenical in its last sessions (42–45 inclusive) and with respect to certain decrees of earlier sessions, approved by Martin V. (17) Basle, 1431 and following years, only œcumenical till the end of the 25th session, and of these decrees Eugenius IV. approved such only as dealt with the extirpation of heresy, the peace of Christendom and the reform of the Church, and which at the same time did not derogate from the rights of the Holy See. (18) Ferrara-Florence, 1438–1442: really a continuation of Basle. (19) Fifth Lateran, 1512-1517; (20) Trent, 1545–1563; (21) Vatican, December 8, 1869, to July 18, 1870: still unfinished.

IX. Collections of Councils.—Early collections by Merlin (Paris, 1523, in one folio); Crabbe (Cologne, 1538, in two folios); Surius (1567, Cologne, four folios); Binius (Cologne, 1606, four folios). The Roman edition of 1608–1612 only contains general councils; in it the Greek text of very many conciliar acts was for the first time printed. This Roman edition formed the basis of all the later collections, of which the chief are the Collectio Regia (Paris, 1644, in thirty-seven folios); the collection of the Jesuit Hardouin (Paris, 1715, in twelve folios); and that of Mansi, who, building on the foundations of Labbe, Cossart, and Colet, published at Florence in 1759 and the following years his great collection consisting of thirty-one folios. This is the most perfect of all the collections, but it only reaches to the fifteenth century. Hardouin, which goes down to 1714, and is more correct in the printing than Mansi, is still much used. (From Hefele's "Einleitung Concil." vol. i.)

COWL (cucullus, cuculla). Cucullus is classical; in a well-known passage in Juvenal's sixth satire "nocturni cuculli" mean a cap or hood enveloping the head, and at the wearer's will concealing the features. In post-classical and mediæval writers cuculla is the more usual form. The cowl was a garment with a hood, vestis caputiata, black or grey or brown, varying in length in different ages and according to the usages of different orders, but having these two permanent characteristics, that it covered the head and shoulders, and that it was without sleeves. Cassian, speaking of the solitaries of Egypt about the end of the fourth century, says that they used very small cowls (covering the head, but barely reaching the shoulders), which they wore both day and night. St. Benedict of Aniane, about A.D. 800, finding that his monks had adopted the practice of wearing the cowl very long, so as to reach the heels, ordered that for the future it should not exceed two cubits in length. In the fourteenth century the cowl was sometimes confounded with the frock; whence Clement V. at the Council of Vienne said, "We declare that we understand by the name of cowl (cuculla), a habit long and full, but without sleeves; and by frock, a long habit with long and wide sleeves." (Ducange, Cucullus.)

CREATION. Making out of nothing. That God did so create out of nothing is the great doctrine which is expressed in the first verse of the Bible, and which became a cardinal doctrine of the Jewish and afterwards of the Christian faith. The belief in creation is, indeed, a tenet peculiar to revealed religion. Heathen religions attributed the origin of the world to emanation, or else represented it as made out of pre-existing matter. The doctrine of ancient philosophers is summed up in the familiar axiom, "Nothing is made out of nothing."

It is true that neither the Hebrew word בָּרָא nor the Latin creare, by which it is rendered in the Vulgate, means of itself to make out of nothing. Creare may mean to "bear a child," as in Virgil's line, "Silvicolæ Fauno Dryope quam nympha crearat," and בָּרָא, which probably meant originally to "hew out,"[1] is employed to express all that God produces in the kingdom of nature (Num. xvi. 30), or of grace (Ex. xxxiv. 10, Ps. li. 12), even if such production does not answer to the idea of creation in the strict sense. But that Genesis means to teach that the world was made out of nothing is plain, because it is said that "God created the heavens and the earth," the Hebrew phrase for the entire universe, and also because the mention of chaos ("the earth was without form and void") is placed significantly after that of God's creative act.

The Fourth Lateran Council defines that God created everything out of nothing, and that the world is not eternal, but had a beginning. God created by his free act and without any change in his own nature. According to the common teaching of theologians, no creature can receive power to create, because it needs an infinite might to bridge over the infinite distance between nothing and being. Whether we can suppose, without involving ourselves in contradiction, that God could, had it so pleased him, have created from all eternity, so that, e.g., angels would have been eternal by participation, is a question freely disputed in the schools. We are only required to believe that as a matter of fact God did not so create.

[1] If at least we may judge from the use of the Piel in Jos. xvii. 15. The Piel is used only of the slow work of man; the Kal only of the free act of God. See Ewald, Grammar, § 126 a.

The scientific difficulties in the six days of creation cannot be discussed here. But we have a few words to say on the latitude of interpretation permitted in the Church. (1) St. Augustine interprets the six days in a purely figurative and mystical sense; and St. Thomas, though he does not actually adopt this view, treats it with marked respect. In comparatively modern times Cajetan gave an interpretation which agrees at least on the main point with that of St. Augustine, for he taught, according to Petavius, that "all was produced in a moment; but that the history of creation was arranged by Moses in six days, that he might adapt his narration to six grades of natural perfection." (2) Although undoubtedly the scholastics as a rule understood the "days" as natural days of twenty-four hours, still many Catholic writers in modern times have interpreted the days as geological periods, and this without incurring any censure. "Since the divine Scripture," says St. Thomas, "may be expounded in many ways, it is not right to attach oneself so strictly to any one opinion as still to maintain it after sure reason has proved the statement, supposed to be contained in Scripture, false; lest on this account Scripture be derided by infidels, and the way to faith closed against them." (See St. Thomas, Par. I. qu. lxxiv., and Petavius, "De Opere VI Dierum." The last quotation from St. Thomas is taken from a note to Petavius in the edition of 1866.)

CREDENCE. A table on which the cruets with wine and water, the humeral veil for the subdeacon, the burse, chalice, the candlesticks borne by the acolytes, &c. &c., are placed during High Mass, and from which they are taken when required for use in the function. The credence should be on the epistle side of the altar. It should be covered with a linen cloth, but neither cross nor images should be placed upon it. In ancient times, when the oblations were presented by the faithful during Mass, there was not the same necessity for the use of a credence. (Gavant. tom. I. p. ii. tit. 2.)

The name is derived from the Italian credenzare, to taste meats and drinks before offering them to another for the purpose of showing him that he might believe them free from poison and wholesome. This practice is still observed when the Pope celebrates Mass. The wine and altar-breads are tasted before being brought to him at the offertory.

CREED. A summary of the chief articles of faith. Various names are used, to signify what we now mean by the word Creed, in early writers. Clement of Alexandria speaks of the πίστις or "faith" which served as the basis of catechetical instruction.[1] Origen, in the Latin translation of Rufinus, describes the Creed as a "compressed word" ("verbum breviatum"), in allusion to Romans ix. 28. Tertullian[2] speaks of the "words of the oath" ("verba sacramenti"), perhaps with reference to the confession of faith made in baptism. Lastly, in Cyprian's[3] time we meet with the word "symbolum" or token, by which a man might be known and recognised as a Christian; and this term has been ever since familiar in the Church. Our "Credo" or Creed of course simply indicates the word with which most such professions of faith begin.

Four Creeds are at present used in the Catholic Church, viz. the Apostles' Creed, the Nicene, the Athanasian, and that of Pius IV.

I. The Apostles' Creed.—It is certain from the Acts that persons desirous of baptism were questioned as to their faith. When the Ethiopian eunuch wished to be baptised, "Philip said: If thou believest with thy whole heart, thou mayest. And he answering, said: I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." Thus even in Apostolic times a profession of faith was made in baptism, and from this no doubt the so-called "Apostles' Creed" arose. But neither Scripture nor any single writer of the first three centuries gives at length the profession of faith made at baptism. However, in Irenæus and Tertullian we meet with allusions from which we can construct a form used at baptism and approaching very nearly to the "Apostles' Creed" in its present shape. It is impossible, for example, to believe that in the following passage of [1] Clem. Al. Pædag. i. 1, § 38; Strom. vii. 10, § 56. So Probst interprets these passages; but the allusion to a definite Creed seems far from certain.

[2] Tertullian, Ad Martyr. 3. Here again Probst's interpretation is precarious.

[3] Cyprian. Epp. ed. Hartel. lxix. § 7.

Irenæus the coincidence, in words and order of ideas, with our present Creed is accidental. He says that in virtue of Apostolic tradition all who belong to the Church have the same faith, since "all teach one and the same God the Father, and believe the same economy of the Incarnation of the Son of God, and know the same gift of the Spirit, and meditate on the same precepts, and maintain the same form of constitution with respect to the Church, and look for the same coming of the Lord, and wait for the same salvation of the whole man—that is, of the soul and body."[1] The supposition that Irenæus had a formula like the Apostles' Creed in his mind when he wrote is confirmed by a statement which he makes elsewhere, that the catechumens received the unchangeable rule of the faith in baptism; and by the fact that other traces of the formula appear in Clement of Alexandria and in Tertullian. At a later time, Rufinus († 410) wrote an exposition of the "symbol" of the Apostles, and from this work we receive definite information on the form of words in use. Rufinus says that whereas in other churches changes were made in the Apostles' Creed in order to meet new heresies, the Roman Church, on the contrary, had preserved the original form, partly because no heresy had ever arisen in that city, partly because there the catechumens had to recite the Creed publicly before receiving baptism. The Roman form according to Rufinus ran thus: "I believe in God the Father Almighty, and in Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord, who was born from (de) the Holy Ghost, of (ex) the Virgin Mary, crucified under Pontius Pilate and buried, rose the third day from the dead, ascended into heaven, thence he will come to judge the living and the dead. And in the Holy Ghost, the holy Church, the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the flesh." Thus the articles "descended into hell," "the communion of saints," "eternal life," and the words "suffered," "catholic," "amen," were not in the original form of the Creed. They were added in the fifth century.

We are now in a position to answer the question, How far does the "Apostles' Creed" deserve its name? It is rightly so called, if we understand the title to signify that it is a summary of Apostolic teaching; and there are at least probable grounds for the hypothesis that it is the extension of a form used from the Apostles' time in baptism. But, on the other hand, the legend that each of the Apostles contributed one of the twelve articles to the Creed is not supported by good evidence and is hard to reconcile with attested fact. It probably arose from a misinterpretation of the word "collatio," which Rufinus used to translate "symbolum." He explains "collatio" to mean that which several collect together ("id quod plures in unum conferunt"), so that the "symbol" was a summary of the faith common to all the Apostles. But the word "collatio" led to the notion that the Apostles actually contributed articles to the Creed; and in a sermon falsely attributed to Augustine we actually meet with the legend that St. Peter said, "I believe in God the Father," &c.; St. Andrew, "and in Jesus Christ," &c.; and St. James, "who was conceived by the Holy Ghost," &c. Traces of the story also appear in letters of St. Peter to St. James, spurious in the first instance, and then interpolated by Pseudo-Isidore. (See Probst, "Lehre und Gebet in den ersten drei Jahrhund.")

II. The Nicene Creed (really the Creed of Nicæa and Constantinople).—The following Creed was put forth by the Fathers of Nicæa in 325. "We believe in one God the Father Almighty, Maker of all things visible and invisible, and in one Lord Jesus Christ the Son of God, only begotten from the Father, i.e. from the substance of the Father: God from God, light from light, true God from true God, begotten not made, consubstantial with the Father, through whom all things came into being, both the things in heaven and the things in earth; who for us men and for our salvation came down and was made flesh, became man, suffered and rose again on the third day and ascended into heaven, and is to come to judge the living and the dead. And in the Holy Ghost."[1] Osius of Cordova, according to St. Athanasius—Athanasius himself, according to St. Hilary—had great part in drawing up this Creed.

At Constantinople in 381 a Creed with one notable exception almost precisely identical with what we are accustomed to call the Nicene Creed was received. We say received, for Tillemont has proved that this enlarged form of the Nicene Creed was in use some years before the Council of Constantinople. Two additions to the old Nicene formula adopted at [1] Iren. i. 9, 4.

Constantinople deserve special notice. The clause "of whose kingdom there shall be no end" was added against Marcellus of Ancyra, who denied that Christ's reign would continue after the day of judgment.[1] Again, after "and in the Holy Ghost," the words "the Lord the life-giver, who proceedeth from the Father, who with the Father and Son," &c., were appended against the Macedonians who denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost.

The words Filioque, "proceeding from the Father and the Son," occur in Spanish confessions of faith the earliest of which was drawn up in 447. Pope Leo, attacking the anti-Trinitarian errors of the Priscillianists in a letter to Turibius, a Spanish bishop, spoke of the Holy Ghost as proceeding "from each," i.e. from the Father and the Son, and hence the formula "proceeding from the Father and the Son" became usual among Spanish Catholics, and was added by them to the Nicene Creed in the Synod of Toledo (anno 653). During the reign of Charlemagne the Nicene Creed was sung with the addition of the "Filioque" in the Frankish church, and the Latin monks settled on the Mount of Olives offended the Greeks by singing the Creed as they had been accustomed to hear it in the imperial chapel. As late at least as the ninth century this addition was not made to the Creed in Rome itself. In fact Leo III., though he approved the doctrine that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son, refused to add the words "Filioque" to the Creed, even when urged to do so. For the doctrine of the double procession we must refer to the article on the TRINITY. But this is the place to mention an objection made by the Greeks to the addition, apart from the dogmatic controversy. They said that the Council of Ephesus had expressly forbidden any Creed except the Nicene to be used. Petavius replies that the council meant simply to forbid a Creed contrary to that of Nicæa, and that a Creed in perfect agreement with that of Nicæa is not "another Creed" (ἑτέραν πίστιν) in the sense of the Fathers of Ephesus. They were referring to a new and heterodox Creed concocted by Nestorius. We may add that even if the council had meant to interdict the use of another Creed, this was a mere disciplinary rule, and that it could be set aside at any time by competent authority. At Florence it was defined that this addition was "lawfully and reasonably" made to the Creed.

On all Sundays and on the feasts of our Lord, his Blessed Mother, Apostles, doctors, &c., the Creed is sung at Mass immediately after the Gospel, that the people may show their faith in the doctrine of Christ which the Gospels contain. It is fitting, St. Thomas says, that it should be sung on the feasts of our Lord, the Blessed Virgin and the Apostles, "who founded this faith." At what time the Creed began to be recited in the Roman Mass is very doubtful. Apparently it was said as early at least as the ninth century, though it was not sung till the beginning of the eleventh. In the East this practice was introduced much earlier, viz. in the fifth or sixth century.

III. Athanasian Creed.—By this name is commonly called the confession of faith in the breviary (known as "Quicunque vult," from its first words), which is said on Sunday at prime. Its proper designation would seem to be "Fides Catholica," so at least it is headed in the Utrecht Psalter, a MS. of the sixth century, which contains the earliest copy known to exist. How early it was attributed to St. Athanasius, among whose genuine works it does not appear, it is difficult to say. A canon passed by a Council of Autun, in the time of Bishop Leodegar, about 640, enjoins the use of what can be nothing else than this Creed under the name of "the faith of the holy prelate Athanasius;" but some doubt exists as to the true date of this canon. The Creed, being in Latin, was unknown in the East for many centuries after it had received wide diffusion in the West. The fact of its being written in Latin was accounted for by the Papal envoys who visited the East in 1233, after the Latin conquest of Constantinople, on the ground that St. Athanasius composed it during the period of his exile in the West. It was after this translated into Greek, and its doctrine was admitted by the Eastern Church. In this theory of its composition while Athanasius was in exile there is nothing intrinsically improbable: only it lacks direct confirmation. Waterland, who wrote a learned dissertation on this Creed near the beginning of the last century, was inclined, as is well known, to assign its authorship to St. Hilary of Arles (about 430). Others have given it to Venantius Fortunatus, bishop of Poitiers in the sixth century. A third conjecture, of greater plausibility than either of the former two, would trace it to Virgilius of Thapsus, an African bishop, who composed a treatise on the Trinity in the fifth century. This perhaps is a matter which never can be certainly determined. A far more important fact about the Quicunque is, that, whether written by Athanasius or not, its teaching is distinctly Athanasian. This was proved to demonstration by the late Mr. Brewer, in the work[1] in which he replied to the volume by Mr. Ffoulkes presently to be noticed. It has also been often observed that the cast of doctrine which this Creed presents suits the second half of the fourth century better than any earlier or later time. It is difficult to believe that if it had been written after the Council of Ephesus (431) it would not have contained words excluding more pointedly the error of Nestorius; still more that, if later than the Council of Chalcedon (451), it would not have used some expression about the "two natures," condemning more distinctly the heresy of Eutyches. Again, it is absolutely silent on the questions agitated in the great Pelagian controversy, and by the Monothelites. It seems undeniable that it might have been written by St. Athanasius, even if it was not.

An elaborate attempt[2] was made a few years ago to prove the Quicunque to be a forgery of the age of Charlemagne! The author of this view, after reading Alcuin's letter to Paulinus the patriarch of Aquileia, written about 800 (in which our countryman thanks Paulinus for having sent him a "libellus" containing a description [taxatio] of the Catholic faith, which in the writer's opinion might with great advantage be circulated among the clergy as a "symbolum fidei," and committed by them to memory), boldly came to the conclusion that the tract here spoken of—though Alcuin does not cite one word of it—was and could be nothing else than the Quicunque vult! He stopped at nothing which could discredit the natural objections to such a view, charging Alcuin, Paulinus, and Charlemagne with being leagued in a conspiracy to palm off this composition of Paulinus upon the whole Church as the genuine work of Athanasius, taxing Alcuin in particular with having lent himself, out of mere cowardly subserviency, to the propagation of the forgery, and crediting the emperor alone with what are called "the damnatory clauses." Mr. Brewer, in the work already cited, pointed out that Mr. Ffoulkes's theory rested simply on a subjective hypothesis, and that not a single shred of positive evidence could be produced in its support. He might have added that the concluding portion of the same letter of Alcuin on which Mr. Ffoulkes relies appears to be inconsistent with his theory. After speaking of the "symbolum fidei" composed by Paulinus, as above mentioned, Alcuin goes on to speak of three prevailing errors: one, a revived Adoptionism springing up in Spain; the second, an irregular mode of administering baptism which had come into use in some northern region; the third, a wrong view as to the condition of the souls of saints before the day of judgment. "But it is thy part," he proceeds, "O chosen pastor, when the Philistines . . . blaspheme the army of the living God, to crush them all with a single stroke of truth" ("uno veritatis ictu totos conterere"). The "libellus" of Paulinus, then, contained a refutation of these three errors; if so, it could not be the Athanasian Creed, which contains nothing of the kind.

But the theory of the late origin of the Creed was destined to be still more effectually demolished. As the controversy raised by Mr. Ffoulkes's book proceeded, it transpired that there was in Holland an ancient copy of the Creed, known as the Utrecht Psalter. Photographs of this MS. were obtained, and Lord Romilly, then Master of the Rolls, instructed the late Sir Thomas D. Hardy, Deputy-Keeper of the Records, to prepare a report on the subject of the antiquity of the Psalter. The report—a most interesting and valuable document—was prepared accordingly. For our present purpose it is enough to say that it records the unhesitating opinion of all skilled palæographists who had seen the MS. or the photographs, that the copy of the Quicunque vult which it contains is in a handwriting not later at any rate than the seventh century. The words of Sir Thomas Hardy—and no one could speak with more authority on such a matter—are, "The handwriting is certainly of the sixth century."

It is well known that Cranmer and the other reformers, far from rejecting the Quicunque, treated it with great honour; and to this day, in spite of many efforts to get rid of it, it is recited on certain specified days in the Anglican service. The disestablished Irish Church has rendered its use optional instead of compulsory. In the Catholic Church it is said, as above mentioned, on Sundays at prime, except on those Sundays (Easter Day, Pentecost, and others) for which there is a special office.

IV. The Creed of Pius IV.—The Council of Trent (Sess. xxv. De Reform. cap. 2) required archbishops, bishops, &c., in the next provincial council to promise true obedience to the Pope, and to anathematise all heresies, especially those condemned at Trent. All the clergy bound to attend the diocesan synod were required to make the same protestation at the first diocesan synod at which they were present; and from doctors, masters, &c., in universities an oath to teach according to the decrees and definitions of Trent was to be exacted at the beginning of each year. Accordingly, Pius IV., in the year 1564, published a "Profession of the Tridentine Faith." It consists of the Nicæno-Constantinopolitan Creed with a summary of the Tridentine definitions. It now also contains a profession of belief in the definitions of the Vatican Council.

CREMATION. On May 19, 1886, the following decree was issued at Rome: "Several bishops and prudent members of Christ's flock, knowing that certain men possessed of doubtful faith, or belonging to the Masonic sect, strongly contend at the present day for the practice of the Pagan custom of cremation, founding special societies to spread this custom, fear lest the minds of the faithful may be worked upon by these wiles and sophistries so as to lose by degrees esteem and reverence towards the constant Christian usage of burying the bodies of the faithful—a usage hallowed by the solemn rites of the Church. In order, therefore, that some fixed rule may be laid down for the faithful, to preserve them from the insidious doctrines above mentioned, the Supreme Congregation of the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition is asked:

"1. Is it lawful to become a member of those societies whose object is to spread the practice of cremation?

"2. Is it lawful to leave orders for the burning of one's own body or that of another?

"Their Eminences the Cardinals General Inquisitors, after grave and mature consideration, answered:

"To the first question, No; and if it is a question of societies connected with the Masonic sect, the penalties pronounced against this sect would be incurred. To the second, No.

"When these decisions were referred to our Holy Father, Pope Leo XIII., His Holiness approved and confirmed them, and directed them to be communicated to the bishops, in order that they might instruct the faithful upon the detestable abuse of burning the bodies of the dead, and might do all in their power to keep the flock entrusted to their charge from such a practice."

We have given this decree in full, so that the exact position of the Church's teaching concerning cremation may be clearly seen. There is nothing intrinsically wrong in burning the bodies of the dead. The practice might become necessary at times of excessive mortality or of danger to the living, e.g. after a battle or during a plague. But in ordinary times cremation disturbs the pious sentiments of the faithful; it is not in keeping with the beautiful rites of Christian burial; and it has been introduced by enemies of the Church for the purpose of shutting her out from one of her most touching functions. These reasons justify the condemnation above quoted. To go into the various sanitary, legal, and economical arguments for and against cremation would be beyond the scope of the present work. (See Dublin Review, April 1890; Month, May 1884.)

CRIB. The actual crib in which Christ was born is said to have been brought from Bethlehem in the seventh century, and to be now preserved in the Liberian basilica at Rome. The present custom of erecting a crib in the churches at Christmas time with figures representing our Lord, the Blessed Virgin, St. Joseph, &c., began during the thirteenth century in the Franciscan order. (Benedict XIV. "De Festis," i. n. 641, n. 679.)

CROSIER or PASTORAL STAFF (baculus pastoralis, pedum, cambuta). The staff given to the bishop at his consecration as the symbol of the authority with which he rules his flock. It is said that such a staff is first mentioned by Isidore of Seville († 636). This staff is curved at the top, straight in the middle, and pointed at the lower end. Hence the mediæval line quoted by Gavantus, "Curva trahit, quos dextra regit; pars ultima pungit." The Pope alone of all bishops actually ruling a diocese does not use a pastoral staff. According to some, this is because the curvature in the staff is a token of limited jurisdiction (?).

CROSS (SIGN OF; ADORATION OF; PARTICLES OF TRUE CROSS; FEASTS OF, &c.).

I. "God forbid," says St. Paul, "that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ," i.e. in the sufferings and death of our Saviour. No wonder, then, that the mere form of the cross, which could remind the heathen only of a horrible and ignominious death, should be dear from the first to the Christian heart; no wonder that Christians began their prayer and sanctified each action, with that sign which reminds us at once of that Sacred Passion, which is the fount of all grace and mercy. "At every step and movement," Tertullian writes, "when we go in or out, when we dress or put on our shoes, at the bath, at the table, when lights are brought, when we go to bed, when we sit down, whatever it is which occupies us, we mark the forehead with the sign of the cross."[1] From early times the image of the cross (the crux exemplata, as distinct from the crux usualis, made with the hand) was familiar to Christians. Constantine placed a cross of gold with precious stones in the chief hall of his palace.[2] Indeed, so great was the devotion of Christians to the cross that in Tertullian's time they were charged, just as Catholics are charged now, with worshipping the cross.[3]

Two points with regard to the Church's use of the cross need explanation. The former of these points is connected with the Mass. It is natural that the Church, accustomed to bless everything with the sign of the cross, should so bless the unconsecrated bread and wine. But it is surprising at first sight that the sign of the cross should be frequently made over the body and blood of Christ. Many explanations have been given, but the truth seems to be that no single explanation meets all the difficulties, and that the sign of the cross is made over the consecrated species for several reasons. Usually the rite is meant to indicate the blessing which flows forth from the body and blood of Christ. At the words "Through whom, O Lord, thou dost ever create all these good things, sancti + fiest them, givest them + life, bless + est them and bestowest them on us," the signs of the cross were originally meant to be made over the eulogia or blessed bread placed on the altar and then given to those who did not communicate. Lastly the signs of the cross made with the Host at the words, "Through Hi + m, and with Hi + m, and in Hi + m, is unto thee, God the Father + Almighty in the unity of the Holy + Ghost, all honour and glory," probably arose from the custom of making the sign of the cross in naming the Persons of the Trinity. Such at least is the result of Bishop Hefele's careful investigation of the subject. The mystical interpretations of Gavantus and Merati deserve all respect, but scarcely explain the actual origin of the practice.

The second point concerns the "adoration" of the cross on Good Friday, and the well-known statement of St. Thomas, that the cross is to be adored with latria, i.e. supreme worship. The word "adore" with respect to the cross occurs from early times—e.g. in a verse of Lactantius quoted by Benedict XIV.[1] The language of St. Thomas[2] need create no difficulty if properly understood. We may, he says, regard an image in two ways: (1) in itself, as a piece of wood or the like, and so "no reverence is given to the image of Christ;" or (2) as representing something else, and in this way we may give to the cross relatively—i.e. to the cross as carrying on our mind to Christ—the same honour which we give to Christ absolutely, i.e. in himself. We need not, as Bossuet points out, in a letter on this subject, adopt St. Thomas's mode of expression, but there is nothing in it to scandalise a person of sense and candour.

II. Particles of the true Cross.—From the time that the cross on which Christ died was found by Helena, mother of Constantine, Christians esteemed it a great happiness to possess a particle of its sacred wood. St. Paulinus speaks of such a particle as a "protection of present and pledge of eternal salvation." Many such minute particles of the true cross are still in the possession of religious houses, churches, or even private persons. Usually the particle is placed in a glass like a monstrance which is closed with the Papal or episcopal seal. The faithful usually show their devotion by kissing this glass; the particles may be placed on the altar, incensed at solemn Mass, used to bless the people, &c.

III. Feasts of the Cross.

(a) The "Finding of the Cross," a feast kept on May 3rd, commemorates an event which occurred in 326. The heathen had filled up our Lord's tomb with rubbish, and Hadrian had erected a temple of Venus on the spot. Constantine wrote to Macarius, then bishop of Jerusalem, telling him that he wished to erect a costly church over the sepulchre, and in 326 Helena, mother of Constantine, instituted a search for this holy tomb. Not only did she find the tomb itself, but also three crosses near to it, with nails and the inscription on our Lord's cross, lying apart. Macarius, unable to discover which of the three was the cross of Christ, brought a lady in the last extremity of illness to the spot, and when the last of the three crosses touched her, she was suddenly cured. Helena sent the nails, the title[1] and a considerable part of the true cross, thus miraculously attested, to Constantine. The rest of the cross was left at Jerusalem, placed in a silver case, and in the succeeding age it was shown once a year, on Good Friday, in order that it might be venerated by the faithful. This finding of the cross and the miracle are attested by authors, so many, of such high authority, and who lived so near the event (viz. Rufinus, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret), that we cannot reasonably refuse to believe it. (See Fleury, xi. 32, and Benedict XIV. "De Fest." where the references are given.) The Bollandists conjecture that the feast, which is mentioned in the Sacramentary of St. Gregory, was first kept in the church of Santa Croce at Rome and that gradually the commemoration spread through the West. Gregory XI. ordered a special office to be composed for this feast. Clement VIII. raised it to a double of the second class, and removed certain parts of the old office which were founded on apocryphal "Acts."

(β) The "Exaltation of the Cross" was celebrated from ancient times in memory of the miraculous apparition which Constantine saw in the year 317 as he was preparing to fight against Maxentius. He beheld in the daylight a luminous cross, with the inscription "Conquer by this" (τούτῳ νίκα). Eusebius assures us that he had heard the story related on oath by Constantine himself.[1] Thomassin supposes that Constantine himself may have caused the feast to be instituted.[2] The day was afterwards kept with greater solemnity when, after his victory over the Persians in 627, Heraclius recovered the true cross, which Chosroes, the Persian Emperor, had carried away when he became master of Jerusalem, three years before. Coins were struck to commemorate the recovery of the cross. Heraclius first of all replaced the cross in Jerusalem, and then for the sake of safety put it in the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople. Clement VIII. made the feast of the Exaltation (Sept. 14) a greater double.

IV. Cross and Cross-bearers in Processions.—The cross is carried between two acolytes bearing lights. The cross-bearer in the more solemn processions should be a subdeacon, distinct from the subdeacon of the Mass, and wearing the vestments of his order. Regulars carry the cross with a veil hanging from it, "to indicate," if Gavantus may be trusted, "their subjection and inferiority to the secular clergy. The back of the cross should be turned to the cross-bearer, as a symbol of the duty laid on Christians of following their Master; but the Papal or archiepiscopal cross is turned towards the Pope or archbishop, to show that the thought of Christ crucified is to support them in their toils." The use of the cross in processions may be traced, Baronius says, further back than the year 398. (Gavantus, P.I. tit. 19.)

CRUCIFIX. The cross, as we have shown in an earlier article, was used in Christian worship from the earliest times; the crucifix, or representation of Christ crucified, was probably introduced much later. No crucifix has been found in the Catacombs; no certain allusion to a crucifix is made by any Christian writer of the first four centuries. It is true that in excavations made on the Palatine hill near the church of St. Anastasia, a picture was found on the wall known as the "blasphemous crucifix." A figure with the body of a man and the head of an ass is hanging on a cross, a slave stands by adoring the figure, and the inscription, in Greek uncials, runs Ἀλεξάμενος σέβετε[αι?] θεόν, Alexamenus worships [his] God. This caricature belongs no doubt to the ante-Nicene age; but does it prove the use of crucifixes among Christians at that time? It might be regarded as an additional proof, were other and more convincing ones forthcoming. As it is, we must suppose that a heathen, having heard that the Christians worshipped a crucified God, and being also familiar with the common calumny that the Christians worshipped the head of an ass, combined the two ideas in his rude fresco.

In the first four centuries, then, there is no conclusive evidence that Christians ever placed a figure on the cross. In the fifth century it became usual to put the figure of a lamb or even a bust of Christ on the cross, sometimes above, sometimes below, sometimes in the middle, and many crucifixes of this kind still exist. St. Paulinus of Nola (Ep. 32) describes one of them in the words

"Sub cruce sanguinea niveo stat Christus in agno;"

so that the cross here must have been red, the figure on it white.

From the sixth century onwards crucifixes in the strict sense were in use. St. Gregory of Tours ("De Gloria Martyrum," 1, 2, 3), towards the end of the sixth century, mentions a picture of the crucifixion in the church of St. Genesius at Narbonne. A small cross of brass with the figure of Christ on it was found in the grave of the Frankish sovereign Chilperic. A Syriac MS. of the Gospels, written in 586, and now in Florence, contains a picture of the crucifixion. In 692 the Synod in Trullo, recognising a custom which had already become predominant, decreed (can. 82) that for the future, instead of the Lamb, the figure of Christ should be placed on the cross.

We pass on to speak of the form given to the crucifix. In the Syriac book of the Gospels, Christ is completely clothed, with hands and feet nailed, each foot being fastened by a separate nail. In the crucifix at Narbonne described by St. Gregory, Christ's body was almost naked. But in one point all the earliest crucifixes agreed. They all represented Christ, as nailed, indeed, to the cross, but with open eyes, in dignified repose, and without any trace of pain on his face. Sometimes a royal crown was placed on his head. When the Greeks, though not before the tenth century, painted Christ on the cross, with anatomical correctness, as dying or already dead, the innovation gave great scandal to the Latins. Cardinal Humbert attacked the Greeks for this practice in very violent language, while a synod[1] under the schismatical patriarch Michael Cerularius speaks of godless men from the West who anathematised the orthodox church because it "did not change unnaturally the form of man" which Christ took. Gradually, however, the Greek custom prevailed even in the West, partly because it was reasonable, partly because Greek artists often settled in Western Europe; and D'Agincourt gives copies of Italian crucifixes from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries which follow the Greek fashion. (From Hefele, "Beiträge," &c.)

CRYPT (crypta, from κρύπτω). The word originally meant an underground place, natural or artificial, suitable for the concealment of persons or things. Juvenal gives the name of "crypta" to a sewer (Sat. v. 106); Suetonius uses it as equivalent to "cryptoporticus," a sheltered shady arcade or gallery (Calig. 58); Vitruvius classes "cryptæ" with "horrea" and "apothecæ," with the general notion of cellar, store-room, or granary. Secret and underground places, cryptæ, were often used for Christian worship in the ages of persecution. After the conversion of Constantine, churches were often built over the ancient crypts; but more generally crypts were excavated beneath churches. Besides the great advantage of securing the church from damp, this arrangement also provided a space which, when furnished with altars, could subserve at need the purposes of public worship, or might be used as a place of interment for the ecclesiastics serving the church. Good instances of the crypt may be observed at Gloucester Cathedral, at one of the churches of Bordeaux (where some remarkable property of the air in the crypt preserves bodies from decay), and beneath the ancient chapel of St. Audry belonging to the bishops of Ely, in Ely Place, lately recovered for Catholic worship. (Ducange; Facciolati.)

CULDEES. A Celtic word (ceile De, servant of God) denoting those who had strictly devoted themselves to the divine service, whether as monks or seculars. It is commonly applied to the monks whom St. Columba planted at Iona, and to the numerous communities which grew out of that foundation; the word, however, does not occur, nor is it in any way referred to, in the writings of Beda. A kind of hereditary transmission of office is sometimes traceable among them, for in the distraction and confusion of the dark ages the discipline of celibacy was much neglected; see the account by Symeon of Durham of the custodians of the body of St. Cuthbert at Lindisfarne. ("Hist. Eccl. Dunelm." ii. 12, iv. 3.)

CULTUS. Veneration or worship. Catholic theologians distinguish three kinds of Cultus. Latria (λατρεία) or supreme worship is due to God alone, and cannot be transferred to any creature without the horrible sin of idolatry. The word λατρεία is used in this sense by the Greek Fathers and corresponds to the Hebrew עבודה. Dulia (δουλεία) is that secondary veneration which Catholics give to saints and angels as the servants and special friends of God. The same idea is expressed by Cyril of Alexandria when he speaks of the "relative veneration and cultus of honour" (οὔτε προσκυνεῖν εἰθίσμεθα λατρευτικῶς ἀλλὰ σχετικῶς καὶ τιμητικῶς).[1] Lastly, hyperdulia, which is only a subdivision of dulia,[2] is that higher veneration which we give to the Blessed Virgin as the most exalted of mere creatures, though of course infinitely inferior to God and incomparably inferior to Christ in His human nature.

CURATE (curatus, one entrusted with the care of souls). The term can hardly be said to be in use among English Catholics, though common in Ireland. Irish curates, acting under the parish priests, appear to correspond to the "capellani, vel vice-curati" of Ferraris, who says of them that "they administer the sacraments, not in their own name, but in that of another—namely, the rector (parish-priest)—and therefore they ought to be called assistants (cooperatores), not rectors, although they have cure of souls. When it is said that there ought to be only one rector in a parish, this must be understood to refer to ordinary jurisdiction, not to delegated jurisdiction, such as is that of a chaplain or vice-curate." (Ferraris, Parochia.)

CURE OF SOULS. [See PARISH and PARISH-PRIEST.] As now understood, a cure of souls is that portion of responsibility for the provision of sacraments to, and the adequate instruction of, the Christian faithful, which devolves upon the parish-priest of a particular district in regard to the souls of all persons dwelling within the limits of that district. In ancient times the cure of souls throughout his diocese (often called parœcia) was held to fall upon the bishop, who discharged his responsibility by the agency of priests sent to such places as he judged suitable, supported with such disbursements as he thought sufficient, and removable at his pleasure. The division of dioceses into parishes with fixed incumbents and permanent revenues cannot be traced back beyond the fourth century.[1] It was once commonly held that this change was introduced by Pope Dionysius in the second half of the third century, but the statement to that effect only rests on the authority of the Pseudo-Isidore.

A district is not allowed by law to have a parish priest appropriated to it, if it contain fewer than ten houses or families. There can be only one parish-priest or rector in a parish, having cure of souls by ordinary right. (Ferraris, Parochia.)

CURIA ROMANA. The Curia, in the stricter sense, designates the authorities which administer the Papal Primacy; in a wider acceptation it embraces all the authorities and functionaries forming the immediate entourage or Court of the Pope. The following sketch of its history is abridged from the article by Buss in the "Dictionnaire Catholique" of Wetzer and Welte. While there are many features in the Curia which resemble an ordinary episcopal administration, there are also certain characteristics which from the first distinguished it, and gave to it a peculiar elevation. The ancient Presbyterium of Rome was gradually, as we have seen [CARDINAL], transformed into the Cardinalate. The power of the archdeacon, exercised in the third century by the martyr St. Laurence (the glory of whose virtues shone throughout Christendom), passed to the Cardinal Camerarius, or Camerlengo, who was the head of the Camera, or financial department of the Apostolic See, and as representing the ancient archdeacons, wielded also an extensive jurisdiction. Other great officials in ancient times were the archpriest, and the Primicerius of the Notaries. The former had the chief charge of what related to worship, and was represented, as the cardinalate developed itself, by the Cardinal Vicar. The Primicerius, being at the head of the department which came in due time to be called the Cancelleria, or Chancery, corresponds to the Cardinal Vice-Chancellor presiding over that important ministry. But there were also in the body of functionaries by whom the Roman Pontiff was surrounded points of resemblance to the Imperial Court at Rome or Constantinople; this appears in the Familia, or household, of the Pope (Famiglia Pontificia) in many ways, and is also observable in the important post of Præfectus Apostolici Palatii.

In the middle ages the business which flowed in upon the Papal Curia was immense. The changed conditions, civil and religious, of Europe made inevitable the multiplication of appeals from metropolitan courts to the Holy See. Dispensations also, and nominations to reserved benefices, could not easily, at a time when communication was still difficult and intermittent, be obtained without personal visits to Rome. To dispose of the various applications and petitions, and try the various suits, a large staff of officials, both administrative and judicial, had to be employed. The Popes could not always exercise an efficient control over this mass of subordinates; hence abuses arose, and extortion was loudly imputed to the Roman officials. The high rates of the taxes, or fees of office, demanded at the Chancery for the expediting of any bull or brief, the delays in the settlement of affairs, and the multiplication of rules and formalities, were the subject of frequent complaints. Reforms were begun by Pius IV. and carried on energetically by St. Pius V. and Sixtus V. Nevertheless, if any supineness ever existed on the part of the reigning Pope, abuses reappeared. Thus, in the seventeenth century, the practice of burdening benefices, the appointments to which proceeded from the Chancery, with pensions to one or other member of the Curia, attained to a very pernicious height. However, Benedict XIV. "decreed a radical reform; his system was continued by Leo XII. and Gregory XVI., and is pursued under the strict and regular administration of Pius IX."[1]

The different branches of the Curia have now to be described in detail; but it may assist us in dealing with this vast and complicated subject, if we first endeavour to obtain a rough general view of it, by considering what are the chief ends for which the Papacy exists, and which the action of the Curia is directed to promote. As the successor of St. Peter and the Vicar of Christ, the Pope has, first of all, to govern and feed with sound doctrine the whole flock of Christ—i.e. the universal Church—and his own diocese in particular. The agencies in the Curia by which he fulfils these purposes are the Sacred Congregations of Cardinals, the Secretariat of State, and the Vicariate of Rome; and the machinery employed is supplied by the Chancery, the Dataria, and the Camera Apostolica. As the "supremus judex" in Christendom, the Pope acts, partly through special congregations and delegated judges [DELEGATION], partly through the regular tribunals of the Rota and the Segnatura (forum externum) and the Penitenziaria (forum internum). Before the usurpation of the temporal power, the Camera also was a court of justice. Again, the Vicar of Christ must be diligently and uninterruptedly occupied with the worship of the true God; to this end corresponds the institution of the Papal Chapel (Capella Pontificia). As living and reigning, the Pope, like any other sovereign or any other bishop, has his "family" or household (Famiglia Pontificia), one important branch of which is the department having charge of the Papal residences (Prefettura del Sacro Palazzo Apostolico). To carry on the necessary external relations with the powers of the world, the Pope has Legates, Nuncios, and Apostolic Delegates, receives ambassadors, appoints and admits consuls. Lastly, as a sovereign ruling over that extent of dominion which came in the dispositions of Providence to the Papacy, and was usurped by violence a few years ago, the Pope had ministries, judges civil and criminal, boards, commissions, and all the usual machinery of administration in civilised countries.

In the order indicated by this brief sketch, we shall now describe the principal attributions of the various branches of the Curia. The mode in which the action of the Cardinals is applied to assist the Pope in the government of the Church has been already described in the article on CONGREGATIONS (ROMAN); but mention was not there made of a Congregation the action of which is important in reference to the present subject—viz. the Congregatio Visitationis Apostolicæ, of which the Cardinal Vicar is president. This Congregation, organised by Clement VIII. and Innocent XII., represents the Pope in his character of a bishop visiting his diocese.

tween the Holy See and foreign Powers. He is the Pope's Prime Minister—not of course in the sense which the word bears in countries where the Minister is more powerful than the Sovereign, so that the former's "advice" overrides the latter's initiative—but in the proper sense of the term: a faithful agent and servant executing the intentions of his master, whom he serves to the best of his ability. He carries on the negotiations, in which the Pontiff is perpetually engaged, which have for their object to secure the liberties, extend the limits, and promote the welfare of the Catholic Church. Under him are placed the Nuncios and other diplomatic agents of the Holy See, and to him they make their reports. The officials under him consist of several "Minutanti," a writer in cypher, an archivist, a subarchivist, &c. Being in close and permanent relations to the Pope, "he represents the principle of the Pontifical Government; his influence is consequently felt in all ways in acts emanating directly from the person of the Pope; he directs all important political measures, puts in force the decisions relative to the organic institutions of the Church, and transmits the instructions by which the functionaries of the Curia are guided."[1]

The Vicariate of Rome is under the Cardinal Vicar, assisted by a Vicegerent, a Promotor Fiscal, and two or three other officials, of whom one is the "Defensor Matrimonii" [see that article].

The celebrated department of the Roman Chancery is that which drafts and expedites the bulls and briefs by which the mind of the Pontiff is made known to Christendom, or to particular suitors. The Cardinal at its head is not called "Chancellor," but "Vice-Chancellor," probably because the title of Chancellor, having sprung out of a function which was originally purely subordinate and ministerial, was thought to be beneath the dignity of the Sacred College.

"At what time," says Ferraris, "the office of the Chancellor attained to that height of eminence and prerogative which it is now seen to possess in the Roman Curia, is a point not accurately determined. Inquirers into its origin tell us that it was planned and established after the time of Innocent III. In his time, it is known that the duties of Chancellor were discharged by private persons, but such as were of known and conspicuous probity and erudition. In course of time, under Boniface VIII., it is certain that the dignity of Chancellor was assigned to one of the Cardinals." He explains the addition of "vice" to the title, and proceeds: "The Vice-Chancellor has a fixed cardinalitial title—namely, that of the collegiate church of St. Laurence in Damaso. The more pressing, weighty, public, and solemn affairs of the Apostolic See, such as are those debated on in the Consistory, pass through the hands of the Vice-Chancellor, so that he must be called, by analogy with similar offices elsewhere, the Papal Chancellor. Among his numerous subordinates, the one of highest rank is he who is called the Regent of the Chancery, who revises bulls that have been expedited and promulgated, and, if any error has crept in, corrects it. The other officials of the Vice-Chancellor to whose posts prelatical rank is annexed, are the Presidents of the greater or lesser "Parcus," so called from the name by which the place in the Chancery where they meet is popularly called. The prelates of the greater Parcus of the Chancery constitute a kind of tribunal, when they meet and decide doubts which may arise concerning the form of documents, or the clauses and decrees which have to be inserted in them, and also respecting the payment of fees and charges. The prelates of the lesser Parcus have a restricted jurisdiction, the one object of their institution being to transmit and deliver bulls to the prelates of the greater Parcus. The writers, abbreviators [see that art.], and others responsible for the preparation of documents in the Roman Chancery, all share in those rights and emoluments which are commonly called the Taxes of the Apostolic Chancery. That these rights derive their origin from John XXII. is plain from the section in his Extravagantes beginning "Quum ad Sacrosancta."[1]

The proceedings of the Chancery are governed by certain fixed rules, which, as already mentioned [CANON LAW] form a substantive part of the Jus Novissimum. They are only of force, however, during the lifetime of a Pope; every Pontiff, on the day after his accession, publishes them anew, with such omissions or additions as he may think fit to make.

For an account of the Dataria, see that article. The Camera Apostolica or department of finance in the Papal Government is presided over by the Cardinal Camerlengo. Previously to the event of September 1870, the Camera was also a court of justice, which, like our Court of Exchequer in ancient times, took cognisance of offences committed against the revenue laws, or by persons in its employment. The staff of the department is still kept up nearly at its former strength; for although many sources of revenue have been cut off since the usurpation, and the Pontiff does not and cannot accept the annual subvention which the usurping Government places at its disposal, still the revenues of the Papacy cannot but be large, in view of the immense interests which it administers, the numbers and diffusion of the Catholic populations whereof it is the centre, and the indignation and sympathy which the spoliation to which it has been subjected has aroused in all upright minds. The office of Treasurer, the highest official in the department after the Vice-Camerlengo, is at present vacant, and many of the revenue departments of which he had the control are in abeyance; but the "prelate clerks" of the Camera, who form the council of the Camerlengo, still perform their functions.

Coming now to the organs by which the Papal jurisdiction is exercised, we have first to name the Rota; for an account of which the reader is referred to the article ROTA ROMANA. The Segnatura Papale di Giustizia "takes cognisance of cases which may or may not come before the Rota on appeal, suits of competence, causes of nullity of marriage, demands for restitution, &c. . . . It is composed of a Cardinal President, præfectus, seven prelates, and a few referendaries, who have a decisive, not merely a consultative, voice. An Auditor appointed in connection with the Segnatura determines what affairs it is competent to try, and may give decisions on various preliminary issues, from which, however, a suitor may appeal to the Segnatura itself. The Dean of the Rota, the Regent of the Chancery, and two representatives of the Camera, have seats at the Segnatura. The sentences are signed by the Pope with the word 'Fiat' in his own hand, or, in his presence and in his name, by a Cardinal, who says, 'Concessum in præsentia Domini nostri Papæ.'"[1]

Connected with the above tribunal is the Segnatura di Grazia, which "decides in suits where an appeal is made to the personal favour of the Pope, such suits—as being matters of favour—allowing of more prompt decision. A suit on which the S. of Justice has given judgment may, with the authorisation of the Pope, be opened again before the S. of Grace. The Pope himself presides in this college, which consists of Cardinals named by him; the Cardinal Penitentiary, the Secretary of Briefs, and the President of the Dataria, belong to it ex officio. Besides other prelates, the Auditor of the Camera, one of the Auditors of the Rota, the Regent of the Chancery, &c., take part in the deliberations. Three referendary prelates draw up the reports; the members present have only a consultative voice; the Pope alone decides and signs."[1]

The Penitenziaria Romana has a Cardinal at its head, called the Penitentiarius Major, who is assisted by a Regent, a Theologian, and other officials. The Grand Penitentiary is appointed by the Pope; he must be of the order of Cardinal Priests, and a master in theology, or a doctor in canon law. His faculties extend to—absolving from sins and censures, dispensing in cases of irregularity [IRREGULARITY], commuting, or releasing from, oaths and vows, and in various other ways exercising the power of binding and loosing given to St. Peter by our Lord. He sits in one or other of the three great basilicas of Rome on four days in Holy Week (in St. John Lateran on Palm Sunday, in St. Mary Major on Wednesday, and in St. Peter's on Holy Thursday and Good Friday), and there hears the confessions of such of the faithful as resort to him, and touches the heads of those who stoop low before him —"pie sese submittentium"—with the rod of the Penitentiary, granting to them at the same time an indulgence of a hundred days. He is entitled to solemnise Mass in the Capella Pontificia on three days in the year, viz. on Ash Wednesday, Good Friday (Mass of the Presanctified), and All Souls' Day, and to bring to an expiring Pope the last rites and succours of religion. The voluminous Constitution of Benedict XIV. beginning "Pastor Bonus" defines with exactness the duties, powers, and privileges of the Penitenziaria, and of all the officials connected with it.

On the Capella Pontificia the reader will do well to consult the learned work of Dr. Baggs entitled "The Pope's Chapel." The dignitaries, prelates, &c., who have a recognised place in the chapel for the sacred functions, are all arranged according to their respective order and precedence. First, the College of Cardinals; next, the College of Patriarchs, Archbishops and Bishops assisting at the Pontifical Throne. Ten patriarchs, more than ninety archbishops, and about two hundred and thirty bishops, enjoy this dignity at the present time. Then come, in the order named, the Vice-Camerlengo, the Princes assisting at the Throne, the Auditor and Treasurer of the Camera, the Majordomo, archbishops and bishops generally, the prelates (some two hundred in number) of the College of Apostolic Protonotaries, abbots, heads of orders, chamberlains, chaplains, the officials of the various Papal departments, clerks, sacrists, vergers, &c., everyone having his proper place and just precedence assigned to him.

[1] Buss.

[1] Buss.

The Famiglia Pontificia consists of certain Cardinals selected by the Pope, the Majordomo, the Master of the Sacred Apostolic Palace, a number of domestic prelates, and clerical and lay chamberlains of various grades, some paid, some honorary—among the latter being reckoned the honorary chamberlains "di spada e cappa," who are laymen of family and position selected from the various European countries. The Swiss Guard, the Noble Guard, the Pope's private chaplains, and many other officials variously designated, belong also to the Famiglia. It includes, moreover, the Prefecture of the Sacred Palaces, an important department with a Cardinal at its head.

As sovereign of the Roman States, the Pope formerly carried on the government with the help of the following departments, which now—pending the re-establishment of the temporal power—remain in abeyance: viz. the Ministry of the Interior, the Ministries of Finance, Commerce, and War, a Council of Ministers, a Council of State, several boards and commissions, a Consulta (financial), and courts of law for trying civil and criminal cases.

The authorities of the Curia, below the rank of Cardinal, are technically divided into two classes—the prelates of the mantelletta (a short cloak), and those of the mantellone (a long cloak, reaching to the feet). In the first class are included Patriarchs, Archbishops, Bishops, Protonotaries Apostolic, Domestic Prelates, the Clerks of the Camera, the Auditors of the Rota, the Referendarii of the Segnatura, the Abbreviators of the greater Parcus, the Majordomo, and the Maestro di Camera. Four among these, designated prelates of the fiocchetti, take precedence of the rest—the Auditor of the Camera, the Treasurer, the Vice-Camerlengo, and the Majordomo. Among the prelates of the mantellone are ecclesiastical chamberlains, masters of ceremonies, &c. (Ferraris, Cancellaria; "Annuario Pontificio," 1870; "Gerarchia Cattolica," 1884.)

CURIALIA. The duties and functions of a curialis, one attached to the curia or court of a prince. Ducange cites passages from mediæval writers in which curialis plainly signifies a mere clerk or secretary. But the sense of "courtier" was much more common, as in the title of two well-known works by John of Salisbury and Walter Map, "De Nugis Curialium." There is a canon in the Corpus Juris bearing the name of Pope Innocent I. (A.D. 404) which excludes those who were invested with curialia from the clerical order, the due performance of both functions by the same person being considered impracticable. (Wetzer and Welte.)

CUSTOM, according to St. Thomas and canonists generally, has three legal effects:

(1) It may, either through the consent, tacit or express, of lawful authority or by prescription, impose a new law. This is clearly laid down both in the canon and civil law. To have the force of law, the custom must be good and useful; it must have been formed by public acts, proceeding from the greater part of the community; the people from whom the custom proceeds must have the intention of binding themselves (thus the custom of taking holy water in entering churches has not the force of a law). If it is introduced by way of prescription, the custom must continue uninterrupted for a certain space of time before it binds the conscience.[1]

(2) On much the same conditions custom may abrogate an existing law, or modify it, unless the law in question

[1] St. Liguori, De Leg. 107 seq., says generally that custom to have the force of law must be continued for a long time without interruption. Some say that the length of time required depends on circumstances: others that ten years is the time required. Again, some maintain that while a prescription of ten years suffices to change civil law, a custom must last forty years to abrogate Church law. Probably ten years is enough in either case.

be natural or divine. But here, if the custom operates by way of prescription, ten years according to the common opinion are required before custom abrogates civil, forty before it abrogates ecclesiastical, laws.

(3) Custom interprets law, and, unless the law be natural or divine, may introduce an "authentic" interpretation—i.e. it may give an authoritative sense to a law, although that sense is discordant with the original intention of the legislator. (Billuart, "De Legibus," Diss. v. a. 2.)

CUSTOS. By this name was formerly designated the canon, in a cathedral or collegiate church, who with the approval of the bishop had the spiritual charge of the cure attached to the church. It was also applied to sacristans or treasurers who had charge of the sacred vessels, church ornaments, furniture, &c. In the revolutionary period this office was generally in abeyance; in Austria, however, it stood its ground, and has been again introduced in Prussia, the canon having charge of a metropolitan cure being called summus custos. In France the ecclesiastic with corresponding functions is called archiprêtre.

CYCLE (including Golden Number, Dominical Letter, Epact) is a series of numbers, letters standing for numbers, always counted over again in the same order when the series has been completed. Cycles are employed in ecclesiastical as well as civil chronology, since the solar, lunar, and paschal cycles enable us to reckon the time at which the feasts of the church will fall in each year. The lunar cycle (cyclus lunæ, decemnovennalis, ἐννεακαιδεκαετηρίς) consists of nineteen years, and after the expiration of each lunar cycle the new and full moons fall once more on nearly the same days of the month. This cycle was invented by the Greek astronomer Meton. Anatolius, bishop of Laodicea, employed it towards the close of the third century for calculating the date of Easter.[1] Soon afterwards the Nicene Council ordained that Easter should be celebrated on the Sunday which followed the first new moon after the vernal equinox (March 21), and this led to a more exact computation of the lunar cycle. The bishops of Alexandria, the seat of mathematical science, were entrusted with the task of fixing the day on which Easter fell.[2] In order to lighten their task, the Alexandrian church constructed Paschal cycles, which contained a number of lunar cycles, and fixed the date of Easter Sunday for a long course of years. Thus Theophilus of Alexandria drew up a Paschal cycle of 418 years—i.e. of twenty-two lunar cycles—beginning with the year 380. This cycle, partly on account of its obscurity, partly on account of its incorrectness, found small acceptance in the West, and in the year 444 Easter Sunday, according to Roman reckoning, fell on March 26, according to Alexandrian, on April 23. In consequence of a letter from Pope Leo, Cyril corrected the Paschal cycle of his predecessor and reduced it to one of ninety-five years, extending from 437 to 531, and embracing five lunar cycles. As this cycle was drawing to its end, Dionysius Exiguus, in 525, constructed a new one of 304 Julian years or sixteen lunar cycles. The defects of the Dionysian computation were inseparable from those of the Julian year, which consisted of 365 days, 6 hours, instead of 365 days, 5 hours, 49 minutes, so that the calculation of the vernal equinox became more and more erroneous as time went on, forty-four minutes too much being added to each leap-year. The remedy was provided by the Gregorian reformation of the Calendar.[1] [See Calendar, Julian.]

The Golden Number, which is closely connected with the lunar cycle, indicates the place any given year holds in the lunar cycle (whether, e.g., the year of Christ 1881 is 1, 2, 3, &c. in the lunar cycle of nineteen). It gets its name from the fact that it was set in golden colours against the days on which the new moon fell in the Roman and Alexandrian calendars. Christ, according to the common reckoning, was born at the end of the first year in the lunar cycle, so that the Golden Number for each year is obtained by adding one to the number of the year (e.g. to 1881) and dividing the sum by nineteen. The remainder gives the Golden Number: if there is no remainder the Golden Number is nineteen. Thus if to 1881 we add one and divide by nineteen, we get one as a remainder, and this is the Golden Number for the year in question.

The solar cycle or cycle of Dominical Letters is a series of twenty-eight years, after which Sundays and week-days again fall on the same days of the month. The first seven letters are used to indicate the days of the week, A being used in all cases to mark the first of January, and the letter which thus comes to mark the first Sunday being the Sunday letter or littera dominicalis of the year. Thus 1881 began with a Saturday, and hence the Dominical Letter is B. The same Dominical Letter would recur every seven years. But as a day is intercalated in the February of each leap-year, viz., February 25, which has the same letter assigned to it as February 24, hence each leap-year has two Dominical Letters, the former extending to February 24 inclusive, the latter embracing the rest of the year. Now, as this intercalation interrupts the sequence of the Dominical Letters seven times in twenty-eight years, the same order of Dominical Letters cannot recur oftener than once in twenty-eight years. However, a new disturbance in the order of Dominical Letters arises from the fact that in the Gregorian calendar it was arranged that although each secular year—i.e. the first year of each century—would naturally be a leap-year, only the first of each of four seculars should be reckoned as such. Thus 1600, the secular year which followed the Gregorian reformation of the calendar, was reckoned as a leap-year—i.e. it had a day intercalated in February—but this was not the case with the years 1700 and 1800, nor will it be with 1900. In showing how the Dominical Letter for each year may be ascertained (we restrict our calculations to the present century), first, we must ascertain the number which the current year, e.g. 1881, holds in the solar cycle of twenty-eight years. The first year of the Dionysian era is the ninth of the solar cycle. Hence by adding nine to 1881, and dividing the sum by twenty-eight, we get three as remainder, so that we now know that the year 1881 is third in the solar cycle of twenty-eight. The following table gives the order of Dominical Letters for the solar cycle of twenty-eight years and will serve for calculating the Dominical Letter of any year in this century.

1 E D	8 C	15 A	22 F
2 C	9 B A	16 G	23 E
3 B	10 G	17 F E	24 D
4 A	11 F	18 D	25 C B
5 G F	12 E	19 C	26 A
6 E	13 D C	20 B	27 G
7 D	14 B	21 A G	28 F

We had already found that 1881 is the third year in the cycle; now we know that its Dominical Letter is B, or in other words that the first Sunday falls on January 2. When we have got so far, it is easy to ascertain the days of the month on which the Sundays of the year fall. The twelve months have letters assigned to them, contained in the following memorial verses,

Astra Dabit Dominus Gratisque Beabit Egenos; Gratia Christicolæ Feret Aurea Dona Fideli:

i.e. A is the letter for January 1, D for February 1, &c. As B is the Dominical Letter for 1881, and as F is the letter which marks the first of December, the first of that month will be on a Thursday, and the Sundays will fall on the fourth, eleventh, eighteenth and twenty-fifth days.

Epacts (ἐπακταὶ ἡμέραι, dies adjecti, adscitiii) are used because of the differences in duration between the lunar and solar years. Annual epacts determine the age of the moon on each new year's day. The lunar falls about eleven days short of the solar year. In the Gregorian calendar the new moon of the lunar cycle (see above) falls on January 1, so that the epact = 0, an asterisk (*) being sometimes used to mark the epact in this case. In the second year the epact or addition which must be made to the lunar year = XI; in the third XXII. The epact of the fourth year would be XXXIII, but on the thirtieth of these thirty-three days a new moon has again appeared, so that the epact corresponding to the fourth year in the lunar cycle (or in other words to the Golden Number 4) is III. If we subtract one from the Golden Number, multiply by eleven and divide by thirty we get the epact. Thus the epact for 1881 is *, for 1882 it will be XI.

The calculation of the monthly epact enables us to determine the days of the civil or solar month on which the new and full moons occur. The lunar month consists of twenty-nine days, eleven hours, forty-four minutes: so that the monthly epact in January, which has thirty-one days, is one day, six minutes; and the epact, of course, for each month increases, till in December it reaches eleven days. To shorten the process of calculation, the lunar months are reckoned at twenty-nine and thirty days. If we subtract the annual epact from thirty-one, we get the day on which the new moon of January falls: the new moon of February falls thirty, that of March twenty-nine, that of April thirty days later; and so with the rest of the months.

An example will illustrate the way in which these chronological determinations are connected with and assist each other. Let us suppose that we have to ascertain the day on which Easter Sunday fell in 1879. First we must find the Golden Number: $\frac{1879+1}{19}$ gives the remainder eighteen, which is the Golden Number. $\frac{18-1\times 11}{30}$ gives the remainder VII., i.e. the epact. Consequently on January 1, 1879, the moon was seven days old. By subtracting seven from thirty-one, we find that the new moon falls on January 24, then on February 21, then March 24, the full moon of the spring equinox falling fourteen or fifteen days later, i.e. on April 7 or 8; so that the Sunday following April 8 is Easter Sunday. We have now to find on what day of the week April 8 fell, and for this we need to know the Dominical Letter. The remainder of $\frac{1879+9}{28}$ is twelve, which is the number of the year 1879 in the solar cycle, and to this the Dominical Letter E corresponds, as may be seen from the table given above. April, according to the memorial verses, begins with G; April 2 then will be A, April 3 B; E, the Dominical Letter, falls on April 6, which was therefore a Sunday. April 8, then, was a Tuesday, and the Sunday following, viz. April 13, was Easter Sunday. DALMATIC. A vestment open on each side, with wide sleeves, and marked with two stripes. It is worn by deacons at High Mass as well as at processions and benedictions, and by bishops, when they celebrate Mass pontifically, under the chasuble. The colour should conform to that of the chasuble worn by the celebrant.

The word is derived from Dalmatia, and first occurs in the second century. The dalmatic (Dalmatica vestis) was a long under-garment of white Dalmatian wool corresponding to the Roman tunic. Ælius Lampridius blames the emperors Commodus and Heliogabalus for appearing publicly in the dalmatic. In the Acts of St. Cyprian we are told that the martyr drew off his dalmatic and, giving it to his deacons, stood ready for death in his linen garment. In these instances the dalmatic was clearly a garment of everyday life.

According to Anastasius, Pope Silvester early in the fourth century gave the Roman deacons dalmatics instead of the sleeveless garments (κολόβια) which they had used previously. Gradually the Popes conceded the privilege of wearing the dalmatic as an ecclesiastical vestment to the deacons of other churches.[1] Such a concession was made by Pope Symmachus towards the close of the fifth century, to the church of Arles. In the same way, the use of the dalmatic as an episcopal vestment was first proper to the Pope and then permitted by him to other bishops. Thus Gregory the Great allowed Aregius, bishop of Gap in Gaul, to wear a dalmatic, and Walafrid Strabo testifies that in the seventh century this episcopal custom was by no means universal. But from the year 890 onwards ecclesiastical writers all speak of the dalmatic as one of the episcopal, and the chief of the deacon's, vestments. The dalmatic was originally always white, but Durandus speaks of red dalmatics, symbolising martyrdom. The Greeks have a vestment corresponding to our dalmatic, called στιχάριον or στοιχάριον from the στίχοι (lines or stripes), with which it is adorned; its colour varies, just as the dalmatic of our deacons does, with the colour of the φελόνιον or chasuble, worn by the celebrant. The Greek priests also wear a στιχάριον under the chasuble, but the former is always white.

Various mystical meanings have been attached to the dalmatic. When the arms are stretched it presents the figure of a cross; the width of the sleeves is said to typify charity; the two stripes (which were originally purple, and are probably a relic of the Roman latus clavus) were supposed to symbolise the blood of Christ

DATARIA. The office in the Papal Court whence are expedited the graces, accorded by the Pope, which have their effect and are cognisable in foro externo. The term is derived from a Low Latin verb datare, to date, formed doubtless from the "Datum" or "Datæ," with following indications of place and time, with which the Romans commonly ended their letters. The Dataria, originally a branch of the Apostolic Chancery, attained to a separate organisation in the thirteenth century, at which time, owing to the great number of benefices in all countries reserved to the Pope, mistakes were sometimes made in the appointments, and the same benefice was conferred upon or promised to two or more persons, whence complaints and unseemly contentions arose. The evil was effectually remedied by the appointment of an official whose special business it should be to register the dates of the appointments to benefices.

The Datary (who is sometimes a simple prelate, sometimes a Cardinal, in which latter case he is styled pro-Datary) has in the course of time had many other duties laid upon him besides those connected with the grant of benefices. He has the charge of dispensations, the various kinds of which, and also licences for the alienation of church property, are issued from his office. A considerable staff of officials, at the head of whom is the sub-Datary, are under his orders. His functions cease ipso facto on the death of a Pope, all applications reaching the office during the vacancy being sealed up and transmitted to the College of Cardinals to be dealt with by the future Pope. [See CURIA ROMANA.]

DEACON. The word in itself (διάκονος) means no more than "minister" or servant, and so it is used in the LXX and in the New Testament (see Esther i. 10, 1 Cor. iii. 5, 2 Cor. vi. 4). However, the word deacon received a more definite meaning in apostolic times, for the mention of deacons along with bishops in Phil. i. 1, 1 Tim. iii. 2, 8, besides the qualifications which St. Paul requires of a deacon, clearly prove that the diaconate was a church office. According to the Pontifical it is the part of a deacon "to minister at the altar, to baptise and to preach." He is the highest of all whose office it is to serve the priest in the administration of the sacraments, and he is set apart for his work, not merely by the institution of the Church, but by the sacrament of order which he receives through the laying on of the bishop's hands. Just as the Levites were chosen by God Himself for the ministry of the tabernacle, so the diaconate is appointed by Christ's institution and strengthened by a sacrament of the new law for the service of the Christian altar. The constituents of a sacrament—viz. the sensible sign, grace given, divine and permanent institution—are all found in a deacon's ordination. The laying on of hands is the sensible sign; grace is given, for the bishop says, "Receive the Holy Ghost," and the Council of Trent (Sess. xxiii. can. 4) anathematises those who hold "that the Holy Ghost is not given by sacred ordination, and accordingly that bishops say in vain 'Receive the Holy Ghost.'" There is divine institution, for what power had the Apostles to institute a sign which should infallibly convey grace? And besides, the Council of Trent (loc. cit. can. 6) defines that there is "in the Catholic Church a hierarchy divinely constituted, consisting of bishops, presbyters and ministers," which last word must at least include deacons. Lastly, the form of ordination was established permanently, as appears from the practice of the Church.[1]

Up to this point we have been arguing on Catholic principles, but it will be well (1) to consider more closely the grounds on which the Catholic idea of the diaconate rests, passing then (2) to the history of the office, and (3) to the rite of ordination.

(1) The Catholic Idea of the Diaconate.—The duties of a deacon will be considered more fully afterwards. Here it is enough to say that a deacon is ordained chiefly in order that he may assist the priest in the celebration of solemn Mass, and then, on certain conditions, to preach and baptise. In other words, he is the chief minister at the altar. Against this, Protestants have often alleged that the seven deacons whose ordination is mentioned in Acts vi. were chosen in order to administer the alms of the Church, and that the New Testament gives no hint of their duties at the altar.

[1] That the sacrament of order is received by deacons follows so plainly from the definitions of Trent, and is so universally held, that the contrary opinion of Durandus and Cajetan, though not heretical, could not be maintained without temerity.

Now certainly the "seven" mentioned in Acts vi. were appointed on occasion of disputes which arose between two classes of Jewish converts (viz. those of foreign and those of Palestinian origin) on the distribution of alms, and were entrusted with the administration of charitable relief. Further, the seven, though not called "deacons," have almost universally been regarded as the first who held the office.[1] Still, the sacred text indicates that they were to be chosen for some higher work than the administration of charity. They were to be "full of the Holy Ghost and of wisdom." We find Stephen, one of their number, preaching and instructing; Philip, another member of their body, baptising (Acts viii. 38). St. Paul (1 Tim. iii. 9) requires deacons to "hold the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience," nor does he allude to this work of "serving tables"—i.e. of administering alms.

We can only guess the nature of the diaconate from Scripture, but the early and authentic tradition proves that the Catholic doctrine on the matter corresponds to the original teaching of the Apostles. St. Ignatius ("Ad Trall." 2), speaks of deacons as "ministers of the mysteries of Jesus Christ," "for they are not ministers (διάκονοι) of meat and drink, but servants of the Church of God." Here the mention of the "mysteries of Jesus Christ" in contrast with ordinary meat and drink, shows that St. Ignatius alludes to the service of the altar. Justin ("Apol." i. 65) tells us that the deacons gave Holy Communion to those present at Mass, and carried it to the absent. Tertullian ("De Baptism." 17) says that deacons had the right to baptise, not, however, "without the authority of the bishop." This chain of testimony might easily be strengthened, but the testimonies given prove that the complete Catholic idea of the diaconate was accepted in the early Church.

(2) History of the Duties, &c.—With regard to the ministry of the altar, deacons, as we have seen, used to give the people communion under both kinds. In Cyprian's time, and in the following ages, deacons were only permitted to present the chalice to the people.[2] At present they are forbidden to give communion at all except in case of necessity, but they retain the essential part of their office as ministers of the altar by singing the Gospel at High Mass, and assisting the priest throughout the celebration. They can also, as in ancient times, preach with the leave of the bishop, and baptise solemnly with that of the parish priest.

Formerly the deacons had other and very important functions. They had to acquaint the bishop with the state of his flock, collect the offertory at Mass, to visit the confessors in prison, write the Acts of the martyrs, so that in the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 44) the deacon is said to be the "ear, eye, mouth, heart and soul of the bishop." Nay, in certain cases even congregations in the country were committed to their care.[1]

In many churches, of which Rome was one, the number of deacons was limited to seven, in memory of the original institution.[2] It was not till the eleventh century that the number of Cardinal Deacons in the Roman Church was raised from seven to fourteen.

But the most important point in which the position of deacons has altered is that, whereas in the ancient and even mediæval Church a man often remained a simple deacon for the rest of his life, the diaconate is now regarded as a step towards the priesthood. Among the Cardinal Deacons at Rome a vestige of the ancient discipline is still preserved.

(3) The Ordination of Deacons.—The following is the form given in the Roman Pontifical. The bishop questions the archdeacon on the fitness of the candidates and then asks the clergy and the people to state any grounds they have for objecting to the ordination of the person about to be promoted. After a pause, the bishop lays down the duties and qualifications of a deacon, while the candidates kneel at his feet. The candidates then prostrate themselves on their faces while the Litany of the Saints and some other prayers are recited. Next, in a kind of preface, the bishop gives thanks to God for the institution of the sacred ministry, and the most important part of the rite begins. The bishop places his right hand on each of the candidates with the words "Receive the Holy Ghost for strength and for resisting the devil and all his temptations in the name of the Lord."

[1] This, however, was denied by the Greek Council in Trullo, can. 16; and also, Petavius says, by 'certain learned and Catholic theologians.'—Diss. de Cathol. quibusdam Dogm lib. ii. cap. 1.

[2] Cyprian. De Laps. 25; Apost. Const. viii. 12.

[1] Concil. Illib. can. 77.

[2] Euseb. H. E. vi. 43; Concil. Neocæsar. can. 15.

Then, holding the right hand stretched out, he continues, "Send forth upon them, O Lord, we beseech Thee, the Holy Spirit, that they may be strengthened faithfully to perform the work of thy ministry by the gift of thy sevenfold grace," &c. The bishop then invests the new deacons with the stole on the left shoulder, and dalmatic, and finally makes them touch the book of the Gospels, while he says, "Receive the power of reading the Gospel in the church of God, both for the living and the dead, in the name of the Lord."

The essence of the ordination, according to the most probable opinion, consists in the laying on of hands by a bishop with words which express the nature of the power given. This imposition of hands is mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles and in various early authorities—e.g. in Canon 4 of the early collection attributed to the Fourth Council of Carthage. The present form of words which accompanies this imposition of hands is not older than the twelfth century. With regard to the other ceremonies, the questions put by the bishop to the people on the fitness of the candidates are in substance of Apostolic institution.[1] The recitation of the Litany of the Saints is found in the oldest Pontificals; the prayer "Exaudi, Domine, preces nostras," used after giving the book of the Gospels occurs in a MS. more than twelve hundred years old; and the practice of investing the new deacon with the stole was in use, according to Assemani, long before the time of Gregory the Great. In the Greek rite, as given by Goar, the bishop makes the sign of the cross on the head of the person to be ordained, and places his hand on his head, with the words, "Divine grace, which ever heals the infirm and perfects the imperfect, promotes the venerable subdeacon N. to be deacon. Therefore let us pray for him that the grace of the Holy Spirit may come upon him." The bishop then makes on the head of the deacon the sign of the cross three times, uses two forms of prayer with fresh imposition of hands, puts the orarium or stole on his left shoulder, saying, "He is worthy," gives him the kiss of peace, and puts the fan for driving away flies from the holy sacrifice into his hand, again saying, "He is worthy."

DEACONESS. Many have supposed that St. Paul recognises the existence of deaconesses when in Rom. xvi. 1 he speaks of Phœbe as the διάκονος or servant of the church at Cenchreæ, and it has been suggested that the "widows" in 1 Tim. v. 9, were deaconesses. In any case, from very early times there was an order of women in the Church known as διακόνισσαι, πρεσβυτίδες, χῆραι, diaconissæ, presbyteræ, viduæ. Pliny mentions two Christian ministræ, probably meaning deaconesses.

They were employed in assisting at the baptism of women,[1] which at that time was by immersion, and after the deacon had anointed the baptised person on the forehead, the other unctions, in the case of a woman's baptism, were given by the deaconess.[2] Deaconesses also gave private instruction to women, visited them in sickness and prison, kept order at the women's door and in the women's part of the church, assisted the bride at marriages, &c.

Originally widows were chosen for the office, though even St. Ignatius speaks of virgins who were called widows[3]—i.e. because of this office—and later, married women, if living in continence, might become deaconesses. For a long time deaconesses were required to be sixty years of age, but the Councils of Chalcedon and in Trullo[4] reduced the required age to forty years. Women who had been married twice were never admitted to the rank of deaconess. Deaconesses were strictly forbidden to marry.[5] They were ordained by laying on of hands; sometimes, indeed, they even received the stole and chalice.[6] But they were servants of the church, not ministers of the altar; indeed, the Fathers regard the exclusion of women from ecclesiastical office as a distinctive principle of the Catholic Church.[7]

In the fifth and sixth centuries abuses led to the abolition of the office in Gaul,[8] and in the tenth century the office was extinct in the West, though the words diaconissa and archidiaconissa were sometimes used for abbess. At Constanti-

DEAN (decanus, one who has authority over ten; cf. centurio). Civil officials so-called were known to the Roman law, and are mentioned in the Codes of Theodosius and Justinian. They seem to have been in some way concerned with the management of funerals. The title was adopted for Christian use, and first among the monks. For every ten monks a decanus or dean was nominated, who had the charge of their discipline. The senior dean, in the absence of the abbot and provost, governed the monastery. Since monks had the charge of many cathedral churches, the office of dean thus was introduced into them; custom gradually determined that there should be only one dean in a cathedral; with the increase of property the provost's time was largely taken up with temporal affairs; hence the dean gradually assumed the chief charge of the ecclesiastical and ritual concerns of the cathedral, especially in regard to the choir. When a regular observance was introduced among secular canons [Regular Canons], the office of dean, borrowed apparently from the monastic chapters, came in along with it. By the common law the care of souls, but no jurisdiction in foro externo, is committed to deans of chapters; but by special and customary law they often enjoyed in France in former times, and still enjoy in Germany in certain cases, large powers of visitation, administration, and jurisdiction, so that their authority is almost equal to that of bishops. By the common law the right of electing the dean belongs to the bishop and archdeacon; but by custom and prescription it is usually vested in the canons, subject to the confirmation of the bishop. In chapter-meetings the dean presides ex officio, and has a casting vote when there is an equal division; otherwise his powers do not exceed those of the canons. (Ferraris, Decanus.)

DEAN OF THE SACRED COLLEGE. The Cardinal Dean is the chief of the sacred college; he is usually the oldest of the Cardinal Bishops, and succeeds his predecessor as bishop of Ostia. He presides in the consistory in the absence of the Pope. In all ecclesiastical functions which he performs he has the privilege of wearing the pallium; and it is he on whom the duty devolves of conferring on the newly-elected Pope those orders which he may not have already received, and also of presiding at his coronation. Ambassadors, on arriving in Rome, pay their first visits to the Cardinal Dean, and newly-elected Cardinals render to him their earliest homage. The oldest in the order of bishops, after the Cardinal Dean, is sub-dean of the sacred college; he is usually bishop of Porto.

DECALOGUE. [See Commandments.]

DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER, MARRIAGE WITH. A few words on the Catholic view of this vexed question may not be out of place here. A man and his deceased wife's sister are related in the first degree of affinity, and therefore any attempted marriage between them would be null and void. [See Affinity.] But the Church has the power of dispensing from this impediment; hence Catholics who have obtained such a dispensation are validly married in God's sight. The English law, of course, refuses to recognise the marriage. It is for this reason that some Catholics have joined in the agitation in favour of the Deceased Wife's Sister Marriage Bill. The common view, however, is opposed to it on the ground that the existing law is in accordance with the canons of the Church.

DECLARATION OF GALLICAN CLERGY. [See Gallicanism.]

DECRETALS, THE. By this name is commonly understood the collection of laws and decisions made by St. Raymond of Pennafort at the command of Gregory IX. After the appearance of the Decretum of Gratian [Canon Law] in 1151, many jurisconsults applied themselves to the task of collecting and commenting upon ecclesiastical laws. These collections being incomplete, it sometimes happened that a Decretal deciding a given case in a particular way would be found in one collection and not in another, whence much uncertainty arose. False decretals also were not unfrequently manufactured about this time, so that Innocent III. was obliged to employ severe measures to suppress the practice. In order that all Church tribunals might have a comprehensive and consistent authority to guide them, Pope Gregory IX. directed St. Raymond, who was his chaplain and penitentiary, to make a new and authentic compilation of Papal Constitutions and Decretals. This great undertaking was completed in 1234. The work opens with a letter addressed by Gregory IX. to the doctors and scholars of the university of Bologna, in which, after explaining the motives which had influenced its preparation, he states it to be his wish that the work should be used both in the courts and in the schools, and forbids the publication of any similar collection without special authority from the Holy See. The five books of the Decretals, the principal subjects of which are indicated by the memorial line contain 185 Titles or Rubrics. The first title, "De Summa Trinitate et Fide Catholica," founding Church law on revealed religion, is a short profession of faith, with a statement of the divine constitution and authority of the Church.

St. Raymond used abbreviation to the utmost, in order to compress his matter within the limits of one volume. Thus he frequently records in full the operative part of a Decretal containing the Pontifical decision, but suppresses the recitals containing the case or cases on which the decision was founded. The gloss-writers and commentators, from not referring to the earlier collections in which the Decretals were given in full, sometimes misunderstood these decisions; their glosses, however, were acted upon by the courts: hence not a little perplexity arose. A canonist named Contius published an edition of the "Corpus Juris Canonici" in 1670, in which Raymond's omissions were supplied; but the innovation did not succeed, the original text having been used by jurists for so long a period; and the Decretals are still edited and cited in the form in which Raymond left them. The last edition appeared at Leipsic in 1840.

Among the chief commentators on the Decretals are Bernard of Parma, a canon of Bologna, and Sinibaldo Fieschi, afterwards Pope Innocent IV.

DECRETIST (decretista). A general name for a doctor of canon law; the word seems to be derived from the "Decretum" of Gratian. The university of Oxford used to confer the degrees of "Baccalaureus" and "Doctor" Decretorum. The term "decretalist" signified a canonist who was specially versed in the Decretals of Gregory IX.

DECRETUM GRATIANI. [See CANON LAW.]

DEDICATION OF CHURCHES. These words mean, properly speaking, the act by which a church is solemnly set apart for the worship of God; and afterwards this event is commemorated by a feast of the dedication. We have to treat of both subjects.

I. The actual Dedication of the Church.—In the Jewish Church the tabernacle and Temple were dedicated by solemn rites, and Cardinal Bona supposes that the practice of dedicating or consecrating Christian churches dates from Apostolic times, and was formally imposed by a law of Pope Evaristus. However this may be, we find the consecration of churches mentioned just after the heathen persecution was over by Euseb. (x. 3). It was one of the charges made by the Arians against Athanasius that he had said Mass in an unconsecrated church. Many early councils—e.g. that of Orange in 441 (can. 10)—take the practice of dedicating churches for granted, and legislate concerning it. The present law of the Church forbids the use of a church for the celebration of Mass unless it has been first consecrated or at least blessed, for which blessing a less solemn rite is provided in the Pontifical. It is unlawful to alienate a church which has been once consecrated, according to the maxim quoted from the "Regulæ Juris" appended to the sixth book of the Decretals—"That which has once been dedicated to God must not be transferred to common use."

The person who consecrates a church must be a bishop, and to him this consecration has always been and is still reserved, though a simple priest may be deputed to bless a church. Moreover, the consecrating bishop must be the bishop of the diocese or another bishop with leave from him, and this applies even to the churches of such religious as are exempt from episcopal jurisdiction, although in some cases special privileges in this matter have been granted—e.g. to the Friars Minor, who got powers from Honorius III. enabling them to invite another bishop to consecrate their churches, should the diocesan be unwilling to do so. In early times it was common for many bishops to assemble for the consecration of a church, and in those days many bishops might actually take part in the consecration, though the principal part was assigned to one only. At present, a bishop can by virtue of his ordinary jurisdiction consecrate any church in his diocese, but this has not been the case always and everywhere. Thus it appears from a Constitution of Gelasius, and from a letter of Gregory the Great, that Italian bishops could not consecrate churches even in their own dioceses without the Pope's leave; while in the province of Toledo permission had to be obtained from the metropolitan. These restrictions no longer exist.

The ritual of consecration has of course been gradually developed. Originally, to judge from Eusebius (loc. cit.), churches were consecrated by preaching, prayer, and above all by the acceptable sacrifice of the new law. St. Ambrose mentions the custom of consecrating churches by relics as one which prevailed at Rome and was adopted by him; he also speaks of the vigil kept by the relics over-night before they were transferred to the new church. In the Sacramentary of St. Gregory and the Pontifical of Egbert we meet with the rite of consecration almost in its present form, and we may trace the minor changes introduced in the "Ordines" which Martene has collected from different ages and dioceses. The following are the chief points in the rite prescribed by the present Roman Pontifical. The consecrating bishop, who should be fasting on the day before, sets apart over-night the relics to be used in the consecration. Lights burn before them, and matins and lauds are sung in honour of the saints whose relics have been procured. Twelve crosses are also marked on the walls of the church with candles attached to them. Next day these candles are lighted, and all things needful are prepared in the church, which is left in charge of a deacon duly vested. The bishop goes in procession round the outside of the church, three times sprinkling it with holy water, knocks three times at the church door with his pastoral staff, saying, "Lift up your heads, ye princes, and be ye lifted up, ye eternal gates, and the king of glory will enter." Three times the deacon within asks, "Who is the king of glory?" Twice the bishop answers, "The Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle," and the third time, "The Lord of armies, he is the king of glory." Thereupon the bishop enters with the clerics and others whose assistance he requires, leaving the rest of the clergy and people outside, and again closing the door. He forms a cross with the letters of the Greek and Latin alphabets, which he inscribes with his staff on ashes previously sprinkled upon the floor of the church—a rite which symbolises the instruction to be given to catechumens in the elements of the faith. Afterwards, he proceeds with the consecration of the altars, marking five crosses on each with his thumb, which he has dipped in a preparation of water, ashes, salt and wine, specially blessed, and sprinkling them seven times with this mixture. He also goes three times round the inside of the church and sprinkles the walls, as well as the floor of the church. Later on, the relics are borne into the church, the bishop, clergy, and people taking part in the procession. An address is first made to the people on the event of the day, and the outside of the door is anointed with chrism. The sepulchres of the altars are also anointed with chrism, and the relics placed in them. The table of the altar is anointed in the same manner and incensed, and five crosses are made on it with the oil of catechumens, as well as with chrism. Chrism is used later on to anoint the twelve crosses which have been marked on the walls, and incense is burned on the five crosses which have been previously made on the altar with blessed water, oil and chrism. Finally, the bishop makes a cross with chrism on the front and four corners of the altar, the cloths, vessels, ornaments, &c., are consecrated or blessed, and the dedication of the church is complete.

The meaning and use of this consecration are clearly stated by St. Thomas ("Summ." III. lxxxiii. 3). The rite, says the saint, signifies the holiness secured to the Church by Christ's passion, and required of its members. Moreover, in answer to the Church's prayers, God makes the church fit for His worship—i.e. He makes it a means of exciting special devotion in the faithful who enter it, if they do so with virtuous dispositions, and He drives far from it the power of the enemy. (From the Pontifical, with Catalani's commentary.)

II. The feast of the dedication ("fest. dedicationis," "encænia;" in St. Leo's sermon on the Machabees "natale ecclesiæ") is kept in consecrated churches on the anniversary of the consecration, as a double of the first class with an octave. The bishop at the time of the consecration may for grave reasons fix a day other than the actual anniversary on which the feast of the dedication is to be kept, but after the consecration no change in the day can be made except by the Pope's leave. Here, too, the Christian has followed the use of the Jewish Church, which celebrated yearly the purging of the Temple and the rebuilding of the altar after Judas Machabæus had driven out the Syrians in 164 B.C. The observance of the anniversary of a church's dedication can be traced back at least to Constantine's time. Besides the observance of this anniversary in the church itself, the feast of the dedication of the cathedral is kept throughout the diocese, also as a double of the first class, but without an octave.[1] Moreover, the dedication of certain Roman basilicas (S. Mariæ ad Nives, Basilicæ Salvatoris, Basilicæ SS. Petri et Pauli) is celebrated throughout the whole Church, the feast being in each case a double or greater double. (From Gavantus, P. II. sect. viii. cap. 5.)

DEFENDER OF THE FAITH (Defensor fidei). This title was conferred on our king Henry VIII. and his successors by Pope Leo X. in the year 1521. In that year Henry sent to the Pope his book in defence of the seven sacraments against Luther. The Pope received the book in full consistory, eulogised it in the strongest terms, and some days later consulted the Cardinals on the best means of showing how he felt Henry's services to the Church. After a long conference, it was resolved to bestow the title of Defender of the Faith on the English kings. Accordingly a bull was sent conferring the title in question, and with it Leo despatched a brief thanking Henry for his book. (See Pallavicini, "Hist. Concil. Trid." lib. ii. c. 1, quoted in the Continuation of Fleury.)

DEFENSOR ECCLESIÆ (ἐκκλησιέκδικος). A functionary of whom frequent mention is made in the annals of the primitive Church; he was nominated by the emperor, on the presentation of the bishop, to protect the temporal interests of a particular church. In the East he was usually an ecclesiastic, in the West a layman.

DEFENSOR MATRIMONII. The law affecting official "defenders of the marriage" is laid down in the Constitution Dei miseratione of Benedict XIV. In all matrimonial suits a defensor matrimonii must take part, his function being to sustain the marriage of which it is sought to prove the nullity, by adducing every argument and consideration in its favour which the case admits of. His function may be compared to that of the Queen's Proctor in the English Divorce Court, who "intervenes" between the parties, if he deems that there is reason to suspect collusion, or that the party applying for the divorce is disqualified from obtaining it, the effect of such intervention being to stay the divorce and sustain the marriage. In the Roman Curia suits of nullity of marriage come before the Congregation of the Council [CONGREGATIONS, ROMAN] or the Auditory of the Apostolic Palace: in the former case the defensor is appointed by the Cardinal Prefect, in the latter, by the Auditor Dean. In courts of the second instance—e.g. that of a metropolitan, or of a Papal nuncio—the judge is entitled, and also bound, to appoint a defensor; except where the hearing of a case has been deputed by the Holy See to a special commissary who has no ordinary jurisdiction, for under such circumstances the bishop of the diocese where the hearing is to take place nominates the defensor. The same Constitution directs that a defensor shall be appointed, if possible, from among the clergy of every diocese by the bishop, who shall attend all matrimonial suits. A defensor is to receive reasonable fees, payable either by the litigant supporting the validity of the marriage, or, if he is indigent, out of the fines of court or the episcopal treasury. He must be sworn to discharge his office faithfully; he must be cited at, and kept duly informed of, every stage of the case; and it is his duty always to appeal from the first sentence by which the nullity of any marriage is declared. (Ferraris, Defensor.)

DEGRADATION. Degradation is of two kinds, verbal and real. By the first a criminous cleric is declared to be perpetually deposed from clerical orders, or from the execution thereof, so as to be deprived of all order and function—e.g. the sacerdotal or episcopal—and of any benefice which he might have previously enjoyed. But the person degraded does not lose the privilegium fori—that is, he is not remitted for justice to the secular courts, but may still use the ecclesiastical. Nor does he lose the privilegium canonis, in virtue of which the assailant of a cleric incurs excommunication ipso facto. Nor does degradation cause a priest to lose the character of the priesthood, which is indelible. The consecration of the Eucharist by a degraded priest is therefore valid, as well as his absolution of a penitent given in articulo mortis. He is still bound to continence, and to the recitation of his office. The obligation as to the latter point would seem to be a doubtful matter in certain cases, according to decisions of the Congregation of the Council and Clement XI. in the case of clerks condemned to the galleys.

Real or actual degradation is that which, besides deposing a cleric from the exercise of his ministry, actually strips him of his orders, according to a prescribed ceremonial, and delivers him to the secular arm to be punished. The person thus degraded loses the privilegium fori et canonis; but as (if a priest) he cannot be deprived of the sacerdotal character, his consecration of the Eucharist and absolutions of persons in articulo are still valid, as in the former case.

The canon law specifies minutely the crimes on account of which the punishment of degradation may be legally inflicted, and leaves no jurisdiction with bishops of degrading except for the causes determined by the law and by the Roman Pontiffs.

For the ceremony of real degradation a form was laid down by Boniface VIII. The delinquent clerk was to be brought before the bishop, habited in the dress of his order, and with a book or vessel, or some other instrument or ornament in his hands, as if he were proceeding to the performance of his clerical functions. The bishop was then publicly to take away from him the things, whether vestment, chalice, book, or anything else, that had been delivered to him at the time of his ordination, beginning with that vestment or ornament which he had received last, and ending with the vestment which he put on when he was first tonsured. Lastly, his head was to be shaved, so as to obliterate the mark of the tonsure. When the last of the clerical insignia was taken away, the bishop was to address him to the following effect: "By the authority of God Almighty, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and by our own, we take away from thee the clerical habit, and depose, degrade, and deprive thee of all order, benefice, and clerical privilege."

The above ceremony can only be performed by a bishop in person; but a verbal degradation can be carried out by the vicar-general, acting as the bishop's representative, or by the vicar-capitular, acting for the chapter, during a vacancy of the see.

The Church delivers to the lay power with extreme reluctance those who have once been her ordained ministers; and, in doing so, "is bound to intercede efficaciously for them, that moderate sentences, not involving the peril of death, may be passed upon them." In ancient times the bishops endeavoured from this motive to shut up degraded clerks in monasteries rather than hand them over to the secular arm, as the former course seemed more likely to lead to their repentance and reformation.

Formerly the law required that a number of bishops, varying according to the rank of the delinquent, should concur to the degradation of a cleric; but since the Council of Trent[1] degradation of either kind may be carried out by a single bishop, assisted by as many abbots or other dignitaries as bishops would have been required under the old law.

The common opinion of the Fathers was that a degraded cleric could be reinstated, upon proof of sincere repentance and amendment of life. The judgment of Gregory the Great seems to have been that the degradation, once inflicted, ought to be irreversible. In modern times this question can seldom be raised, because a cleric is not now degraded excepting for a crime of great enormity, punished with the heaviest penalties by the civil power. (Ferraris, Degradatio.)

DEGREES (IN THEOLOGY, ETC.). The history of learned degrees—i.e. of the titles doctor or master, licentiate, bachelor—is closely connected with that of universities. We find the first traces of them in the legal school of Bologna. There the title of doctor or master was given first of all to any teacher, but about the middle of the twelfth century "doctor" was used as an honorary title, and was given specially to the four doctors, viz. Bulgarus, Martinus, Jacobus, and Hugo. As the university, which had been founded about 1100, began to be duly constituted, the teachers formed themselves into a college, they acquired a certain jurisdiction over the students, and they subjected persons who wished to lecture to a previous examination. Those who were so examined and approved received the dignity of the doctorate. At first it was "legists" or professors of civil law, and these only, who obtained this title; but towards the close of the twelfth age canonists also were called doctors, as appears from a Decretal of Innocent III. addressed to the "doctores decretorum Bononiæ," as well as the "doctores legum" at the same school. In the thirteenth century "doctors of medicine," of grammar, logic, philosophy, and the other arts were recognised. The jurists, however, claimed the title of doctor as exclusively their own, and would only grant the title of "master" to the qualified teachers of theology and the arts. At Bologna a candidate for the doctorate had to swear before the Rector that he had gone through the regular course of studies—i.e. that he had studied civil law for eight, or the canon law for six, years. Next, the candidate was presented by a doctor to the archdeacon of Bologna, who had the right, grounded on a rescript issued by Honorius III. in 1219, of granting or refusing permission to graduate. This permission being given, the candidate was examined privately in civil or in canon law, or in each of them if he wished to graduate in each, by the doctors who were empowered to promote. The doctors voted after the examination, and if their votes were favourable the candidate became a licentiate. As a rule, this degree of licentiate was a mere step to the doctorate. Occasionally we find cases of persons remaining licentiates for years, but as a rule the licentiate passed on at once to the second and public examination for the doctorate. At this the licentiate made a speech on his promotion, gave a lecture on law, and held a public dispute with the scholars, all of which exercises took place in the cathedral. Thereupon the archdeacon or his delegate proclaimed him doctor, while the presiding doctor invested him with the book, with the doctor's ring and cap, and seated him in the doctor's chair. Both licentiate and doctor received a diploma; the earliest known is dated 1314.

The new doctor acquired very important rights. He had authority to teach in Bologna, and Papal decrees secured the recognition of this right throughout Christendom. He was called "doctor legens," or "non legens," according as he did or did not exercise the privilege, and it was when the doctors who did not lecture became common that the notion of the doctorate as an independent dignity became perfected. Next, the new doctor was qualified to be chosen member of the faculty for promoting others to the same degree. Lastly, the doctors had jurisdiction over their scholars, who, by concession of Frederic Barbarossa in 1158, might choose to stand their trial "coram domino vel magistro suo vel ipsius civitatis episcopo."

The degrees of doctor, &c., were of course conferred by other universities, such as Paris, Oxford, &c., when they came to be erected. Gradually also the degree of bachelor or baccalaureus became an independent degree. Originally, bachelor was the name given to a student who, having taken his oath that he had studied law for six years, was permitted by the Rector to teach an entire book of Roman or civil law. The origin of the degree of licentiate has been explained above. The word "magister," or master, designated first the master of a cathedral school, then the dignitary appointed to give free theological instruction in the cathedral churches. In universities "magister" was used at first vaguely as synonymous with teacher or professor; then it became a synonym of doctor in the technical sense, as the highest of the university degrees. If there was any distinction between magister and doctor it depended simply on local custom. Thus, in Italy, France, and Spain, those who had obtained the highest theological degree were usually called "magistri theologiæ" the word "doctor" being reserved for graduates in the other faculties. In Germany, on the other hand, graduates in philosophy used to be called masters, those in the other faculties doctors.

By the law of the Church the dignity of doctor in theology and canon law cannot be given except by such theological faculties as have been confirmed by the Pope. The doctor on his promotion must make the profession of faith drawn up by Pius IV. According to the Council of Trent (xxiv. 12, De Ref.) it is desirable that all dignities and half the canonries in each chapter should be conferred on doctors or masters in theology or canon law, unless there are reasons to the contrary. Doctors in theology and canon law are also usually summoned to consult with the bishops in general and provincial councils. (From Wetzer and Welte.)

DELEGATION. A judge or administrator delegates his jurisdiction and power when he commits their exercise to another. A judge-delegate differs from a judge in ordinary in that the latter exercises his own jurisdiction, and decides cases in his own right, whereas the delegate relies on the right and jurisdiction of another. The delegate is bound to show his commission or credentials to the parties whose cause he is to try, to give them due notice of the time when they are to come before him, and to fix the place of hearing at a distance not exceeding twenty miles from the locality where the cause of action arose.

Not only supreme authorities, as Popes, emperors, and republics, but, by the canon and civil law, all ordinary judges can delegate their jurisdiction to another. The delegator is in such case responsible for all judgments given by his delegate, for "Qui facit per alium est perinde ac si faciat per se ipsum." But the delegating judge cannot divest himself of his whole jurisdiction without his sovereign's consent, and this for obvious reasons, especially because such delegation would be tantamount to an appointment, and so infringe on the right of the superior authority. Moreover, a delegate may commit his jurisdiction to a subdelegate, but only if he be commissioned by a prince or some sovereign authority. Hence the question has been raised whether the delegate of a Roman congregation can appoint a sub-delegate, and it has been answered in the affirmative.

All persons are capable of being appointed judge-delegates who are not hindered by nature, by law, or by custom. By nature, as the deaf, the dumb, or the insane, "quia tales carent judicio." By law, as those whom a judicial sentence has declared infamous. By custom, as slaves and women. Delegates of the Holy See, or of a Papal legate, ought to be dignitaries or canons of a cathedral church; but the delegate of a bishop may be any clerk whom he may see fit to appoint. The reason of the distinction is that the bishop, having complete personal knowledge of his clergy, may have good reason for placing his confidence in an undistinguished cleric; but the Holy See, being without that personal knowledge, appoints delegates who may be presumed from their high position to be well qualified for the duty. Bishops and all ecclesiastical judges below the Pope cannot delegate their power in spiritual causes to a layman, or even to a layman jointly with an ecclesiastic. This rule applies also to criminal causes in which clerics are concerned; but not to purely civil causes, as about debts and money matters generally, for in regard to these a bishop can appoint a layman as his delegate. This, however, has been contested. The Supreme Pontiff can, out of his full and certain knowledge, delegate to a layman—e.g. to an emperor or king—the trial even of the criminal and spiritual causes of clerics. This right emanates from the plenary power of the Pope, in virtue of which he dispenses, when necessary, with the established law.

The Council of Trent[1] ordered that in every provincial or diocesan synod several persons should be elected who were qualified to act as Papal delegates, and that the bishops should notify such appointments to the Holy See. But as these notifications were seldom made, the decree fell into desuetude, and the Holy See was compelled to proceed as before in appointing delegates to try causes in distant countries, on the best information that could be obtained.

Since many powers are by Pontifical law delegated to bishops, it is sometimes difficult to distinguish whether, in a given case, a bishop is acting as ordinary or as delegate of the Holy See. If the former, the appeal from his sentence is to the metropolitan; if the latter, to the Pope. The canonists lay down many rules and testing circumstances, by means of which the necessary discrimination may be made.

Delegation may cease (1) by the death of the delegate, if the delegation was personal, not official;[2] (2) by the death of the delegator, at least if the cause was not yet commenced; (3) by his deposition from office, with the same proviso; (4) by revocation of powers; (5) by expiration of time; (6) by the discharge of the commission; and in several other ways. (Ferraris, Delegare, Delegatus.)

DEMON. [See DEVIL.]

DENUNCIATION. An edict of the Roman Inquisition, dated in 1677, orders all persons, in virtue of holy obedience and under the penalty of excommunication latæ sententiæ, to denounce to the Holy Office, within the term of one month, all persons whom they may know to be heretics, or suspected of heresy, and the abettors of such; also all persons whom they may know to be addicted to magic, witchcraft, and diabolic arts, or to keep without permission, or promote the circulation of, books teaching heresy or the black art, or to have broken their religious vows or canonical obligations by contracting marriage, or to have committed bigamy, or abused the sacrament of penance, or uttered heretical blasphemies, or treated holy images with disrespect and contempt, or frequented anti-religious conventicles, or perverted Christians to Judaism or any sect contrary to the Catholic faith, or been guilty of sacrilegious invasion, not being priests, of the priestly office.

[2] As when, for instance, Philip IV. and Edward I. committed the arbitration of their disputes to the Pope, not as Pope, but as "Benedetto Gaetani."

It is inferred from this that anyone who teaches one of the condemned propositions PROPOSITIONES DAMNATÆ ought to be denounced to the Holy Office.

At the same time "Catholics are not bound to denounce heretics in those places in which heretics are mixed with Catholics, the inquisitors and bishops being aware of the fact, since no one is under an obligation to do what is useless."[1]

The probable risk of serious injury to person, property, and reputation does not release from the obligation of denouncing a formal heretic, though it does release from the obligation in the case of persons only suspected of heresy.[2]

Formal heretics, on account of the pestilent and contagious nature of the crime, ought to be denounced even after their death, so that they may be declared excommunicate, be deprived of ecclesiastical sepulture, be disinterred, and their bones burned, if they can be distinguished from those of Catholics; if not, they should be burnt in effigy.[3] (Ferraris, Denuntiatio.)

DEPOSING POWER. Few politico-religious questions have been more keenly argued than that which treats of the relations of control or otherwise between the Roman Pontiff and secular princes and governments. During the middle ages it was held everywhere in Christian countries with undoubting conviction that princes were amenable on the score of heresy to the ecclesiastical power, and that the Pope as the vicegerent of Christ could lawfully excommunicate, and after excommunication depose or procure the deposition of a sovereign who had fallen into heresy. This was no Ultramontane theory, but the common teaching of theologians everywhere. Thus we find Alexander Hales, an English Franciscan of the thirteenth century, saying, "The spiritual power has to instruct the earthly power, and to judge whether it is good; it was itself first instituted by God, and when it goes astray, it can be judged by God alone." And, "God has willed that some should have power over others, more in number; and then that a still smaller number should have power over the first; and so on by ascending degrees until one is reached, namely the Pope, who is immediately under God." The third canon of the Lateran Council (1215) ordains that if a secular ruler persists, after being warned, in letting heresy grow up undisturbed in his dominions, he is to be excommunicated by the bishops of the regions subject to him; if he contemn the excommunication, the Pope is to be informed, "so that he may declare the vassals of that ruler absolved from his fealty, and invite Catholics to occupy the country." No one, says Bellarmine, in those ages thought of making any objection to this canon: for "not yet in truth had the race of parasites to temporal princes appeared, who, that they may appear to establish their earthly kingdoms, take away the eternal kingdom from those whom they fawn upon."

On the other hand, many theologians, while admitting the fact of the general belief in the middle ages that the power of the Pontiff was above that of all temporal sovereigns, and included, in extreme cases, the right of deposing them, account for this belief in various ways, but do not admit that it has any root in the depositum fidei. Some say that the influence of the feudal idea of suzerainty caused the Pope to be regarded as suzerain over all sovereigns within the limits of Christendom, but that, with the weakening or abolition of feudalism, this theory and all its consequences must be abandoned. Others ground the Papal claims in this respect on the received public law of those ages, that emperors and kings had to profess the true faith, and be in communion with the Pope, as essential conditions of their reigning lawfully; if these conditions were broken, of which the Pope was the judge, then, at the demand of the subjects, he could relieve them of their allegiance and declare their ruler unfit to reign. Here again, a temporary basis only is allowed to the deposing power, as depending on a condition of opinion which in modern times has ceased to exist. Gerson, Duperron, and Fénelon go much further than this, but stop short of allowing any coercive jurisdiction to exist in the Pope, in right of his primacy, over sovereigns.

[1] Ferraris, "Den." § 18.
[2] Ibid. §§ 24, 25.
[3] Ibid. § 19.

"The Church," says Fénelon, "neither deprived nor appointed lay rulers, but only replied, when the nations consulted it, explaining what concerned the conscience in regard to the political contract or the oath [of allegiance]. This is not a juridical and civil, but only a directive and ordinative power." The power, he adds, consists only in this, "that the Pope, as the chief of pastors—as the principal director and doctor of the Church in the greater causes of Christian moral discipline—is bound to instruct a people consulting him on what concerns their keeping the oath of fealty which they have sworn."[1]

The ordinary opinion of Roman theologians may be seen stated in full in the pages of Ferraris. "The common opinion teaches that the Pope holds the power of both swords, the spiritual and the temporal, which jurisdiction and power Christ Himself committed to Peter and his successors, saying (Matt. xvi. 19) 'I will give to thee the keys,' &c.; where doctors note that he did not say 'key' but 'keys,' thereby comprehending the temporal along with the spiritual power." The contrary opinion is held to savour of the heretical belief condemned by Boniface VIII. in the Constitution "Unam Sanctam." "Accordingly, unbelieving kings and princes can be deprived by the sentence of the Pope, in certain cases, of the dominion which they have over believers: for instance, if they have forcibly seized upon Christian countries, or are endeavouring to turn their believing subjects from the faith, and the like." Barbosa and other canonists hold that "a king who has become a heretic can be removed from his kingdom by the Pope, to whom the right of electing a successor passes, if his sons and kindred are also heretics." "There is nothing strange in attributing to the Roman Pontiff, as the vicar of Him whose is the earth and the fulness thereof, the world and all that dwell therein, the fullest authority and power to lay bare, a just cause moving him, not only the spiritual but also the material sword, and so to transfer sovereignties, break sceptres, and remove crowns." The canonists produce numerous instances where this has been actually done, as when Gregory II. deposed the Byzantine emperor Leo III.; Gregory VII. deposed the emperor Henry IV.; Innocent IV., in the Council of Lyons, deposed the emperor Frederick II.; &c.

[1] Soglia, De Romano Pontifice, § 33.

The celebrated Constitution "Unam Sanctam"[1] (1303) teaches that "both swords, the spiritual and the material, are in the power of the Church, but the latter is to be wielded for the Church, the former by the Church; one by the hand of the priest, the other by the hand of kings and magistrates,[2] but at the pleasure and sufferance of the priest. One sword must be under the other; and the temporal authority must be subject to the spiritual power. . . . The spiritual power has to teach the earthly power, and to judge it, if it is not good. . . . Therefore, if the earthly power goes astray, it shall be judged by the spiritual power;" whereas the spiritual power is responsible to God alone.

Bellarmine, in a sentence of great clearness and force, has clothed the doctrine of the deposing power in a philosophical form. After quoting the famous lines of the sixth Æneid, "Excudent alii," &c., he says that, as the art of the sculptor is not included in, nor derived from, the art of government, and yet is subject to it, "so the ecclesiastical art of governing souls, which is the art of arts, and resides principally in the Pope, does not necessarily include the art of [secular] government, nor is it necessary that all governments should be derived from the Church; and yet, because its end is eternal life, to which all other ends are subordinated, the political art of ruling peoples is subject and subordinate to this art, and the Supreme Pontiff can and ought to command kings that they do not abuse their royal power, to the subversion of the Church, to the fostering of heresies and schisms—in short, to the eternal ruin of themselves and the peoples subject to them; and if they do not obey after having been admonished he can cast them out of the Church by the censure of excommunication, and absolve the peoples from their oath of fealty; finally, he can strip them of their realms and deprive them of the royal power."[3]

The state of Europe is so much altered since the time of Bellarmine, that there is no longer any question, even at Rome, of exercising the deposing power. When, through the growth of heresy and unbelief, and the spread of opinions favourable to the absolute independence and unlimited authority of kings or States, the popular assent to the use of the de-posing power had vanished, the power itself fell into abeyance; for without such assent it could not be effectively exercised. Accordingly the late Pope, in a sermon quoted by Cardinal Soglia, said, "No one now thinks any more of the right of deposing princes, which the Holy See formerly exercised; and the Supreme Pontiff even less than anyone." (Ferraris, Papa.)

DEPOSITION in the strict sense (depositio perpetua) deprives a clerk of all right to exercise his orders, of his benefice and of jurisdiction. It is distinct, on the one hand, from mere privation, because deposition is perpetual, and, on the other hand, from degradation, because deposition is inflicted by the mere sentence of competent authority without any such ceremonies as accompany degradation, and because a deposed, unlike a degraded, person still belongs to the clerical state, and enjoys the privileges of the canon and forum. The distinction between degradation and deposition dates from the twelfth century. Deposition, being an act of jurisdiction, can be inflicted by the bishop of the diocese, by the vicar-general acting in the bishop's name, and by the prelates of religious orders. Deposition is the punishment assigned in the canons for certain grave crimes, such as murder, perjury, robbery, adultery, &c.

DEPOSITION, BULL OF. Often as the celebrated bull of Pius V. is referred to, its exact terms are but little known; we therefore subjoin an abstract of its contents. The bull begins "Regnans in excelsis." After the opening passage, it proceeds:—"But the party of the impious has become so powerful that there is now no place in the world left which they have not endeavoured to corrupt with their abominable doctrines, being supported by, amongst others, that flagitious woman, the pretended queen of England, Elizabeth; to whom, as to a safe asylum, all the most dangerous and mischievous characters have fled for shelter. This same queen, having seized the royal power, monstrously arrogating to herself the place of supreme head of the Church in all England, and the chief authority and jurisdiction over it, has plunged again into a gulf of misery and ruin a kingdom which long ago was converted to the Catholic faith and to sound and moral living (bonam frugem)." After describing the forcible suppression of the true religion, Pius proceeds: "She has ordered that books containing manifest heresy shall be used throughout the kingdom, and that the impious rites and institutes, modelled after the teaching of Calvin, which she herself has adopted and observes, shall be also conformed to by her subjects." Driving out the true bishops, the members of religious orders, &c., and forbidding all obedience to the Pope and any reference to Rome, "she has compelled the greater number [of her subjects] to submit to her nefarious laws, to abjure the authority of the Roman Pontiff, and the obedience due to him, and to recognise upon oath herself as their sole superior alike in things temporal and things spiritual; . . . . she has cast into prison Catholic bishops and parish priests, where many, wasted away by long sickness and sorrow, have expired in utter misery." These things, he says, are "palpable and notorious in the sight of all nations." He has been informed that her "mind is so stubbornly fixed and hardened," that she not only despises the remonstrances of Catholic princes, "but will not even permit the nuncios of this See to cross into England to speak to her on this subject." The Pope therefore declares that "the aforesaid Elizabeth, as a heretic and a supporter of heretics, and those who adhere to her in the aforesaid proceedings, have incurred the sentence of anathema, and are cut off from the unity of the body of Christ; moreover that she is deprived of her pretended right over the aforesaid kingdom, and of all dominion, dignity, and privilege whatever." He releases her subjects from any oath of fealty they have taken to her, and from all obedience and submission to her whatsoever. Those who obey her and her laws are bound and implicated in "the like sentence of anathema." The date—April 27, 1570.

On this bull it may be remarked that the attempts of the Holy See to depose Elizabeth stand by themselves. After her death nothing similar occurs; and yet the condition of Catholics in England grew worse from reign to reign, and it is notorious that the doctrine on which the bull rests continued to be held at Rome. This seems to show that when no hope could any more be reasonably entertained that the decision of the Holy See would have weight with the English people, all thought of exerting the deposing power was laid aside. But in 1570 things had not gone so far; the bull speaks of Elizabeth as a tyrant as well as a heretic; the theory of it was, that the bulk of the nation, and the best part of it, were still attached to Catholicism, but were being dragooned by the Government into heresy against their will. Hence the Pope might believe that by throwing the whole weight of Church censures on the side of the oppressed he would encourage them to rise and cast off the tyranny. And so perhaps it might have been but for several special circumstances: for instance, the dread entertained by Englishmen generally of civil war, after the long and terrible experience of the fifteenth century, the exceptional sagacity and energy of Elizabeth's ministers, the dislike felt towards Spain, &c. ("Concilia Magnæ Britanniæ et Hiberniæ," vol. iv. 1737).

DESCENT OF CHRIST INTO HELL. [See LIMBO.]

DESECRATION OF CHURCHES, ALTARS, CHALICES, ETC. By consecration churches and altars are solemnly set apart to God's service; by desecration they lose this sacred character, become unfit for the sacred uses which they were meant to serve, and need to be consecrated anew.

A church is desecrated if the greater part of it is demolished—e.g. if the outer walls are destroyed, or if the greater part of them is demolished at one and the same time. A church does not lose its consecration if the roof falls in, because it is the walls, not the roof, which were specially consecrated [see DEDICATION OF CHURCHES]: or, again, if parts of the church are replaced by a new structure at intervals, even if in the end the whole building is new.

An altar is desecrated (execratur) (1) if the consecrated table is removed from the lower structure (this only applies to a fixed altar); (2) if it is broken to such an extent that not enough of it is left entire to support the chalice and paten; (3) if the seal of the sepulchre is broken, or if the sepulchre with the relics is removed.

A chalice loses its consecration if so injured that it can no longer contain the consecrated wine; also, according to St. Liguori and many other theologians, if it is regilt.[1]

The English word desecration may also be taken as equivalent to the Latin word pollutio. A church or cemetery is desecrated in this sense (polluitur) (1) by culpable homicide; (2) by shedding of blood, provided the act be grievously sinful; (3) by certain acts of an immoral or indecent character; (4) by the burial of an unbaptised person or of a person excommunicated by name. If any of the cases cited above have occurred, and the fact is notorious, then the church or cemetery cannot be used till it has been purified or reconciled by the bishop according to a solemn form prescribed in the Pontifical.

DEUS, IN ADJUTORIUM MEUM INTENDE ("O God, come to my assistance"). The opening words of Ps. lxix., which are used at the beginning of each hour except compline. In matins they are preceded by the versicles "Lord, thou wilt open my lips," &c. We learn from Cassian (Coll. x. 10) that the words "Deus, in adjutorium," &c., were a common ejaculatory prayer with the ancient monks, but it is uncertain whether they were used, as at present, in the divine office before St. Benedict's time.

DEUTERO-CANONICAL BOOKS. [See CANON OF SCRIPTURE.]

DEVIL AND EVIL SPIRITS. Their personal existence is clearly taught both in the Old Testament and in the New. In the Hebrew Bible an "evil spirit" is said to have come on Saul (1 Sam. xvi. 14), and the sacrifices offered to idols are represented as really made to "demons."[1] In Job i. 6, 12, ii. 7, and two books written after the exile, viz. in Zach. iii. 1, 1 Paralip. xxi. 1, mention is made of "the adversary" or accusing spirit par excellence (הַשָּׂטָן), always with the article, except in the passage quoted from Paral.[2] This Satan slandered Job to God, incited David to number the people, and opposed Josue the high priest. Moreover, we know from the Book of Wisdom, and from the Apocalypse in the New Testament, that it was he who took

[1] This opinion is now certain from a decree of SS. Cong. Rit., June 14, 1845.

[1] These demons are called שְׂעִירִים or "lords' (Vulg. dæmonia) in Deut. xxxii. 17, Ps. cvi. (Vulg. cv.) 37. שְׂעִירִים or "hairy beings," like satyrs in Levit. xvii. 7 (Vulg. again "demons"). These "satyrs" are said to "dance" and to cry out to each other in waste places, Is. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 14 (the Vulg. in both places "pilosi," "pilosus"). The student interested in such matters may be referred to Baudissin's masterly treatise in the first volume of his Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, where the apparent identification of idolatry with demon-worship is fully discussed. Levit. xvii. 7, Deut. xxxii. 17, Ps. cvi. 37 (see also 2 Chron. xxviii. 23), are the strongest passages, though they are not perhaps conclusive. But this view is clearly expressed in 1 Cor. x. 20.

[2] Some would add Ps. cix. 6. See Wright on Zachariah, p. 543.

the form of a serpent and seduced our first parents, so that he is rightly called "devil," (διάβολος) or "slanderer," because he not only slanders men before God, but also brings false accusations against God Himself. But the Hebrew Scriptures are far indeed from acknowledging a principle of evil able to offer any effectual opposition to God. The first chapters of Job represent Satan as impotent for evil except by God's permission, and the same dependence of the devil on God is clearly implied in Zacharias, and in other places where the agency of false and lying spirits is described.

We gain much fuller information from the New Testament. There we are told that the devil is a spirit (Ephes. ii. 2); that he is a prince with evil angels subject to him (Matt. xii. 24–26, xxv. 41); that the demons were not originally evil, but fell through sin (2 Pet. ii. 4, Jude 6); and it is at least a plausible inference from St. Paul's words, 1 Tim. iii. 6, "not a neophyte, lest, being puffed up with pride, he fall into the judgment of the devil," that Satan fell by pride. All spiritual evil and error (2 Cor. xi. 14, 15), all which hinders the Gospel (1 Thess. ii. 18, Apoc. ii. 10), is traced ultimately to him. Moreover, although Christ's death was intended to destroy the works of the devil, and has in fact done so to a great extent, still Satan has a terrible power over the world and its votaries, so much so that he is called the ruler and even the "god" of this world (John xii. 31, 2 Cor. iv. 4); and hence St. Paul (1 Cor. v. 5) regards exclusion from the Church as tantamount to a deliverance of the excommunicated person into the power of Satan. At last this power will be destroyed. Satan and his angels will be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where their torments will be everlasting.

Such is the teaching which lies on the surface of Scripture, and little can be added to it from tradition or by theological induction. The history of the doctrine on the devil and his angels is stated by Petavius in the third book of his treatise on the angels, from which the following account is taken. Even after it was universally held that the angels were pure spirits, some still clung to the belief that the devils after their fall changed their nature and became "partly material." This opinion was defended by the Greeks at Florence, but is certainly false. The devil was the chief of these fallen spirits, and it is held by the greater number of authors that he was originally the chief of all the angels. The terrible description of the fall of the king of Tyre in Ezechiel xxviii. has been interpreted of the devil's fall, so much so, indeed, that the name Lucifer commonly given to the devil is derived from this passage. But the reference to the devil, as Petavius rightly argues, is not contained in the literal meaning of the prophet's words. Although condemned to the pains of hell immediately after their fall, still from time to time the devil and his angels wander in the air and over the earth. The common opinion among theologians is that wherever they go the demons are tortured by the fires of hell, though they are by no means agreed as to the way in which the fires of hell exercise this strange power over them. On the other hand, it was commonly held by ancient writers that the demons will not be tortured by the fire of hell till the day of judgment, and Petavius says one who maintains "that the devil and his angels are not yet tortured by that extreme and utmost torture, that they do not yet feel the efficacy of that fire in which the chief part of their damnation, so far as feeling and suffering go, consists, is not to be accused of error, much less of heresy." On this theory the rebel angels will begin to experience the eternal torments of hell fire at the day of judgment. But in any case it is certain from the words of Christ, "Depart ye cursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels," from the general teaching of the Fathers, and from the definition of the Fourth Lateran Council,[1] that the devil and his angels are condemned without hope of pardon.

DEVOLUTION. The jus devolutionis is that right by which, according to the canon law, when a patron has improperly exercised, or neglected to exercise, his canonical right of presenting to a benefice, he loses it for that time, and the right passes to the ecclesiastical dignitary of next higher rank. This is the bishop, when any patron under his jurisdiction, whether an individual or a corporation, is chargeable with the neglect; the archbishop, when the neglect is in one of his suffragans; the Pope, when the election of an archbishop, bishop, or abbot has been made uncanonically, or not made in time. By the Concordat of Vienna in 1448, the right of devolution was granted to the Pope both in these cases and in the event of the election being rejected for other defects.

The State law of different countries in modern times frequently prevents the exercise of this canonical right. In France it is excluded altogether; the bishop has the sole right of collation to the benefices vacant in his diocese. In Prussia, Wurtemberg, and Baden the right exists, but in a very restricted form. (Permaneder, in Wetzer and Welte.)

DEVOTION, FEASTS OF. A word commonly used to mark feasts which were once holidays of obligation but are so no longer, the precept of hearing Mass and resting from servile works having been annulled by the Holy See, and the special observance of the feasts in question having been left to the devotion of the faithful.

DIACONICUM (διακονικόν). A building attached to ancient basilicas, much the same as secretarium or sacristy. It was divided (1) into the reception-room (salutatorium or receptorium, οἶκος ἀσπαστικός) in which the bishop was received by the clergy and also gave audiences. It was in such a reception-room that Theodosius begged absolution from St. Ambrose. (2) The sacristy proper (mutatorium, vestiarium), where the deacons kept the sacred vessels to be used at Mass, &c., and the priests put their vestments on and off, before and after officiating. (3) A chamber (γαζοφυλάκιον) in which books, church-plate, vestments, &c., not required for immediate use, were kept. Councils were often held in a diaconicum; so were ecclesiastical courts. The bishop's corpse was also laid out here before burial.

DIES IRÆ. [See HYMNS.]

DIMISSORIALS (literæ dimissoriæ, seu reverendæ). In its most general sense, leave to be ordained, with testimony to fitness either expressed or implied. This licence may be given—

1. By the Roman Pontiff, who can grant letters dimissory to ordinands from any part of the world, authorising their ordination by any Catholic bishop. The Pope can also confer orders on anyone whom he judges fit to receive them, without waiting for letters dimissory from any bishop.

2 By any bishop to his own subjects (suis subditis). There are four ways by which a clerk may be the subditus of a bishop, technically called origo, domicilium, beneficium, triennalis commensatio. That is—either his native place, or his present domicile, or the benefice which he enjoys, is within the bishop's diocese; or else he has lived in the bishop's family, and been supported by him, for at least three years. The last two grounds of subjection having been frequently abused in the seventeenth century, so that men of dubious antecedents were ordained by bishops to whose dioceses they did not properly belong, on the ground of holding, or being promised, benefices in them, or of having lived in their families, Innocent XI., by the Constitution "Speculatores" (1694), forbade that any clerk, already tonsured or promoted to minor orders by his own bishop, should be promoted to higher orders by any other bishop on the title of a benefice obtained in his diocese, unless such clerk should first have obtained and exhibited to the ordaining bishop letters dimissory from the bishop of origin, or of domicile, or from both if necessary, bearing favourable testimony as to his birth, age, character, and conduct.

3. By abbots, or other superiors of orders, authorising and recommending their own subjects for ordination. Abbots may not give dimissorials to seculars.[1] The rule is, that the dimissorials of an abbot should be directed to the bishop of the diocese in which the monastery is situated; if, however, he be absent, or not about to hold an ordination, they may be addressed to any other bishop. A decree on this subject was published by Clement VIII. in 1595. Certain orders have particular privileges: thus, by a Constitution of Gregory XIII., confirmed by Paul V., the rectors of Jesuit houses can grant dimissorials to clerks of their society addressed to any Catholic bishop whatsoever. Franciscans of the Observance enjoy the same privilege in the West Indies and the parts adjoining, by a grant of Urban VIII. Some maintain that, in consequence of a concession made by Clement VII. to the Portuguese congregation of St. John the Evangelist, all regulars enjoy the same privilege; but this appears doubtful.

4. By a vicar-general, but only in the absence of the bishop, or, if he be not absent, by his express permission.

5. By vicars-capitular, sede vacante, but only after the expiration of a year from the date of the vacancy in ordinary cases. If, however, the case of the applicant be one of urgency, on account of his having received, or being about to receive, a benefice, the vicar-capitular may grant him dimissorials within the year. (Ferraris, Ordo, Ordinare, art. iii. § 36.)

DIOCESE (διοίκησις, administration). The name by which the tract of country with its population falling under the pastorate of a Christian bishop is now universally designated belonged originally to the civil hierarchy. The bishops, taking up from the Apostles the work of teaching and converting the world, exercised their jurisdiction for the most part over the Christians of a single city and a small district surrounding it. This was their παροικία, the abode of the Christian πάροικοι (1 Pet. ii. 11), who, few in number amidst the masses of the heathen, lived in the world as passing strangers and sojourners rather than as citizens. The word διοίκησις occurs several times in Cicero's letters to designate an Eastern province or district; but the widespread official use of the name seems to have been due to the organisation of the empire begun by Diocletian and continued by Constantine. "The whole empire was divided into twelve dioceses, the smallest of which—Britain—consisted of four provinces, the largest—Oriens—of sixteen."[1] Each diocese was governed by a Vicarius, with the rank of spectabilis. The word gradually acquired an ecclesiastical use, but its meaning varied. In Africa, by the end of the fourth century, it seems to have meant nearly what we mean by it now, for the fifth canon of the Second Council of Carthage (390) provides for the appointment of new bishops, the consent of the bishop of the original "diocese" being first obtained. But in the East, as shown by the canons of Chalcedon, it for a long time signified a patriarchate or tract of country containing several ἐπαρχίαι, provinces. Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, writing to Pope Nicholas, uses the term as equivalent to the modern province, the jurisdiction of a metropolitan having suffragan sees under him. In England it was not till the thirteenth century that the word came into common use. Bede speaks of an "episcopatus," or a "provincia," or an "ecclesia," but never of a "diœcesis;" nor can the term be found in the much later chronicles of Symeon of Durham and Henry of Huntingdon; it begins to occur, but not frequently, in the works of Matthew Paris, and then in the precise sense which we now attach to it. Ducange considers that this was an abuse of the term, and that the proper name for a bishop's diocese was Parochia. A much more strange abuse crept in in France in the Carolingian era, when, as we see from the canons of some French councils, and the capitularies of Charlemagne, "diœcesis" was used in the sense of "parish." After the thirteenth century the present signification of the word became firmly established.

The "Mappa Mundi" of Gervase of Canterbury gives the titles of about three hundred and fifty Catholic dioceses as existing near the end of the twelfth century; but the list is imperfect by his own confession. In England and Wales he enumerates two provinces and twenty dioceses; in Scotland, eleven dioceses; in Ireland, four provinces and thirty-three dioceses. The sees of Gloucester, Oxford, and Peterborough were erected by Henry VIII. with the authority of Parliament, but the arrangement was not confirmed by the Holy See. The sees of the ancient English and Scottish hierarchy having become Anglican or ceased to exist, the Pope has in our own day (1850) divided England and Wales anew into fourteen dioceses,[1] forming one province under the Archbishop of Westminster, and Scotland (1878) into six dioceses, whereof one—Glasgow—is an archdiocese without suffragan sees, the other five form one province under the Archbishop of St. Andrews and Edinburgh. Ireland, having in spite of persecution adhered to Catholic unity, retains of course her ancient diocesan organisation unimpaired, although the temporalities of the sees are lost, and some of them have been consolidated with others.

The total number of Catholic dioceses at the present day, including twelve Patriarchal sees, amounts, according to the computation in the Gerarchia Cattolica for 1890, to nine hundred and forty-seven.

Diocesan statutes, passed by a bishop in synod, are a part of the jus canonicum speciale, which is defined as "that law which has been enacted only for a particular place, province, diocese, or community, and is not binding outside the limits of the same."[2]

DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE. The great theological importance of the works attributed to Dionysius makes it necessary to say something of them here, though literary and biographical articles do not enter into the plan of this Dictionary. We know from Acts xvii. 34 that Dionysius was converted by St. Paul during his visit to Athens. He is called "the Areopagite"—i.e. he was an assessor in the court which bore that name. The New Testament tells us nothing more about him, for there is no reason given to suppose that Damaris, a woman converted at the same time, was his wife. But another Dionysius, bishop of Corinth, and among the earliest of Christian writers, informs us that the Areopagite became bishop of Athens, and this no doubt may be safely accepted as fact.[1] Later writers say that he was martyred.[2]

It was long the general belief in the West that St. Dionysius the Areopagite became afterwards bishop of Paris and shed his blood there. But this belief cannot be reconciled with ancient evidence. There is no trace of it during the early centuries, and we have positive proof that St. Dionysius of Paris was a different person from the Areopagite. St. Gregory of Tours speaks of the former as coming to France after 250. The Martyrology of Usuard distinguishes the feast of St. Dionysius on October 3 from that of his namesake, Dionysius of Paris, on October 9. We need not give further reasons, easy as it would be to do so, against an identification once defended with great tenacity and great learning, but long since rejected by all competent critics.

The following works are attributed to Dionysius the Areopagite:—(1) a treatise "On the Heavenly Hierarchy;" (2) a treatise "On the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy;" (3) another "On Divine Names;" (4) another "On Mystical Theology;" (5) ten letters addressed to John the Apostle, Titus, Polycarp, &c. &c.

The first historical notice of these works occurs in the contemporary account[3] of a conference held in 533 at Constantinople, between the Catholics on the one hand and the Severian Monophysites on the other, by the command of the Emperor Justinian. The heretics produced writings of the Areopagite in support of their errors. The orthodox replied that these writings could not be genuine, otherwise they would have been known to and used by the ancients, especially by Cyril, Athanasius, and the Nicene Fathers. However, these writings soon obtained general recognition in the East, and Gregory the Great had at least heard of them about the year 590. In 827 a copy of the supposed writings of Dionysius was sent by Michael the Stammerer to Louis le Débonnaire, son of Charlemagne. They were translated into Latin by Scotus Erigena, and there have been many subsequent versions. In the middle ages, Dionysius had immense authority with Catholic theologians; and in a work written a few years ago to defend the authenticity of the works attributed to Dionysius, Mgr. Darboy alleges that there is scarcely a passage in them which has not been quoted by St. Thomas of Aquin.

Still, historical scholars, such as Le Nourry, Tillemont, Dupin, &c., have demonstrated the spurious character of the works in question. The objection made at Constantinople, viz. that Cyril and Athanasius (we may add Eusebius) are silent concerning them, admits of no satisfactory reply. Facts and institutions are mentioned by the pseudo-Dionysius which happened and arose long after the age of the Areopagite. When the forger, who was evidently a Christian imbued with the philosophy of the later Platonists, really lived, it is much harder to say. Pearson places the composition of the Dionysian writings before 340; the learned Dominican Lequien, at the end of the fifth century. Other scholars, such as Daillé and Dr. Westcott, put them later still. It need scarcely be said that mediæval writers may well have found much that is true in these writings, mistaken as they were about their origin. (See Lequien's Dissertation in his edition of St. John Damascene; Pearson, "Vindic. Ignat."; Tillemont, &c.)

DIPTYCHS. The word diptych (δίπτυγος) was originally applied to anything folded double. Thus Homer speaks of a mantle "folded double" (δίπτυχον) round the shoulders. But the adjective diptych came to be used most commonly as an epithet of tablets (δέλτος or δελτίον), so that diptych signified two leaves or tablets bound together by a hinge. Sometimes several leaves were so fastened together and called τρίπτυχα, πεντάπτυχα, or πολύπτυχα. They were used for sending short letters, as memorandum books, &c. They were often made of costly material, worn partly as ornaments at the girdle, and sent as presents to friends, to clients, or to persons of distinction.

It is uncertain at what time the Christian Church began to make use of diptychs in the liturgy, but we know that in Chrysostom's time the custom was fully established. It was continued among the Latins down to the twelfth, among the Greeks down to the fifteenth, century. They were called "holy tablets," "mystical tablets," "mystical diptychs," "ecclesiastical catalogues," &c. The "diptychs of the living" contained the names of the Pope, patriarchs, the bishop and clergy of the church, often also of neighbouring churches, those who offered the Eucharistic gifts, benefactors of the church, the Emperor and Empress, &c. The "diptychs of the dead" contained as a rule the names which had once been inscribed in the diptychs of the living—e.g. those of former bishops of the particular church, and also of other bishops, &c., specially revered there. The diptychs also contained the names of the Blessed Virgin, martyrs, and other saints. The insertion of a name always implied that the person bearing it was living or had died in Catholic communion, for heresy, schism, and other crimes which were punished by excommunication, caused a name to be erased from the diptychs. Thus, exclusion from the diptychs was often equivalent to a decision that the person so disgraced was to be regarded as a heretic, while the reinsertion of the name implied that his case had been examined and his innocence proved.

The way in which the diptychs were used at Mass varied in different times and places. Originally, the deacon read out the names from the ambo [q. v.]; later the deacon or sub-deacon read them in a low voice to the priest celebrating at the altar; later still, the diptychs were merely laid on the altar, and the priest in his prayer remembered the names inscribed without actually reciting them. Again, the time at which the diptychs were used at Mass varied. Often the diptychs both of the living and dead were read after the sermon or (more frequently) after the offertory. Sometimes, as in the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom, the diptychs were used after the consecration. In the Roman liturgy from the earliest times, the names of the living were read before, those of the dead after, the consecration.

It is said that the diptychs led to the formation of Church Calendars, and these in turn gave rise to Martyrologies. It is still more important to observe that the diptychs have left their mark in the present Roman Missal. In the prayer of the Canon, "Te igitur," the priest mentions by name the reigning Pope and the bishop of the diocese. At the "Memento, Domine," he pauses and silently commends to God benefactors, friends, &c., who are still living. At the "Communicantes" he recites the names of the Blessed Virgin, the saints, &c. All this occurs before the consecration. After the consecration, in the fifth prayer of the Canon, the priest makes a memento of the dead. Both mementos in some MS. Missals retain the title "oratio super" or "supra diptycha." . (See Kraus, "Real-Encyclopädie;" Benedict XIV. "De Missa," ii. 13 and 17.)

DIRECTORIUM. A list, drawn up by authority of the bishop, containing directions as to the Mass and office to be said on each day of the year. The number of feasts in the present calendar, and the frequent necessity of transferring some, and commemorating or omitting others, makes the Directorium or, as it is usually called, "Ordo," necessary for the clergy. In ancient times the bishop published orally the list of the feasts to be observed. The bishops had to follow the directions of their metropolitan, and he again conformed to the ordinances of the Roman bishop, who based his direction on the reckoning or "computus ecclesiasticus" of the Alexandrian Church. Very often in the ancient Church a list of movable feasts was hung to the Paschal candle.[1]

DIRGE. The word has at the present day no technical, but only a literary sense, and means a solemn service, or part of a service, celebrated on behalf of a departed soul. Thus, Sidney has—

[1] The Catholic Directory, familiar to English Catholics, contains besides the Ordo a list of clergy, churches, &c. The first number of the Laity's Directory (we take these facts from an interesting article by Mr. Thurston in the Month for February 1882) seems to have appeared in 1759. It was followed a few years later by another directory published with ecclesiastical approbation, and this latter, after 1788 was the sole directory. In 1793 the list of Catholic churches in London was given for the first time. A book with the title Catholic Directory was published in 1837, and in 1839 became the sole English directory.

Let dirge be sung and trentals rightly read,
For love is dead.

And Gray, in the well-known Elegy—

The next, with dirges due in sad array,
Slow through the church-way path we saw him borne.

Originally the word was spelt "dirige," being the first word of the antiphon at the beginning of the opening psalm (the 5th) of the first nocturn in the Office for the Dead. The entire antiphon, adapted from the ninth verse of the psalm, is "Dirige, Domine Deus meus, in conspectu tuo viam meam." Another psalm used in the same office has the antiphon "Placebo Domino." Clerks in minor orders, and even laymen, used to be commissioned by rich persons to sing psalms for the souls of their relatives, and, of course, received money for doing so. Thus, William Langlande says ("Vision of Piers Plowman," Passus vi. C text)—

The lomes [limbs] that ich laboure with . and lyflode deserve,
Ys pater-noster and my prymer . placebo and dirige.
And my sauter [psalter] som tyme . and my sevene psalmes:
Thus ich synge for hure soules . of suche as me helpen.

When the psalm had come to be called a dirige, the term dirige-money naturally arose for the payment made in respect of singing it. Thus Tyndale ("Obedience of a Christian Man," quoted in Skeat's "Specimens"), speaking of alleged clerical exactions, says, "And he . . . . polleth on his parte, and fetteth here a massepeny, there a trentall, yonder dirige-money and for his beyde-roule."

DISCALCED. Going without shoes —bare-footed. Certain orders of friars practise this austerity, which was first introduced among the Friars Minors of the Strict Observance by the Blessed John of Gaudaloupe, about the year 1500. The Carmelite reform both of men and women, instituted by St. Teresa, is also discalced. The discalced Augustinians (Hermits) were founded by Father Thomas of Jesus, a Portuguese, about the same time. (Hélyot, Déchaussés.)

DISCIPLINE. The word disciplina means, first, instruction; then that which is taught—e.g. science or doctrinal system; lastly, order or regulations maintained in a family, army, or the like. Usually, discipline in its ecclesiastical sense signifies the laws which bind the subjects of the Church in their conduct, as distinct from dogmas or articles of faith, which affect their belief.

Such disciplinary laws may be of divine institution, attested by Scripture or Apostolic tradition, and in that case they are inalterable. For example, the supremacy of the Pope over the whole Church, the government of the faithful by bishops, and many similar points of discipline were settled once for all by divine authority and cannot be changed. The Church, however, has power to add disciplinary laws according to the requirements of different times and circumstances, and these laws all Christians whom they concern are bound to obey. The Church has this power, not only because it belongs to any well-constituted community, but also because she speaks in the name of Him to whom all power has been given in heaven and on earth; and the Church, having the right to make such laws, has also the power to alter them. If they have been imposed by a Pope or council, or have become in any other way part of the general law of the Church, supreme authority may relax or annul them, and on the same principle bishops or other local superiors may change laws made by themselves or their predecessors.

Thus the discipline of the Church may alter and has altered from age to age. At one time married persons were allowed to enter holy orders; this is no longer the case in the Latin Church. The ceremonies of Mass have been gradually perfected. New feasts have been introduced; the severity of fasts has been mitigated. At this day, the discipline of one place may differ in important particulars from that which prevails in another. But the infallibility of the Church is our security that she will never sanction discipline contrary to sound faith or morals, and the Holy Ghost, who animates her, will provide that all things be ordered sweetly and wisely, as time and place require.

DISCIPLINE OF THE SECRET (disciplina arcani). The term is not found in ancient writers, and first occurs in a German author, Meier, who made use of it in a treatise "De Recondita Ecclesiæ Theologia," published at Helmstadt in 1677.[1] It has been in common use ever since, as a convenient name for the custom which prevailed in the early Church of concealing from the heathen and catechumens the more sacred and mysterious doctrines and rites of the Catholic religion, either by not mentioning them at all or by mentioning them only in enigmatical language, unintelligible or even misleading except to those who were initiated into its meaning. The reader will see on a moment's consideration the dogmatic and controversial importance of the matter. Little stress can be laid on the infrequent mention of the real presence, the mystery of the Trinity and the like in early writers, if the existing discipline restrained them from speaking openly on such subjects in books which might fall into the hands of the general public; and the same discipline may help to explain the fact that they sometimes express themselves on the Christian mysteries in language which seems strange and inadequate to us.

There can be no reasonable doubt as to the fact that this discipline of the secret did exist in the early Church. It arose from several causes. In times of persecution the Christians were afraid to speak openly and frankly about their worship and doctrine, from the natural fear that such disclosures would expose them to further injury and interruption. Moreover, they regarded the truth as a sacred deposit, and they were afraid of communicating it to those who would misunderstand it or laugh it to scorn. They were mindful of our Lord's admonition not to cast pearls before swine (Matt. vii. 6) and of the Apostle's declaration that he fed the Corinthians with milk, not with strong meat, because they were not able to bear it. A few instances will be enough to prove the point and at the same time to illustrate the nature of the discipline in question. "That it existed even as a rule," says Cardinal Newman,[1] "with respect to the Sacraments, seems to be confessed on all hands." It is well known that the heathens and catechumens were not allowed to be present at the whole of the Mass, and that a distinction was made between the Mass of the faithful and the Mass of the catechumens.[2] Again, Minucius Felix, Athenagoras, Tatian, Theophilus, Arnobius, in their Apologies for the Christian religion preserve an absolute silence on the holy Eucharist. The famous inscription discovered at Autun in 1839 exemplifies another mode in which this discipline was observed. "Take the food sweet as honey of the saviour of the holy ones, eat and drink holding the fish in thy hands"—words perfectly intelligible to Christians, among whom the "fish" meant "Jesus Christ Son of God, the Saviour" (Ἰχθύς = Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς θεοῦ υἱὸς σωτήρ), received first in the hands, then in the mouth of the communicant, but mere jargon to those who were outside the Church. So, again, Origen[1] speaks of the soul on its conversion to the Church as initiated into the "mysteries of the faithful" (sacramenta fidelium, an expression which must include the sacraments), "which those know who are initiated;" and, again, "of those venerable and sublime mysteries which those know who may be permitted to do so."[2] Even when persecution was over, the secrecy with regard to the sacraments was still maintained. Chrysostom in a letter to Pope Innocent I. tells him how "the blood of Christ had been spilt" during a tumult in a church of Constantinople. In such a letter no caution in language was called for. But his biographer Palladius in a published book says "they overturned the symbols."[3] At a synod held at Antioch in 340 the Catholic bishops indignantly accuse the Arians of letting catechumens, and even heathens, hear the "mysteries" discussed.[4]

That this discipline existed "in other respects is plain from the nature of the case, and from the writings of the Apologists. Minucius Felix and Arnobius, in controversy with pagans, imply a denial that they, the Christians, used altars; yet Tertullian speaks expressly of the Ara Dei in the church. What can we say but that the Apologists deny altars in the sense in which they ridicule them, or that they deny that altars such as the pagan altars were tolerated by Christians? And in like manner Minucius allows that there were no temples among Christians: yet they are distinctly recognised in the edicts of the Diocletian era, and are known to have existed at a still earlier date."[5]

It has been already shown incidentally that the discipline of the secret is based on Scriptural precept, and was in force at least from the close of the second century. Even Ignatius may perhaps have had it in view when he describes the Christians of Ephesus as "initiated along with St. Paul."[1] It was enforced with different degrees of strictness according to circumstances. Sometimes, to meet the calumnies of heathen and more particularly of heretics, it was necessary to speak out, so that it does not follow, because Justin and Irenæus express themselves with considerable fulness on the Eucharist, that the discipline of the secret was unknown to them. After the sixth century the need for the old reserve passed away. (Schelstrate, "De Disciplina Arcani," Romæ, 1685; Probst, "Kirchliche Disciplin," &c., part iii. c. 2.)

DISPENSATION. The relaxation of a law in a particular case. The necessity of dispensation arises from the fact that a law which is made for the general good may not be beneficial in this or that special case, and therefore may be rightly relaxed with respect to an individual, while it continues to bind the community. Dispensation must be carefully distinguished from the interpretation of a law, though the two are often confused with one another in common speech. Thus, a person so ill that he cannot fast without serious injury to his health needs no dispensation, because he is by the nature of the case excused from the law. On the other hand, though he may be able to fast, his health, occupations, &c., may make it suitable that the law should be relaxed in his favour; for this purpose a dispensation is required, and he must apply to some one possessed of authority to grant it. Anyone may interpret the law who has sufficient knowledge and impartiality to do so, but jurisdiction is needed in order to dispense.

The general principle is that the lawgiver, from whom the law derives its force, has power to relax it. So again, a superior may relax the laws of his predecessors, because his power is equal to theirs, or of his inferiors, because his power is greater. But an inferior cannot dispense in the laws of his superiors unless by power delegated to him for that end.

God Himself cannot give a dispensation, in the strict sense of the word, from the natural law. "From the precepts of the decalogue," says St. Thomas, "no dispensation of whatsoever kind can be given," and to the objection that God who made the ten commandments can unmake them, he replies, "God would deny Himself if he did away with the order of his justice, since He is identical with His own justice, and therefore God cannot give a dispensation making it lawful for a man to neglect the due order to God, or exempting him from submission to the order of His justice even in those things which concern the relations of men to each other."[1] God, however, can change the circumstances in such a manner that the case no longer falls under the law. He could, for example, as supreme Lord and proprietor of all, make over the goods of the Egyptians to the Israelites, so that the latter could take them without committing robbery. He could, as the Lord of all that lives, deprive Isaac of life and make Abraham the executioner. Further, just as a man may remit a debt, so God may free a man from the obligation incurred to Him by oath or vow. Lastly, God can of course dispense from the positive law which He has imposed—e.g. He could have dispensed a Jew from the law of circumcision, the Sabbath, &c. We may now pass on to consider the actual law of the Church on dispensations.

The Pope can dispense from obligations to God which a man has incurred of his own free will—i.e. by oath or vow. This power belongs to him as the successor of St. Peter, to whom Christ gave the power of binding and loosing. He can also dispense in all matters of ecclesiastical law. Bishops, by their ordinary power, can dispense from the statutes of the diocesan synods, &c., and they can dispense individuals from the general laws of the Church, or from obligations under which they have placed themselves to God, in such cases as frequently occur — e.g. in most vows, in fasts, abstinences, observance of feasts, &c. But by reason of privilege, lawful custom or necessity, the dispensing power of the bishop is often extended. Custom has also given parish priests power to dispense individuals from fasts, abstinences, abstinence from servile work on feasts, and the like. As a rule, a person who has received power to dispense from a superior by delegation cannot subdelegate.

A reason is always needed before a dispensation can be lawfully given. If a superior dispenses without cause in his own law or in that of an inferior, the dispensation, though unlawful, is valid. If, however, an inferior to whom dispensing power has been delegated uses it without reason, the dispensation is null and void. In all cases it is taken for granted that a dispensation is only given on the tacit condition that the statements of the person who petitions for it are true. Concealment or falsehood in an essential matter affecting the motive which induced the superior to dispense, renders the dispensation null.

A dispensation ceases if recalled; if it is renounced and the renunciation is accepted by the superior; also, in certain cases, if the cause for which the dispensation was given no longer exists. What those cases are it is not so easy to determine. According to Suarez, a dispensation from one single obligation—e.g. a vow—continues even when the cause for which it was granted is there no longer, provided the dispensation has been accepted and used before the cause ceased. On the contrary, dispensations which virtually relax a series of obligations—e.g. from fasting each day in Lent—expire with the cause which induced the superior to grant them.

DIVINATION. Inquiring after hidden things or things to come by undue means—that is, by means not instituted by God. To search after the unknown is in itself most laudable. But the vulgar and the wicked, not satisfied with the limits imposed by science and revelation, seek to discover what is beyond their reach, or make use of unlawful means to find out what may otherwise be known. Events which have not yet come to pass can be known beforehand only when they are the necessary effects of causes already known. Thus, an eclipse can be foretold because the motions of the earth, sun, and moon are necessary, and are known to us. Future free acts can be known with certainty only to Him in whose sight they are really present. We may, indeed, make fairly accurate calculations as to how an individual, and especially a number of individuals, will act; but we can do no more by natural power. God can reveal future free actions; any other mode of inquiry will savour of divination. The usual forms of such inquiry are either a direct or indirect appeal to diabolical agency, or attributing superhuman powers to animals or things. Necromancy (consulting the dead), auguries, omens, and lots are familiar instances. We must, however, carefully note that what at first sight looks like divination may turn out to be a lawful form of inquiry. Thus St. Thomas points out that the behaviour of birds and other animals is often a natural sign of events to come, e.g. the cawing of crows is a sign of rain. As to lots, he observes that there is no harm in tossing (casting lots to decide a dispute), provided that no knowledge is attributed to the objects themselves and that no appeal is made to the Evil One. He says, too, that "if there is need, it is lawful with all due reverence to seek the judgment of God by lots" ($2^a\ 2^{ae}$, q. xcv. a. 8).

For ordeals, see JUDICIUM DEI. As to astrology, we should distinguish the natural action of the heavenly bodies from the action attributed to them by superstition. Indirectly these bodies exert great influence on human conduct. Although God has been pleased at times to make known His will through dreams, it is clearly not lawful to believe in them generally. (See DREAMS; St. Thomas, $2^a\ 2^{ae}$, q. xcv.)

DIVORCE, in its widest sense, signifies a separation made between man and wife on sufficient grounds and by lawful authority. It may dissolve the marriage bond altogether, so that the man or woman is free to contract a fresh marriage (separatio quoad vinculum); or it may simply relieve one of the parties from the obligation of living with the other (separatio quoad torum et mensam).

No human power can dissolve the bond of marriage when ratified and consummated between baptised persons. But

(1) The marriage bond may be dissolved, even between baptised persons, by Papal authority, if the marriage has not been consummated. Such at least is the common doctrine of canonists and theologians; nor does Billuart, who holds the opposite opinion, deny that such divorces have been granted by Martin V., Paul III., Pius IV., and Gregory XIII.

(2) It may be dissolved in similar circumstances by the solemn religious profession of either party. This point was defined at Trent (sess. xxiv. can. 6); the principle had been already laid down by Innocent III., who professed to follow the example of his predecessors, and it is justified by the example of ancient saints, who left their brides before consummation of marriage to lead a life of perpetual continence. The engagement by which they bound themselves to continence may be considered equivalent to a solemn religious profession in later times.

(3) If two unbaptised persons have contracted marriage, this marriage, even if consummated may be dissolved, supposing one of the parties embraces the Christian religion and the other refuses to live peaceably and without insult to the Christian religion in the married state. This principle is laid down by Innocent III., and is founded on the "dispensation of the Apostle," as it is called, in 1 Cor. vii. 12–15.

In all other cases the marriage bond is indissoluble, and, besides this, married persons are bound to live together, as man and wife. They may, however, separate by mutual consent; and, again, if one party exposes the other to grave danger of body or soul, or commits adultery, the innocent partner may obtain a judicial separation, or even refuse to cohabit without waiting for the sentence of the judge, provided always that the offence is clearly proved. If the innocent party has condoned the adultery, the right of separation on that ground is forfeited—unless, of course the offence is repeated. (From Billuart, St. Liguori, Gury, "De Matrimonio.")

DOCETÆ (from δοκεῖν, "to seem," because they attributed to Christ an apparent but not a real humanity) were not a special sect. The name describes a feature common to the doctrine of many early heresies—viz. the denial that Jesus Christ was true man. The name occurs in Theodoret,[1] but the tendency which it describes dates from the heresies of Apostolic times. Thus Cerinthus distinguished between Christ and Jesus: the latter, he said, was a mere man, born in the natural way; the former, an æon, or spiritual being, who descended on him at his baptism, but afterwards took flight and left Jesus to suffer alone. St. John, in his first Epistle (iv. 2), alludes to a heresy of this kind in the words, "Every spirit which confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God; and every spirit which dissolveth Jesus is not of God." It is because the Church of his time was in conflict with this form of error that St. Ignatius insists so strenuously on the reality of the Incarnation in opposition to those who said Christ's "sufferings are visionary, being themselves visionary."[1] This Docetic tendency was further developed by Marcion, who maintained that Christ's body was a mere phantom.[2] The error of the Docetæ, in a modified form, was revived by the Apollinarists, who denied the reality of Christ's human soul, and by the Eutychians, who represented His humanity as absorbed in the divine nature.

DOCTOR ANGELICUS. The name given to St. Thomas of Aquin. Ruysbroch was called Ecstaticus; St. Bernard, Mellifluus; Alexander of Hales, Irrefragabilis; Durandus (de Sancto Porciano), Resolutissimus; St. Buonaventura, Seraphicus; Occam, Singularis; Henry of Ghent, Solemnis; Duns Scotus, Subtilis.

DOCTOR OF THE CHURCH. Three things, says Benedict XIV., are required to make a Doctor of the Church. First, he must have had learning so eminent that it fitted him to be a doctor not only in the Church but of the Church ("doctor ipsius ecclesiæ") so that through him "the darkness of error was scattered, dark things were made clear, doubts resolved, the difficulties of Scripture opened." Next, he must have shown heroic sanctity. Thirdly—though, as we shall see presently, this last condition has not always been insisted on—the title of "Doctor of the Church" must be conferred by a declaration of the Pope or of a General Council. Four Doctors of the Church are named in the canon law: viz. Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, Gregory. Besides these, other saints enjoy the title and cultus due to a Doctor of the Church without a formal declaration of Pope or council. Under this class Benedict XIV. puts Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzen, Anselm, Isidore, and Peter Chrysologus. He adds that a part of the cultus usually assigned to doctors is given to St. Hilary,[3] in whose office are the gospel and prayer but not the antiphon, and to St. Athanasius and St. Basil, who have only the antiphon but not the gospel and prayer, proper to doctors.

Since the Reformation the title of Doctor of the Church has been conferred more freely. Pius V. added St. Thomas of Aquin to the list; Sixtus V., St. Buonaventura. During the eighteenth century the title was conferred on St. Anselm, [3] Pius IX. gave Hilary the title of Doctor, and now, of course, the antiphon "O Doctor" is recited in his office.

St. Isidore, and St. Leo. Pius VIII. gave the title to S. Bernard; Pius IX. to St. Hilary, St. Alphonsus Liguori, and St. Francis of Sales. (Chiefly from Benedict XIV. "De Canoniz." lib. iv. p. 2. cap. 11, 12.)

DOGMA, in its theological sense, is a truth contained in the Word of God, written or unwritten—i.e. in Scripture or tradition—and proposed by the Church for the belief of the faithful. Thus dogma is a revealed truth, since Scripture is inspired by the Holy Ghost, while tradition signifies the truths which the Apostles received from Christ and the Holy Spirit, and handed down to the Church.

The word itself has an interesting history. In classical writers it has three distinct senses connected with its derivation from δοκεῖν, "to seem." It means, accordingly, that which seems good to the individual—i.e. an opinion; that which seems good to legitimate authority —i.e. the resolution of a public assembly, or, in other words, a decree; lastly, it acquired a peculiar sense in the philosophic schools. The mere word of some philosopher (e.g. of Pythagoras) was considered authoritative with his disciples; and so Cicero, in the Academic Questions, speaks of "decrees," or doctrines, "which the philosophers call dogmata, none of which can be surrendered without crime." In the LXX and New Testament, the word retains the second of the two of the senses given above. Thus, in Daniel ii. 13, iii. 10, in Luc. ii. 1, xvii. 7, it is used of decrees proceeding from the State. In Ephes. ii. 15, Coloss. ii. 14, it signifies the Mosaic ordinances, and in Acts xvi. 4 (δόγματα τὰ κεκριμένα) the disciplinary decrees issued by the Apostolic Council at Jerusalem. Nowhere in the New Testament does it bear the sense in which theologians employ it.[1]

This sense sprang from the third of the classical meanings given above—viz. that of a truth accepted on the authority of a philosopher. The Pythagoreans accepted tenets, which if true admitted of proof, on the authority of their master. Christians, better instructed, accepted truths beyond the reach of unaided reason which had been revealed by Christ to His Church. These truths they called dogmas. We find the earliest trace of this technical sense, still imperfectly developed, in St. Ignatius, "Magn." 13:—"Use all zeal to be established in the doctrines (ἐν τοῖς δόγμασιν) of the Lord and the Apostles."[1] In later Fathers the word occurs in its precise theological meaning. Thus, St. Basil mentions "the dogma of Christ's Divinity" (τὸ τῆς θεολογίας δόγμα); Chrysostom, "the dogmas (δόγματα) of the Church;" Vincent of Lerins, "the ancient dogmas (dogmata) of heavenly philosophy."[2] This last illustrates the origin of the theological term.

From the definition with which we began it follows that the Church has no power to make new dogmas. It is her office to contend for the faith once delivered, and to hand down the sacred deposit which she has received without adding to it or taking from it. At the same time, the Church may enunciate fully and impose dogmas or articles of faith contained in the Word of God, or at least deduced from principles so contained, but as yet not fully declared and imposed. Hence with regard to a new definition—such, e.g., as that of Transubstantiation, Christians have a twofold duty. They are obliged to believe, first, that the doctrine so defined is true, and next that it is part of the Christian revelation received by the Apostles. Again, no Christian is at liberty to refuse assent to any dogma which the Church proposes. To do so involves nothing less than shipwreck of the faith, and no Catholic can accept the Protestant distinction between "fundamental and non-fundamental articles of faith." It is a matter of fundamental importance to accept the whole of the Church's teaching. True, a Catholic is not bound to know all the definitions of the Church—but, if he knowingly and wilfully contradicts or doubts the truth of any one among them, he ceases to be a Catholic.

This arbitrary distinction between essential and non-essential articles has led by natural consequence to the opinion that dogmatic belief, as such, matters little provided a man's life is virtuous and his feelings are devout. A religion of this kind is on the very face of it different from the religion of the Apostles and their successors. St. Paul anathematises false teachers, and bids his disciples shun heretics; St. John denounces the denial of the Incarnation as a mark of Antichrist. It is not necessary to quote the utterances of the early Fathers on this matter, which has been already treated in the article on the Church, but we may refer the reader to the striking discussion of the subject in Cardinal Newman's book on "Development," ch. vii. sect. 1, § 5. We will only remark in conclusion that it is unreasonable to make light of dogmatic truth, unless it can be shown that there is no such thing in existence. If God has made a revelation, then both duty and devotional feeling must depend on the dogmas of that revelation, and be regulated by them.

DOGMATIC THEOLOGY is the science of Christian dogma. It treats of doctrine systematically, regarding the doctrine of the Church as a whole, and considering each article of faith in connection with others which are either allied to or seem to contradict it. It proves the doctrines of the Church from Scripture and tradition, illustrates them by natural analogies and points out that, though they cannot be demonstrated from reason, they are in harmony with it. It answers objections drawn from philosophy and other sciences, and above all deduces theological consequences from the truths of faith. It is hard to distinguish clearly apologetic or controversial and positive theology on the one hand from dogmatic theology on the other. Controversial theologians defend the faith against infidels and heretics; positive theology investigates the proofs of Catholic doctrine in Scripture and tradition; but all this may be said of dogmatic theology also. The distinction between them seems to lie in the fact that, though dogmatic theology does occupy itself with these matters, they do not form the whole or even the principal part of its subject matter. The systematic presentation of doctrine, the exhibition of the relations between faith and reason, the application of philosophy to religion, so as to deduce conclusions from premisses given partly by philosophy, partly by revelation—this is the chief business of the dogmatic theologian. The rest, though of capital importance in itself, possesses only a secondary interest for him.

In the early ages of the Church the chief doctrines of the faith were precisely stated and formally defined; but little was done directly for dogmatic theology. The early Fathers had to contend with persecution, and what leisure they had was mostly spent in attempts to recommend the faith to heathens. When the hand of the persecutor was stayed, the great controversies on the Trinity, on the Incarnation, on grace and predestination, began, and the champions of the faith were as a rule much too busy in stating and defending the great verities of revelation to think of expounding them systematically. Then came the barbarian incursions in the West, the Mohammedan conquests in the East; and the Latin Church was occupied in the work of converting and civilising the new masters of Western Europe. It was in the latter part of the middle ages, when the faith, already defined and fixed, enjoyed a supremacy such as it has never known before or since, that the great dogmatic theologians lived. After the fall of Constantinople Greek learning spread in the West. Christian antiquity was more studied and better understood, and by all this of course theology gained immensely. But to a great extent dogmatic theology suffered by the diversion of interest to Scriptural and historical criticism; and a century later the great Protestant revolt gave an increasing importance to controversial as distinct from dogmatic theology.

We have already indicated the division which we shall observe in this article. We shall begin by tracing the first essays at dogmatic theology in the Patristic period, passing next to the theologians of the middle ages, and concluding with those of modern times.

I. Patristic Period.—As has been already hinted, there is no dogmatic theology, properly so called, during this time, so that it need not detain us long. Many, however, among the Fathers treat the Christian religion in a philosophic spirit, and address themselves to some at least among the various problems of dogmatic theology. Thus the Apologists of the second and third centuries try to show—often, it is true, in a very fanciful way—that the Christian religion is in agreement with the best results of Greek philosophy, and in particular with the teaching of Plato. Justin, e.g., explains the supposed fact that Christian doctrines are found in Greek heathen writers partly on the theory that all men participate in the illumination of the Word,[1] partly on the assumption that the Greeks had borrowed from the sacred books of the Old Testament.[1] Clement of Alexandria reaches a higher and more accurate notion of the relations between dogma and science. The most important of his works, the "Stromata," is meant to show that a Christian may do more than believe the faith and keep the commandments. Beyond the ordinary faith, he says,[2] we may reach by instruction and the perfect observance of God's law a knowledge which is the "perfection of man as man." To a certain extent, this perfection is a moral one, and so far does not concern us here. But Clement also makes it consist in knowing truth with peculiar accuracy,[3] in the ability to "demonstrate" it[4] and to fathom the hidden meanings of Scripture, in the power of using all science and learning as a means of refuting error and conveying to others exact notions of the truth.[5] The great Origen, in his book "De Principiis," makes a further advance, and really sketches out the plan of a dogmatic system. Speaking of the Church's dogmas he says:[6] "These must be used as elements and foundations by everyone who desires to form a certain order and system, by considering them all together, so that he may form evident and necessary propositions, discover the truth on each point, and, as we have said, make one system out of the examples and propositions which he finds in the Holy Scriptures, or discovers by following out things to their logical consequences." It is to be observed, however, that Origen never worked out the plan which he put before himself; and, besides, there were inherent defects in his method, which would have kept him from doing so successfully. Nor did later Fathers realise the ideal which Origen had before him. Of course, the great Doctors of the Church in defending Catholic doctrine on the Trinity and Incarnation incidentally supplied abundance of matter for the furtherance of systematic and speculative theology. Indeed, St. Augustine's writings had an extraordinary and enduring influence on every department of theological science, and the study of them was the great means of theological education, and gave the strongest impulse to scientific progress during the middle ages. But as a rule the Fathers supplied the stones which the scholastics built together.[1] Still, one exception at least must be noted. In his treatise "De Trinitate," St. Augustine sets himself to resolve the historical and the speculative difficulties of the doctrine. He proves the Nicene doctrine from Scripture and tradition; tries to reconcile the belief in a Trinity of Persons with the belief in the unity of God; and confirms the truth of the Catholic doctrine by natural analogies. In the opinion of competent judges no writing of the early ages deserves to be compared with it for fulness and thoroughness.

II. The Scholastic Period.—Dogmatic theology in the strict sense of the word, began to be in the East, long before it was known in Western Europe. Zacharias Scholasticus and John Philoponus, in the sixth century, discussed Christian doctrine in a philosophic spirit, and in the first half of the following century John of Damascus brought dogmatic theology to the highest level which it ever reached among the Greeks. He was acquainted with the logical writings of Aristotle, and so acquired the philosophic training necessary for a theologian. He was well read in the Greek Fathers and familiar with the speculations of Pseudo-Dionysius. Thus equipped, he summed up all the theological learning of his day in his great work entitled the "Fountain of Wisdom" (πηγὴ σοφίας). The first part contains the dialectic, which since the Arian controversies had been the object of increasing attention in the Church, and was afterwards zealously studied by the Arabs. The second part gives a history of heresies; the third, "an accurate exposition of the orthodox faith" (ἔκδοσις ἀκριβὴς τῆς ὀρθοδόξου πίστεως). The third part treats (α) of God in his essence, attributes, and Trinity of Persons; (β) of the creative act by which invisible spirits and visible things were made, of the Divine fore-knowledge, and of free-will; (γ) of the Incarnation, and the economy of salvation; (δ) of the means by which this salvation is appropriated, and generally of such matters as concern practical piety—i.e. of faith and baptism, the cultus of the saints, use of images, &c.; of Scripture, the origin of sin in the abuse of free-will, the law of God, the Sabbath, circumcision, virginity, &c.; and lastly, of Antichrist and the resurrection. Here we have something like a complete system of theology, but with John of Damascus the theology of the Easterns reached its highest point. Further advance was to be made, not in the East, but in the West.

There, even after the shock of the barbarian conquests was over, a long period of preparation was needed before dogmatic theology could arise, and for this very reason when it did arise it manifested extraordinary strength, possessed a singular vitality, and did its work with wonderful completeness. These preparations consisted in the study of the Aristotelian logic, much furthered by Boethius in the earlier part of the sixth century. Again, the dogmatic teaching of the Fathers was summarised by such authors as Isidore of Seville, who in his "Originum seu Etymologiarum Codex" furnished an encyclopædia of sciences, including theology, while his "Libri Sententiarum" is a kind of anthology from the Fathers, particularly from St. Augustine. Alcuin did much to encourage the foundation of monastic schools and so to keep the lamp of learning alive. Still, although the writings of St. Gregory the Great exercised a wide and strong influence, although the living interest in dogmatic controversy was kept up by the disputes on the Adoption of the Son of God, on the Eucharist, on Predestination, and by those occasioned through the rationalism and pantheistic tendencies of Scotus Erigena, the period which elapsed between the sixth and eleventh century was one of learning rather than of speculation. The men of that age gathered in peace the fruits of the past: they seldom began to till new ground. Nor had they as yet the instruments to hand which were indispensable for the advance of theology. They knew the positive teaching of the Fathers; they did their best to master the natural and mathematical sciences, grammar, logic, rhetoric, &c., and to make themselves at home in the wisdom of the Greeks and Romans. But they had no philosophy, and philosophy is a necessary basis for theological speculation. In the eleventh century this desideratum was supplied. Then the monastic schools, which had sunk into comparative insignificance after the death of Charles the Bald, became more celebrated than ever for learning (those of Tours and Bec deserve special mention), and in Anselm of Canterbury produced a man, not only of learning, but of speculative ability. Some time later these schools were cast into the shade by the universities, and that of Paris in particular was the fostering mother of dialectical theology throughout the rest of the middle ages. Better translations of Aristotle came into use, and not only his logical, but also his metaphysical and physical treatises were studied with enthusiastic appreciation. True, philosophy was regarded as the handmaid of faith. The Catholic religion was accepted as the absolute truth, and although the philosopher proved from reason the truths of natural religion, such as the being of God, the spirituality of the soul, and the like, yet even on his own ground he had to bring his work into agreement with the teaching of the Church. Still, philosophical questions in themselves awakened the most intense interest, and theology chiefly consisted in drawing conclusions from principles furnished partly by the faith, partly by philosophy: it followed naturally that the whole of man's theology was coloured by his philosophical opinions. The great philosophical question debated during all the scholastic period was about the nature of universals. There were the extreme Realists, like Scotus: the moderate Realists, like St. Thomas; and the Nominalists, such as Occam. All these names represent different schools of theology, and it is often easy to trace the direct influence which the theory they held on universals had on their theology. Of course, we do not mean to say that every difference—e.g. between Scotus and St. Thomas—can be traced to a philosophical source, but many among these differences certainly can be so traced. So well was this understood that as long as Scotism kept its ground in the Franciscan schools, the Scotist philosophy, and that alone, was looked upon as the necessary preparation for theology. The mutual interpenetration of philosophy and theology is the great distinguishing mark of the scholastic period.

We can only mention the most distinguished names among the scholastics, and say a few words about one or two among them. St. Anselm was the great light of the eleventh century, towards the end of which he lived. In the twelfth century the great names are those of Roscelin, Abelard, and Peter Lombard; in the thirteenth, those of Alexander of Hales, Albertus Magnus, St. Thomas, Bonaventura, John Duns Scotus.

Anselm did not construct a complete corpus or sum of theology, but he treated of its principal parts—viz. the existence and nature of God and the Trinity in his "Monologium," "Proslogion," "De Fid. Trin.," and "Process. Spirit. S. contra Græc.;" the freedom of the will, origin of evil, and the fall, in "De Lib. Arbitr., de Casu Diabol., de Concept. Virginal. et Original. Peccato;" of the Incarnation and redemption, in "Cur Deus Homo." Peter Lombard's four Books of Sentences were for centuries the basis of theological instruction. St. Thomas, Scotus, nay even so late a writer as the famous Estius, commented on them. Peter Lombard sets out with the principle—borrowed from St. Augustine — that Christianity is a doctrine concerning realities and signs, the principal signs being the sacraments. He subdivides the realities into such as we are to enjoy (frui)—i.e. such as are ends; such as we are to use (uti) as means: and considers lastly the subjects or rational creatures intended to use these means. Accordingly, the first Book of the Sentences treats of God and the Trinity (realities which are ends in themselves); the second, in its first part, of the world, in its second of rational creatures, in its third of free-will and grace, virtues and vices (of things to be used as means, of those who use them, of use and abuse); the third, of the redemption, by which man is again enabled to see things aright; the fourth, of the resurrection, and of "signs"—i.e. chiefly of the sacraments. A moment's thought will enable anyone to see some at least of the patent defects implied in such an arrangement. St. Thomas adopted a very different one in his "Sum of all Theology," which for method, scientific precision and depth, for purity of doctrine, has nothing like it or near it in the productions of the scholastic theologians. The "Summa" is divided into three parts. The first treats of God in Himself, and as the Creator. The second treats of God as the end of creatures, and of the actions which lead us to Him or separate us from Him. In the former subdivision of the second part these actions are discussed in general; the latter subdivision explains them in detail. The third part treats of the Incarnation, the sacraments, and the last things. It must be added that the subdivision of Part II. was made, not by St. Thomas, but by his disciples, and that St. Thomas left the third part incomplete, the conclusion of the treatise on penance, with those on extreme unction, holy order, matrimony and the last things, having been appended from his commentary on the Sentences. St. Thomas himself points out the connection of parts in the "Summa." The first is concerned with God; the second, with the movement of rational creatures to Him: the third, with the Incarnation, redemption and sacraments, which open the way to God, and with eternal life, to which this way leads.

III. Modern Period.—Scholastic theology is best represented by St. Thomas and Scotus. After their time there was a marked decadence, and if at the period of the Renaissance and the Reformation scholastic theology was unjustly attacked and contemned, the fault must be partly laid at the door of the later schoolmen themselves. Melchior Canus, a Catholic bishop and theologian of undoubted orthodoxy, describes the degeneracy of some among the later schoolmen, their frivolous and sophistical spirit, their ignorance of Scripture and tradition, in the forcible language of a man who evidently speaks from personal experience.[1] No doubt other causes helped to bring scholastic theology into disrepute. The new learning absorbed attention; controversialists, such as Bellarmine, were busy defending the decrees of Trent against Lutheran and Calvinists, so that the interest in scholastic theology abated. Besides, there was on the part of Protestants and even of Jansenists, a distinctly heretical opposition to the theology of the schools. It was held that truths of revelation were contrary to the dictates of reason, and that, to use the words of Melanchthon, "Christian doctrine was utterly discordant with philosophy and human reason."[2] This, of course, was to cut at the root of scholastic theology, and the opinion of Melanchthon on faith and reason was that of the Reformers in general. Still, scholastic theology was pursued with ardour, and valuable additions were made to it. The old Thomist and Scotist theologies were still maintained, and though the latter as a distinctive system was passing away, it influenced the eclectic theology of many Jesuit writers, and so has left a permanent mark on the theology of the Church. Moreover, a fresh impetus was given to scholastic disputes by the controversies on grace in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and a new division of theologians into Thomists, Congruists, Molinists and Augustinians came to be recognised. The following are among the principal theologians since the Reformation. We put aside great controversialists, like Bellarmine and Stapleton, and positive theologians, such as Petavius and Thomassin. Petavius, indeed, may justly be considered a dogmatic theologian. His unequalled learning included a thorough knowledge of the schoolmen, and he does discuss the most important questions raised by them. But the chief merit of this extraordinary man, great in his many-sided and accurate learning, great in the command which his genius gave him over the stores of classical, Scriptural, patristic, and scholastic learning which he had accumulated, lay rather in his contributions to the history of dogma than to dogmatic theology itself. Confining ourselves, then, to dogmatic theologians in the strict sense, we may name, from the sixteenth and beginning of the seventeenth century: Bannez ("In Prim. Part. Angel. Doctoris," 2 tom.; "In Secund. Secund. Angel. Doctoris"); Molina ("In Prim. Part. D. Thom.;" also "Liberi Arbitrii cum Gratiæ Donis Concordia"); Medina ("In Prim. Secund. Thomæ Aq.; In Tert. Part."); Gregory of Valentia ("Comment. in Summ. Thomæ Aq."); Suarez ("Commentationes et Disputat. in Thomæ Summam"); Cardinal de Lugo (separate treatises on dogmatic and moral theology: e.g. "De Sacramentis," "De Eucharistia," "De Incarnatione," &c., collected in seven folios); Vasquez ("Commentarii in Thomam"); Estius ("Comment. in IV Lib. Sentent."); Tanner ("Theolog. Scholast.," "Disputat. Theol. in omnes Summ. S. Thom. Partes"); Becanus ("Theolog. Scholast."); Viva (on the Condemned Propositions and a brief course of dogmatic theology). Prominent among the theologians of a later date are the Scotists, Frassen ("Scotus Academicus, sive Universa Doctoris Subtilis Theologia," Paris, 1672), and L'Herminier ("Summa Theolog. Scholastic. Dogmat.," Paris, 1721); and the Thomists Gonet ("Clypeus Theolog. Thomist. contra Novas ejus Impugnat.," Burdigal. 1659), Contenson ("Theologia Mentis et Cordis," Colon. 1722), Witasse ("Tractat. Theolog." Paris, 1722), and Billuart ("Cursus Theolog. juxta Ment. S. Thom." 1745). We may also notice Tournely ("Prælect. Theol.," Venet. 1739); Gotti ("Theolog. Scholast. Dogm.," Venet. 1750); Berti ("De Theolog. Disciplin.," Venet. 1776); Hubert ("Theolog. Dogmat. et Moral," August. Vindeb. 1751).[1]

In the latter part of the eighteenth century scholastic theology almost died out, or if the study of it was maintained in Italy and Spain, at all events few books of this kind were written. The dogmas of the Church were of course still carefully studied by clerics in their course of preparation for the priesthood, but scholastic philosophy was neglected, no other philosophy permanently replaced it, and hence theological speculation was impossible. This element is almost entirely wanting in works like those of Liebermann and Perrone, valuable as they are in many respects. Some forty or fifty years ago the interest in scholastic philosophy, and, as a natural consequence, in scholastic theology, revived. Cardinal Franzelin's treatises, though full of Scriptural and patristic learning, do not by any means omit the consideration of the speculative questions raised by the schoolmen. Scheeben was perhaps the profoundest, if not the clearest, speculative theologian of recent times. The short treatises of Jungman, the dogmatic theology of the Jesuit Hurter, and that of Dr. Murray of Maynooth, also deserve mention. The present Pope has done much to encourage the study of the schoolmen, and this study is not likely to fall again into disrepute or even to be neglected. Experience has proved that no scientific knowledge of the Catholic doctrine can be gained without the study of dogmatic theology, so that when this foundation has been laid, then and not till then other branches of theological inquiry may be pursued with safety and advantage. (In great part from the introductory volume of Kuhn's "Dogmatik.")

DOLOURS OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN. St. John mentions that the Blessed Virgin, with other holy women and with St. John, stood at the foot of the cross when the other Apostles had fled. At that time the prophecy of Simeon, "a sword will pierce thine own soul," was most perfectly fulfilled; and very naturally the sorrows of Mary have been a favourite subject of contemplation with the Saints, among whom St. Ambrose and St. Bernard deserve particular notice. They dwell specially on the intensity of her mental suffering, and on the supernatural constancy with which she endured it. The famous hymn "Stabat Mater" celebrates Mary's sorrows at the foot of the cross in sublime language. The seven founders of the Servite order, in the thirteenth century, devoted themselves to special meditation on the Dolours of Mary, and from them the enumeration of the Seven Sorrows (i.e. at the prophecy of Simeon, in the flight to Egypt, at the three days' loss, at the carrying of the cross, at the crucifixion, at the descent from the cross, at the entombment) is said to have come. The feast of the Dolours was instituted at a Provincial Council of Cologne in 1423, at a time when the Hussites were destroying crucifixes and images of the Mother of Sorrows with fanatical zeal. Benedict XIII., in 1725, caused this feast to be celebrated in the States of the Church on the Friday after Passion Sunday. This feast is now observed as a greater double throughout the Church. Pius VII., in 1814, directed that a second feast of the Dolours should be kept, on the third Sunday of September. In allusion to her seven sorrows, the Blessed Virgin is represented in art transfixed by seven swords. (Benedict XIV. "De Festis"; "Manuale Decret.")

DOM. A title applied to the Benedictine monks, as Dom Gueranger, etc. It is a contraction of "Dominus," first applied to the Pope, latterly to bishops, and finally to monks of various orders. Benedictine nuns were similarly called Domna, whence the modern "Dame."

DOMICILE is the place in which a person is living, or to which he has actually come with the purpose of remaining there for good—i.e. until some fresh reasons call him away. Thus, as Zallinger points out, two things go to constitute domicile: (1) the external fact of habitation in a place; (2) the internal intention of fixing the abode there. Quasi-domicile is acquired by a person who has moved to a place with the intention of remaining there for a considerable time—e.g. for several months. There is a third class of persons known as vagi—i.e. who at the time have neither domicile nor quasi-domicile. It is possible for a person to have two domiciles—if, that is to say, he has two abodes in different places and spends about equal portions of the year in each.

The question of domicile enters into the regulations (1) on orders. In ordinary cases a candidate must be ordained by the bishop of the diocese in which he was born ("episcopus originis"). However, if he has fixed his domicile in another diocese he may be ordained by his new bishop, the "episcopus domicilii," provided that he has lived in his new abode for ten years, or has transferred to it the greater part of his goods, having lived there "for a considerable time, and is, moreover, ready to swear that he intends to remain there for good" ("perpetuo"). So Innocent XII., Constit. 96. (2) Persons are obliged to make their Easter communion, to have their banns proclaimed, to be married, to have their children baptised, to receive extreme unction, from the parish-priest of their domicile or his deputy. If persons to be married live in different parishes, the banns must be proclaimed in the parish church of each; the marriage may be celebrated in either parish church. Persons with a double domicile may choose the parish-priest of either for the celebration of their marriage, &c. If either party has established a quasi-domicile he may be married by the parish-priest of the place. If one of the parties has no domicile or quasi-domicile, then any parish-priest may marry them, provided that he has found on inquiry that they are free to marry, and has obtained leave from his ordinary. (Chiefly from Gury.)

DOMINE, NON SUM DIGNUS. "Lord, I am not worthy that Thou shouldst enter under my roof, but only speak with a word, and my soul will be healed." Words used by the priest before communicating, and again before giving communion to the people. The custom of employing this prayer before communion is alluded to by Origen and Chrysostom. It is adapted from the prayer of the centurion in Matt. viii. 8.

DOMINICAL LETTER. See CYCLE.

DOMINICANS. The founder of this celebrated order, St. Dominic, was born in 1170, at Calaruega, a small town in the diocese of Osma, in Old Castile. He was educated at the university of Palencia, which afterwards was removed to Salamanca. From the time when he first came to the use of reason, he appears to have had a heart burning with the love of God, and a consequent horror of sin, coupled with an unquenchable zeal for the promotion of God's honour and service among His rational creatures. After leaving the university, he preached with great power in many places. The Bishop of Osma at this time, whose name was Diego, was a prelate of great earnestness and piety; the laxity and tepidity which prevailed among a portion of the Spanish clergy were a serious grief to him, and he pondered how he might introduce the type and germ of a better state of things. He wished to introduce a regular and quasi-conventual life among the canons of his cathedral, and the young Dominic appeared a fit instrument for his purpose. Appointed a canon, and strenuously aiding in the introduction in the chapter of the rule of St. Austin, Dominic more than answered every expectation that had been formed of him, and obtained the entire confidence and affection of the bishop. In 1204 and 1205 the Bishop of Osma was sent into France on the affair of a contemplated marriage between King Alfonso IX. and a princess of the house of La Marche; Dominic accompanied him as his chaplain. The southern provinces of France were then teeming with the heresies of the numerous sects which pass under the general name of Albigenses [Albigenses], and the peril seemed imminent that large numbers of persons would before long, if no restraining influence appeared, throw off the bonds of religion, social order, and morality. The bishop, his mission having come to an end by the death of the French princess, earnestly desired to remain and combat heresy in Languedoc. With Dominic he went to Rome (1205) to obtain the necessary permission from the Pope, who was then Innocent III. The Pope, although strongly approving the enterprise, would not sanction Diego's absence from his diocese being prolonged beyond two years, at the end of which time he was to return to Osma. Returning to Languedoc, Diego and his companions found there two Papal legates, Peter of Castelnau and Raoul, contending with the heretics with but small effect. The bishop suggested that the words of exhortation would be more effectual if the legates came unattended by a splendid retinue, and unprovided with equipages and a sumptuous appareil. He himself set them an example, going barefoot, practising great abstinence, and sending back his carriages and servants into Spain. The legates took his words in good part, and to some extent acted upon them; moreover, the abbot of Citeaux and several other Cistercian abbots came to their assistance, to take part in the religious campaign, which now began to be prosecuted with much zeal and fruit. But after a time Peter of Castelnau was assassinated by the heretics, and the other legate took his departure; the abbots returned to their monasteries; the bishop was obliged to return to Osma, where he soon after died; and Dominic was left alone. Some years passed; he was joined from time to time by earnest men, who aided him in that work of continual preaching which he felt to be the great work of his life; but many of them, after the novelty of the work had worn off, abandoned him without scruple, and he felt that in order to give stability to his efforts he must bind his followers to himself and their work by a tie stronger than could be supplied by enthusiasm and the voluntary system. Such a tie could only be supplied by the establishment of a new order, and to this consummation he now bent his energies. In 1215 he had gathered round him sixteen men, of whom eight were Frenchmen, six Spaniards, one an Englishman, and one a Portuguese—all prepared to embrace any way of life that he might prescribe to them. The Pope (Innocent III.), when his sanction was sought, hesitated. The Council of the Lateran, then concluding its sittings, had declared that it was not desirable to add any new orders to those already existing. The Pope refused his assent several times, but at length—influenced, it is said, by a vision similar to that which he had had before the confirmation of the Franciscan order—he yielded. It was, however, upon the understanding that the founder should choose for the new institute some rule already sanctioned by the Church, and that the statutes of the order should be submitted to the Pope for his approval. Dominic selected the rule of St. Austin [Aug. Canons] for the use of his order; many of the statutes were borrowed from those of Prémontré. [See Premonstratensians.] "The chief articles enjoined perpetual silence, there being no time when conversation was permitted without leave from the superiors; fasts almost without intermission, at least from September 14 to Easter Day; complete abstinence from meat, except in serious illness; the use of woollen garments in the place of linen; a rigorous poverty, and many other austerities."[1] The dress which St. Dominic gave to his religious was that of regular canons, such as he had himself worn at Osma—viz. a black cassock and rochet. Some years afterwards this was exchanged for the dress which has been ever since retained in the order—a white habit and scapular, with a long black cappa or mantle. When everything had been settled, and the first monastery was being built at Toulouse, Dominic went to Rome to obtain the final confirmation of the Holy See. Arriving in the autumn of 1216, he found Honorius III. occupying the Papal chair, and obtained from him in the following December a bull fully legalising and confirming his institute, under the title of the "Preaching Brothers," or friars, Fratres Prædicantes. He made his solemn profession before Honorius, as the first member of the order, and then returned to Toulouse. Houses under his direction soon arose in different places—e.g. at Paris, Metz, and Venice, and in 1221 a general chapter was held at Bologna, at which—perhaps in imitation of the Franciscans—a constitution was adopted renouncing all rents and possessions. The effect of this, of course, was to make the Dominicans a mendicant order, wholly dependent for their subsistence and advancement on the charity and zeal for religion of the Christian people. At this same chapter-general it was found that the order already numbered sixty convents: these were now distributed into eight provinces (England being one), each under a provincial. St. Dominic, therefore, dying in this year, had the happiness of leaving his order firmly planted in Europe. Under subsequent master-generals it extended itself far and wide; the white robe of St. Dominic became a familiar object in Poland, Denmark, Greece, and the Holy Land; their missioners were found in the Canaries in the fifteenth century, and after the discovery of America preaching friars took a prominent part in spreading the Gospel among the natives of Mexico, New Granada, and Peru. Las Casas, who first introduced the African negro into the West Indies, with the benevolent intention of thus saving from destruction under their Spanish task-masters the feebler Carib Indians, was a Dominican friar. This order has contributed three Popes to the roll of the Roman Pontiffs, and can enumerate more than 60 cardinals, about 150 archbishops, and upwards of 800 bishops. The Master of the Sacred Palace in the Pontifical Court has always been a religious of this order since St. Dominic was first invested with the office by Pope Honorius in 1218.

[1] Hélyot.

In England, at the time of the dissolution, there were fifty-seven Dominican friaries. From an examination of the names of these, given below,[1] it is evident that they settled by preference in towns, where their primary vocation of preaching could most easily be exercised. The memory of their great friary in London is preserved in the name of Blackfriars Bridge; the building stood between Ludgate Hill and the river; Playhouse Yard[2] marks the exact site. Of their great and famous house at Oxford, though the site is well known, no traces now remain.

Into the intellectual movement of the age, of which the foundation of many universities, and the rapid development of others were the chief outward signs, the Dominicans eagerly flung themselves. They opened schools, and commissioned able lecturers at most of the universities, awakening thereby a fierce opposition on the part of the authorities, who perhaps dreaded in part lest crudities and novelties should issue from the lips of these enthusiastic mendicants, but whose concern for their own vested interest in and monopoly of teaching was much more real. The saintly Albertus Magnus, entering the order in the time of the second general, Jordanus Saxo, lectured in the university of Paris on the philosophy of Aristotle, which, according to Möhler he had the honour of first making thoroughly comprehensible to the European intellect. His fame has been eclipsed by that of the still larger and stronger mind of him who was his ardent disciple, and also a Dominican, St. Thomas of Aquinum. The "Summa Theologiæ," at which the sciolists of the last century affected to sneer, has been lately anew commended to the respect of all Christians, and the careful study of the clergy, by His Holiness the present Pope. The system of St. Thomas was so vast as to afford scope for the labour of many commentators and explicators, and a school hence arose, consisting chiefly of Dominicans, named Thomists. Franciscan theologians, among whom the chief was Duns Scotus, raised objections to portions of the teaching of St. Thomas; the problems of Realism and Nominalism were imported into the controversy; and the contentions of Scotists and Thomists, taken up often by men of inferior mental calibre, tended at last to make men weary of the scholastic philosophy altogether.

Among the numerous writers and thinkers produced by this order may be mentioned first that group of ethereal minded men, sometimes called the "German mystics," among whom the Master Eckhardt († 1329), Johannes Tauler († 1361), and the Blessed Henry Suso († 1365), were all sons of St. Dominic. St. Raymond of Pennafort, the third general of the order, will be celebrated to all time as the codifier of the canon law. In France arose Peter of Tarentaise, and Vincent of Beauvais, author of that vast repertory of all knowledge then accumulated, the "Speculum Majus." England produced Richard Claypole, Robert Holcot, and Robert Kilwardby, Archbishop of Canterbury. The learned Cardinal Cajetan belongs to the period of the Reformation. Dominic Soto († 1560), Francis a Victoria, and Dominic Bannez († 1604), were eminent in theology and public law. Las Casas, already mentioned, and Peter of Montesino, belonged to the illustrious band of Spanish Dominicans who followed at the heels of the conquerors of the New World, and strove to shield the Indians from their rapacity, and to open the minds of their new fellow-subjects to the light of Christ.

With regard to the present condition of the order, it may be said that in spite of the injustice and violence of the revolution, which in all the principal countries of Europe has at one time or other expropriated its convents and silenced its doctors, it is not altogether unprosperous or unpromising. In France the order was restored about fifty years ago by the devoted Henri Lacordaire, whose fiery words preached from the pulpit of Notre Dame convinced an unbelieving Paris that a friar's cowl, in the nineteenth century no less than in the thirteenth, may cover a robust and teeming brain, and an indomitable courage.

As early as 1206, before the foundation of his order for men, St. Dominic had established a convent of nuns at Prouille, under a modified form of St. Augustine's rule. Honorius III. gave his approval, in 1218, to the extension of the order to women. The Second Order of St. Dominic (or Dominicanesses, as they came to be called) was one of the strictest in the Church. Besides the austerities which they practised in common with their brethren of the First Order, they were bound to rigid cloister and to long hours of prayer. They were intended to be contemplatives, but they afterwards undertook the education of young girls. Many canonised Saints have belonged to this order, the most famous being St. Agnes of Montepulciano.

The Third Order of St. Dominic, called also the Brothers and Sisters of the Penance of St. Dominic, grew out of the institution of the "Soldiery of Jesus Christ," which St. Dominic founded in his lifetime, for married men who should desire to undertake the work of protecting the Church, reclaiming her ancient rights, recovering property of which she had been despoiled, and repressing heresy; and for the wives of these men. To this Third Order belonged the canonised saints Catherine of Sienna and Rose of Lima, and the beatified Colomba of Rieti, Ingrida of Sweden, Sibylla of Pairà, Margaret of Hungary, and many others.

In England there appear to be at the present time five houses of friars (at Haverstock Hill, Woodchester, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Hinckley, and Leicester), one convent of Dominican nuns (at Carisbrook), and fifteen houses of Sisters of the Third Order at various places. In Ireland there appear to be sixteen Dominican priories, Dominick Street, Dublin, Limerick, and Tralee, being among the most important; and seven convents of Dominican nuns, among which is the well-known Sienna convent at Drogheda. (Hélyot; Möhler's "Kirchengeschichte.")

DOMINUS VOBISCUM ("The Lord be with you"), is, with the "Pax vobis" (among the Greeks εἰρήνη πᾶσι), the common salutation in the Mass and office. It was adopted from the Jews, who used it in daily life (Ruth ii. 4). The Oriental liturgies, except the liturgy of St. Mark, have no "Dominus vobiscum." In the West, on the other hand, its use is very ancient. A Council of Hippo in 393[1] forbids "readers" (lectores) to use it, and at this day no minister of the Church below the rank of deacon can do so. A bishop, after the "Gloria in Excelsis" on feast days, says "Pax vobis" instead of "Dominus vobiscum," a custom mentioned in a letter of Leo VII., anno 937. These salutations are used even in private Mass or office, and are addressed to the Church, in whose name her ministers speak, and with whom they are united in spirit.

DONATISTS. Heretics and schismatics who held (1) that the validity of the sacraments depended on the moral character of the minister; (2) that sinners could not be members of the Church and could not be tolerated by a true Church, unless their sins were secret. The former of these errors was an exaggeration of Cyprian's erroneous belief that baptism depended for its validity on the faith of the minister: the latter was allied to Novatianism, though the Donatists did not deny the Church's power to readmit repentant sinners.

Mansurius, Bishop of Carthage, allowed the heathen during Diocletian's persecution to destroy heretical books which he left in the church instead of the sacred books which they sought. Thereupon, a party of zealots, with Donatus of Casanigra at their head, charged him with "traditio"—i.e. with the crime of surrendering the sacred books, and so practically denying the faith. Mansurius died in 311 and his archdeacon, Cæcilian, was chosen and consecrated Bishop of Carthage. Seventy Numidian bishops protested, asserting, among other things, that Cæcilian had been consecrated by a "traditor" or betrayer of the sacred books, and so invalidly. In his place they chose Majorinus, and on his death, in 313, Donatus, from whom, and from the other Donatus named above, the sect took its name. The Bishop of Carthage being Primas of North Africa, the schism affected the whole of that territory, and the Donatists were specially popular with the peasants. Constantine fearing for the unity of the empire, declared himself against the schismatics. Their case was examined by Pope Melchiades, with a commission of three Gallican bishops, at Rome, in 313; in the following year, at the Council of Arles; and by the emperor himself, to whom the Donatists appealed, at Milan, in 316. All these decisions were adverse to the new sect; still it spread, and in 330 no less than 270 Donatist bishops met in council, although out of Africa they had only two congregations—one in Rome, another in Spain. Their fanaticism rose to such a pitch that crowds of Donatists carried devastation through Africa, uniting the coarsest vices with a morbid desire of martyrdom, which sometimes led to suicide. Down to 429, the date of the Vandal invasion, the Christian emperors restrained the Donatist fury by severe enactments, but without complete success. Towards the close of the fourth century St. Optatus of Milevi wrote his seven books "On the Schism of the Donatists, against Parmenius," the successor of Donatus: from 400 onwards the new Bishop of Hippo, St. Augustine, was active in opposing them, and in 411 he met 279 of their bishops in conference at Carthage. The Donatists split up into many sects. They sank into comparative insignificance after the Vandal invasion, and are heard of no more after that of the Saracens in the seventh century. DOUAY BIBLE. A name commonly given to the translation of the Holy Scriptures current among English-speaking Catholics. The name is misleading, for, as we shall presently see, the Bible was not translated into English at Douay, and only a part of it was published there, while the version now in use has been so seriously altered that it can scarcely be considered identical with that which first went by the name of the Douay Bible.

We begin with a history and criticism of the original version. The College of Douay was founded in 1568 by the exertions of Cardinal Allen, and, owing to political troubles, its members a few years after its foundation took refuge at Rheims. There they set to work at an English version of the Bible, made from the Vulgate, but with diligent comparison of the Hebrew and Greek texts. The divines chiefly concerned in the translation of the New Testament were—Dr. William (afterwards Cardinal) Allen, Dr. Gregory Martin, Dr. Richard Bristow, and John Reynolds, all of them bred at the University of Oxford. Martin translated, the rest revised, Bristow and Allen wrote the annotations. Martin also translated the Old Testament, Dr. Worthington furnishing the notes. The publication was delayed by lack of means, but in 1582 the New Testament was published at Rheims, the Old in 1609–10 at Douay, both in quarto. There was a second edition (quarto) of the Old Testament in 1635, of the New (quarto), with some few changes, in 1600; a third edition of the New (16mo) in 1621, a fourth (quarto) in 1633, a fifth (folio) 1738, with the spelling modernised and a few verbal alterations; a sixth (folio) at Liverpool in 1788. In 1816–18 an edition of the whole Bible appeared in Ireland, in which the Rhemish text and notes were mainly adopted for the New Testament. An eighth edition of the Rhemish New Testament, text and notes, was published by Protestants at New York (octavo) in 1834. Thus there have been two editions of the Old Testament, eight of the New, according to the original Douay and Rheims version. This version comes to us with the recommendation of certain divines in the College and cathedral of Rheims and of the University of Douay. It never had any episcopal imprimatur, much less any Papal approbation.

What was the value of this translation of the Vulgate? It certainly had great faults, for it is disfigured by uncouth and sometimes scarcely intelligible language, but it had also great merits, which we prefer to state in the words of the celebrated Protestant scholar, Dr. Westcott. Martin, he says (and Martin had the chief share in the work), was "a scholar of distinguished attainments, both in Greek and Hebrew." "The scrupulous or even servile adherence of the Rhemists to the text of the Vulgate was not without advantage. They frequently reproduced with force the original order of the Greek, which is preserved in the Latin, and even while many unpleasant roughnesses occur, there can be little doubt that this version gained on the whole by the faithfulness with which they endeavoured to keep the original form of the sacred writings. . . . . The same spirit of anxious fidelity to the letter of their text often led the Rhemists to keep the phrase of the original when others had abandoned it. . . . When the Latin was capable of guiding them the Rhemists seem to have followed out their principles honestly: but whenever it was inadequate or ambiguous, they had the niceties of Greek at their command. The Greek article cannot, as a rule, be expressed in Latin. Here, then, the translators were free to follow the Greek text, and the result is that this critical point of scholarship is dealt with more satisfactorily by them than by any earlier translators. And it must be said that in this respect also the revisers of King James [i.e. the Protestant authorised version] were less accurate than the Rhemists, though they had their work before them." Dr. Westcott also observes that the Douay Bible "furnished a large proportion of the Latin words, which King James's revisers adopted."[1]

In the eighteenth century two independent translations of the New Testament appeared as substitutes for the Rhemish, one by Dr. Cornelius Nary (1718), priest of St. Michan's, Dublin; the other (1730) by Dr. Witham, president of Douay).

A new epoch was made by Dr. Challoner, who revised the Rheims and Douay text, making alterations so many and so considerable that he may really be considered the author of a new translation. His chief object seems to have been that of making the English Catholic Bible more intelligible, and in this he has succeeded, but, "undoubtedly," says Cardinal Newman, "he has sacrificed force and vividness in some of his changes." He approximates, according to the same authority, to the Protestant version. Dr. Challoner, then coadjutor to the Vicar Apostolic of London, published the first edition of his new Testament in 1749, of the whole Bible in 1750.

[1] These extracts are from Dr. Westcott's History of the English Bible.

In 1752 he published the New Testament again; in 1763–4 the Bible; in 1772 and 1777 fresh editions of the New Testament. Early in 1781 he died, being then in his ninetieth year. In these editions many variations occur. The notes are Dr. Challoner's own.

Dr. Challoner's text was itself revised, and fresh alterations were introduced by Mr. McMahon, a Dublin priest, who published the New Testament in 12mo anno 1783, and the whole Bible (quarto) in 1791. This edition of the whole Bible was undertaken at the request of Dr. Troy, Archbishop of Dublin, and by his name this text is generally known. In 1803 and 1810 the New Testament, and in 1794 the Bible, were reprinted according to the revision of Challoner, which was also adopted in the Philadelphian edition of the Bible, anno 1805.

However, Mr. McMahon's alterations are mostly confined to the New Testament: the text of the Old, in Cardinal Newman's words, "remains almost verbatim" as Challoner left it. But subsequent editions of the New Testament vary very much, because the editors have had to choose between this or that of Challoner's three texts of the New Testament and Dr. Troy's text.

We need not follow the history of our English Bible further, for subsequent editions are mere reprints of texts already mentioned. Challoner's second edition of the Bible (1763) was reprinted at Philadelphia in 1790, and this was the first Bible printed in America for English-speaking Catholics. We have, however, still to mention an independent revision of the Rhemish and Douay texts by Archbishop Kenrick (Gospels, 1849; rest of New Testament, 1851; Psalms, Wisdom, Canticles, 1857; Job and the Prophets, 1859).

(Chiefly from Cardinal Newman's Essay on the Rheims and Douay versions in "Tracts Theological and Ecclesiastical." But Dr. Westcott on the English Bible, and Shea's Bibliographical account of Catholic Bibles, &c., printed in America, have also been used.)

DOUBLE. [See FEASTS.]

DOVE is frequently used as a symbol of the Holy Ghost, who appeared at Christ's baptism under that form. The custom of depicting the Holy Ghost in this form is mentioned by St. Paulinus of Nola, and must have been familiar to Eastern Christians in the sixth century; for the clergy of Antioch in 518, among other complaints made by them to the see of Constantinople against the intended bishop Servius, accuse him of having removed the gold and silver doves which hung over the altars and font (κολυμβήθρα) and appropriated them, on the ground that this symbolism was unfitting.[1] The dove as a symbol of the Holy Ghost is often placed in the pictures of certain saints—e.g. of Fabian,[2] Hilary of Arles, Medard of Noyon, &c. It is also a figure of innocence, and so, e.g., the souls of SS. Eulalia and Scholastica are represented as flying to heaven in the form of a dove. Lastly, the dove serves as a figure of peace and reconciliation (see Gen. viii. 11).

A vase in the form of a dove (περιστήριον, peristerium) was in the East and in France suspended over the altar and used as a repository for the Blessed Sacrament. This custom is mentioned by the author of an ancient Life of St. Basil, by St. Gregory of Tours, and in several ancient French documents. Martene mentions that even in his time such a tabernacle was still in use at the church of St. Maur des Fossés. The custom probably came to France from the East, for it never seems to have existed in Italy.[3]

DOXOLOGY. I. The greater doxology or "ascription of glory" is usually called, from its initial words, the "Gloria in excelsis." It is not mentioned by the earliest writers, but it is found nearly, though not quite, as we now have it—under the title of "A Morning Prayer"—in the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 47), so that it can scarcely have been composed, as is asserted in the "Chron. Turonense," by St. Hilary of Poictiers, and the real author is, as Cardinal Bona says, unknown. It was only by degrees that it assumed its present place in the Mass. In Gaul, according to St. Gregory of Tours, it was recited after Mass in thanksgiving. St. Benedict introduced it into lauds; while it was also recited on occasions of public joy—e.g. in the Sixth General Council. It was sung at Mass according to the use of the Roman Church first of all on Christmas Day—during the first Mass, in Greek; during the second, in Latin. It was of course on Christmas night that the first words of the "Gloria in excelsis" were sung by the angels. Afterwards bishops said it at Mass on Sundays and feasts, priests only at the Mass of Easter Sunday, as appears from the Gregorian Sacramentary. This rule lasted till the eleventh century. At present it is said in all Masses, except those of the dead, of ferias which do not occur in the Paschal season—(it is said, however, on Maundy Thursday)—the Sundays in Advent and those from Septuagesima to Palm Sunday inclusive. It is not said in votive Masses, except those of the Angels, and the B. Virgin on Saturday.

II. Lesser doxology—i.e. "Glory be to the Father," &c., recited as a rule after each psalm in the office and after the "Judica" psalm in the Mass. Forms resembling it occur at the end of some of the Acts of the Martyrs—e.g. those of St. Polycarp. St. Basil ("De Spiritu Sancto ad S. Amphilochium," which work, however, is of doubtful authenticity) defends the formula "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost," and contends that its antiquity is attested by early Fathers, Clement of Rome, Irenæus, &c., and that it is at least as ancient as the Arian form, "Glory be to the Father in" or "through the Son," &c. Anyhow, the former part of the Gloria must date as far back as the third or fourth century, and arose no doubt from the form of baptism. The concluding words, "As it was in the beginning," are of later origin. The Gallican Council of Vaison, in 529, ordered their use, adding that they had been already introduced in Rome, Italy, Africa and the East against heretics who denied the Son's eternity.[1] And the rule of St. Benedict contains directions for the recital of the Gloria after each psalm. (Benedict XIV. "De Missa," Kraus, art. Doxologia.)

DREAMS arise, according to St. Thomas (2^a $2^æ$, qu. 95, a. 6), from interior or exterior causes. Among the former he enumerates the thoughts which occupied the mind in waking hours, and the state of the body. Among the latter, the effect produced on the bodily organs by material things—e.g. cold and heat, sound or light, &c.—and also the influence of good or evil spirits. It is reasonable to believe that God may speak to the soul through dreams, for the influence of God extends to sleeping as well as to waking hours; and that God has used dreams as a means of revealing His will is fully attested by the Old and the New Testament (see Gen. xx. 3, 7, xl. 5, Num. xii. 6, Matt. ii. 12, xxvii. 19). Accordingly, to regard dreams proceeding from merely physical causes as indications of a future with which they have no natural connection, is superstitious and therefore sinful. It is also, of course, unlawful to seek or accept signs of future events in dreams from demons. But, on the other hand, if there are grave reasons for doing so, we may lawfully believe that a dream has been sent by God for our instruction. But it is to be noted that a disposition to trust in dreams is always superstitious, for in the Christian dispensation there is a strong presumption against their use as means of foretelling the future. Even in the Old Testament the greater number of predictive dreams were given to those outside the Jewish covenant. If given to God's servants, they were given to them, as a rule, in the period of their earliest and most imperfect knowledge of Him.[1] In the New Testament, often as we read of ecstasies and visions, dreams are never mentioned as a vehicle of revelation, and they rarely occur in the lives of the saints.

DUEL. A fight between two persons (or several pairs of persons), the place, time, and weapons having been previously settled by mutual agreement. In one case such an agreement is lawful—viz. when in time of war such a contest is arranged between two or more soldiers of the opposing armies. In such a case the duel may be considered part of the war, and such duels, when the issue of the war has been made to depend on them, may even be regarded as a merciful way of settling a public quarrel.

In all other cases duels are strictly forbidden by the Church. It was the custom among the German nations to permit accuser and accused to settle their dispute by duel, and this mode of decision was looked upon as an appeal to the judgment of God. It was long before the Church could eradicate this superstition, and for a time provincial councils seem to have contented themselves with moderating it.[2] However, the Council of Valence (855) absolutely prohibited duels; imposing penance for homicide on the man who killed his antagonist, and depriving a man slain in duel of the Church's prayers.[1] Among modern nations it was long the common practice to settle affairs of honour by duel, and against this custom the Church has vigorously protested. Julius II. published a bull strongly condemning it in 1510;[2] while the Council of Trent excommunicated all who engaged in duels, and those who counselled or promoted them, besides depriving persons who died in a duel of Christian burial. The Holy See has condemned the excuses which have been made for this detestable practice. Thus Benedict XIV., in 1752, censured those who taught that a man might accept a duel to save his reputation for courage, or to keep his post as an officer in the army. Moreover, theologians teach that such excuses do not save a man from sin against the natural law, or from incurring ecclesiastical penalties.[1]

E

EASTER, FEAST OF. The feast of our Lord's resurrection. The word Easter is derived from that of the Saxon goddess Eástre, the same deity whom the Germans proper called Ostarâ, and honoured (according to Grimm, in his "German Mythology") as the divinity of the dawn. Bede ("De Temp. Rat." xv.) tells us that the Anglo-Saxons called the spring month Eosturmonath, and similarly Eginhard ("Vit. Car. Mag." 29) calls our April, Ostarmanoth. Naturally, therefore, the German nations called the great Church-feast which fell at the beginning of spring Easter, and the name continued among us, like such names as Thursday, long after the heathen goddess had been forgotten.[1] All Christians, except those of the German family, call the feast of Christ's resurrection by some modification of pascha, the term which the Church herself uses in her liturgy. This term is of Jewish origin, and therefore we must begin with a few words on the feast of Pasch, or Passover, from which the Christian feast is in a certain sense derived.[2]

Passover is a literal translation of the Hebrew name for the feast—viz. פֶּסַח; from this we get the Chaldee פַּסְחָא, and from the last the πάσχα[3] or pasch of the New Testament and of Christian writers. The Passover, then, or Pasch, was the feast celebrated on the 14th of Nisan, instituted in commemoration of the wonderful deliverance which God wrought for the Jews on the night of their exit from Egypt. The destroying angel smote the first-born of Egypt but passed over (פָּסַח)[1] the houses of the Hebrews. This deliverance was granted on a certain condition. Each head of a Hebrew house was to slay a lamb or kid without blemish on the evening of Nisan 14. He was to sprinkle its blood on the lintel and side-posts of the door. Afterwards, the lamb was to be roasted, no bone being broken, and eaten with unleavened bread and bitter herbs by all the family, no uncircumcised person, however, being allowed to partake of it, and the feast was to be observed year by year as a perpetual ordinance of the Jewish people.

It is certain that Christ observed the Passover the night before He died, that He made it the occasion of instituting the Eucharist, and that He, in His Passion, was the true paschal lamb prefigured by the lamb of the old Hebrew feast. Thus St. John calls special attention to the fact that not a bone of our Lord was broken on the cross; and St. Paul, writing probably just before the Passover of A.D. 58, in his first Epistle to the Corinthians, v. 7, 8, says "Purge out the old leaven that you may be a new lump, as you are unleavened; for also our πάσχα or passover Christ has

[1] Hefele, Beiträge, ii. p. 285.
[2] Smith's Dict. Christ. Ant. "Easter."
[3] Many among the early Christians, being ignorant of Hebrew, derived it from πάσχειν, to suffer. This derivation, worthless of course in itself, deserves notice, for it influenced their language and ideas of the feast.

[1] See Exod. xii. 13, 23, 27, and cf. Is. xxxi. 5. Philo in his Life of Moses, iii. 29, translates it διαβατήρια. Of course the account of the Jewish is merely meant as an introduction to that of the Christian feast; else much would have to be said of the connection between the Passover and the spring.

been sacrificed for us, therefore let us keep the feast . . in the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth." Christ, St. Paul argues, is the true paschal lamb, and the life of Christians is to be a perpetual feast of thanksgiving for the deliverance they have obtained by Christ's blood. As the Jews removed leaven from their houses at the time of Passover, so Christians are to purge away once for all the leaven of malice and wickedness.

The celebration of a special Paschal or Easter feast among Christians goes back to the remotest antiquity, though it is impossible to determine the date of its introduction. When St. Polycarp came to Rome, about 160, there were two modes prevalent among Christians of celebrating the Easter, and apostolic precedent was pleaded on each side. The Roman Church and the great majority of Christians celebrated the Pasch on the Sunday after Nisan 14—i.e. on the Sunday following the first full moon after the vernal equinox, because on that day Christ rose again, finished the work of redemption, and accomplished our deliverance from the Egyptian bondage of death and hell. But besides this feast they also celebrated on the previous Friday the memory of Christ's death, and for a long time this latter day also was called Pasch. Thus, Tertullian, about the year 200, distinguishes between the Pasch on which there was a strict obligation of fasting, and on which, too, the usual kiss of peace was omitted—i.e. our Good Friday—and the other Pasch, between which and Pentecost Christians stood at prayer instead of kneeling—i.e. our Easter Sunday.[1] Later writers distinguish these two days from each other as the Pasch of the crucifixion and resurrection (πάσχα σταυρώσιμον καὶ ἀναστάσιμον).

The Roman Church claimed to follow the practice of St. Peter and St. Paul on this matter. On the other hand, the Churches of Asia Proconsularis, appealing to the authority of St. John, ended this time of fasting and kept the feast of Passover or Pasch at the same time as the Jews—viz. 14 Nisan—on whatever day it might fall. On this day, as they maintained,[2] our Lord kept the Pasch and instituted the Eucharist. On the same day, therefore, they celebrated the memory of the institution and of our joyful deliverance by Christ's death. As they kept the Jewish day, though not the Jewish feast, they were called "Observants" (τηροῦντες), and as this day fell on Nisan 14, they were also called "Quartodecimani." Polycarp and Pope Anicetus discussed the matter, and though no agreement was reached, each party was allowed to continue its own custom in peace. The matter, however, led to sharp discussion, about 190, between Pope Victor and Polycrates of Ephesus, and Victor was near excommunicating the Asiatics. The intercession of Gallic bishops, especially Irenæus, kept matters from coming to this pass.[1] The Quartodeciman practice was finally set aside by the Nicene Council. The same council settled further the way in which Easter Sunday was to be reckoned, as has been shown in the article CYCLE. (See Hefele, "Concil." i. 86 seq., 320 seq.)

Easter is, as St. Leo calls it, the "feast of feasts," the greatest of Christian solemnities. Down to the twelfth century each day in Easter week was a holiday of obligation. At present this is the case only with the first three days, and now in most countries even Easter Monday and Tuesday are only days of devotion. All moveable feasts are calculated from Easter. The joyful character of the time is marked in the services of the Church—e.g. by the chanting of the "Vidi Aquam" instead of the "Asperges" before Mass; by the constant repetition of the "Alleluia" in Mass and office all through the Paschal season—i.e. till Trinity Sunday. On Easter Sunday the office is very short, because in old times the services were prolonged far into the night of Holy Saturday, so that little time was left for the matins and lauds of Easter Sunday. The short office is continued during the week, probably, as Benedict XIV. and Martene say, because the first day determined the office for the days that followed, and because there would have been a special inconvenience in changing it in a week when so many neophytes had just been baptised and were taking part for the first time in the full service of the Church. (See Benedict XIV. "De Fest.")

EBIONITES. Judaising Christians, and the direct successors of the Judaisers whom St. Paul opposed so strenuously—

[1] Tertull. De Orat. 18. De Coron. 3.

[2] The point, however, is very doubtful. Primâ facie, the first three Gospels appear to imply this. St. John seems to say that Christ died on the day of the Passover—i.e. on Nisan 14, the Passover beginning on the evening of that day.

[1] Euseb. H. E. v. 24.

e.g. in the Epistle to the Galatians. As a distinct sect the Ebionites seem to have made themselves first known in the reign of Trajan. Although they were connected by origin with the Church of Jerusalem, and had their head-quarters near the Dead Sea, they were not confined to Palestine, but were found in Rome and probably also in the other great cities of the empire. They held that the Jewish law was still binding on all Christians; and, consequently, they rejected the authority of St. Paul, whom they treated as an apostate. Christ, they said, was a mere man, the son of Joseph and Mary, distinguished by his strict observance of the law. It is a probable conjecture that after the final destruction of Jerusalem the Judaising Christians received large accessions from the Essenes; and, in any case, it is certain that Ebionitism became mixed up with ascetic and mystical elements foreign to its original character. According to this mystical Ebionitism, still existing in the forged homilies and Recognitions of Clement, the law of Moses had been corrupted, and by a capricious process they continued to remove from it all that was distasteful to them, specially the law of sacrifice. They held that the Word of God had been incarnate in several Christs, of whom Adam was the first, Jesus the last. Early in the third century, one of the Ebionites brought to Rome the book of Elchasai, or "hidden wisdom," in which the same mystical Ebionitism was propounded. In the fourth century the Ebionites were still pretty numerous in eastern Palestine, but in the following age they had almost disappeared. Carefully to be distinguished from the Ebionites are the Nazarenes whom Jerome mentions as living in his time on the east of Jordan. These latter, probably the descendants of the old Jewish Christians of Jerusalem, though they observed the law, did not lay it upon others, admitted St. Paul's authority, and possibly held orthodox doctrine on the divinity of Christ.

The name Ebionite means "poor" (Heb. אביונים), and most likely was adopted to indicate the Apostolic or Essene poverty which they professed. A founder called "Ebion" is an uncritical fiction which appears very early. (Justin, "Dial. c. Tryph." 47; Iren. i. 26; Euseb. "H. E." iii. 27; and, among modern books, Lightfoot on Galatians, p. 311 seq.)

ECSTASY (ἔκστασις). A state in which a man passes out of himself—i.e. out of that state of cognition which is natural to him. Ecstasy is usually taken as equivalent to rapture, though the word rapture, unlike ecstasy, implies distinctly that the person subject to it is carried out of his own control and placed in a state which he does not reach by natural inclination. Such rapture or ecstasy, St. Thomas says, may proceed from bodily causes; as, for example, if a person is alienated from his senses by disease; or it may be wrought by the agency of devils; or, lastly, it may come from the Spirit of God. In this last state, St. Thomas continues, a man, being withdrawn from the senses, is raised to the contemplation of supernatural things (spiritu divino elevatus ad supernaturalia cum abstractione a sensibus).

Such ecstasies or raptures are, of course, frequently mentioned in the Old and New Testaments, and have occurred in the lives of many saints. In ecstatic prayer, according to a mystical writer (Antony a Spiritu Sancto), the body seems as if dead, and the senses are suspended; but the will, as St. Teresa points out, retaining full power is absorbed in God. True rapture unites the soul to God, increases humility, &c. If these effects are not present or are not lasting, a director may generally conclude that the rapture is not supernatural. Still more may he do so, if he sees in the person who pretends to ecstasy a love of extraordinary gifts rather than of solid virtue. (St. Thomas, "Summ." 1^a 2^{ae}, 28, 3; 2^a 2^{ae}, 175; St. Teresa, "Autobiog." Engl. Transl. ch. xx.; in which last useful extracts from the mystics are given.)

ECTHESIS. [See MONOTHELITES.]

EDUCATION. The moral and intellectual discipline by which the human faculties are trained and unfolded, in subordination to a certain end. If no end or object is proposed to himself by the educator beyond that of making the most of his pupil's faculties, he does not educate, but merely informs. For the domain of knowledge extends in every direction to infinity; and the pupil who simply learns all that his faculties enable him to learn necessarily becomes, unless of a very marked idiosyncrasy, a dilettante, a sciolist—one who knows a little of everything—but is not truly educated. Something like this is said to be the observed effect of the training given in the common schools of the United States, in which no dominant idea, or one wholly inadequate—such as that of the greatness of the Republic, or the excellence of democracy—supplies teachers and pupils with a compass to steer by.

Education, however, may, and must, be directed to several ends simultaneously; for, as man is a complex being, and has himself various ends—e.g. as a subject of God, as a subject of Cæsar, as a member of a family, &c.—so the education of man must propose to itself several ends. Of these some one must be chief and paramount, and must direct the form and measure in which the other ends are to be pursued; otherwise the school would be the battle-ground of independent forces, each struggling for the mastery; and the result would be confusion. Now, since the object of education is to form man, the prime end, in subordination to which it must be conducted, must be identical with the prime end of man himself. What this is we learn from the Catechism: it is to know and serve God in this life, and to enjoy Him for ever in the next. In subordination to this main end all educational processes are to be carried on. Human beings ought to be so educated that they may know God here, and through that knowledge possess Him hereafter. How, then, are they to obtain this necessary knowledge? The Catholic answer is, that they must seek and receive it at the hands of the one divinely-appointed and infallible witness of the revelation by which He has made Himself known to mankind—the Catholic and Roman Church. It thus appears that, in the logical order, the first and highest authority in all that regards education is the Church. With her sanction it should be commenced, and under her superintendence it should be continued; for were her intervention to be excluded at any stage, there would be danger lest those under education came to mistake one of the subordinate ends of man for his main end, to their own and others' detriment.

At the same time, it must not be forgotten that man is a social being. The opinion of the best writers (see, for instance, De Maistre's examination of Rousseau's "Contrat Social") is, that man was originally created and adapted for society, not that society arose out of a compromise between the warring cupidities of originally isolated savages. If human society be aboriginal, then power in that society—i.e. government—is also aboriginal, since without it—man being what he is—we cannot conceive it possible for society to subsist. This power, St. Paul tells us,[1] is "from God." Its main object is, to secure the permanence and temporal welfare, so far as the circumstances admit, of the society itself and of each member of the society. For this the power exists; and it is therefore entitled to take all measures required to enable it to fulfil its functions. Now, one of the conditions without which these functions could not be effectively discharged is a control over education. The organised power in society — in other words, the State —may reasonably require that all its citizens should early receive that mental and moral training which may dispose them to restrain anti-social passions, to obey the laws, and by industry to promote their own and the public welfare. Whatever control over the machinery of education may be necessary to secure the attainment of this end, that control the State may reasonably pretend to. Its claims only become unjust and oppressive when, ignoring the still more sacred right of the Church to secure in education the attainment of man's highest end, it compels or tempts Catholics to place their children in schools which the ecclesiastical authority has not sanctioned. The end pursued by the Church is primary; that pursued by the State is secondary. Each may justly demand that its authority be recognised; but the injury caused by disallowing the authority of the Church is more serious than in the contrary case, by how much that which affects man's eternal interest is more important than that which affects his temporal interest only.

A third authority in education is that of the family, the head of which is under a moral obligation to see that all its members receive such a training as may fit them to maintain their place in the social hierarchy of their country, keep up all sound family traditions, and—should that be necessary, as in most cases it is—earn their own living. Catholic parents are, of course, bound also to see that the teaching in the schools to which they send their children has ecclesiastical sanction, and to resist all attempts to make them patronise schools without that sanction.

It thus appears that education has three principal ends—the first religious, the second political, the third domestic; but that among these the religious end takes the lead and dominates over the other two, on account of its intrinsically greater importance. And since, as explained above, we cannot walk securely in religion one step except in union with and obedience to the Church, every well-instructed Catholic understands that the Church must preside over the education of Catholics at every stage and in every branch, so far as to see that they are sufficiently instructed in their religion. With regard to non-Catholics, who in modern times are often mixed with Catholics in the same school, the Church accepts in practice what is called the "Conscience Clause." [See the articles SCHOOLS and UNIVERSITY, in which the practical means of reconciling the concurrent authorities of Church and State in the work of education are considered.]

ELECTION. (1) [See PREDESTINATION.] (2) In canon law, the act of choosing a fit person for a vacant post. The form to be observed is as follows. All who are entitled to vote must be summoned, under pain of nullity if a third part of the electors are passed over. Those who are unable to attend may send a procurator. The actual choice may be made in one of three ways: by inspiration [see ACCLAMATION], by scrutiny, or by compromise. The second, which is that most commonly used, must be conducted according to fixed rules. Three members should be nominated to act as scrutineers, to collect the votes and to publish the result. The votes are given secretly by word of mouth or on slips of paper, and must be absolute. The candidate who has obtained the votes of the majority present is considered to have gained. It should be noted that a mere majority is not enough. Thus, if one candidate obtains eight votes, another seven, and another three, no one has the requisite majority; but the voting must be renewed until one of them obtains at least ten votes. When at length the number has been reached, the choice is made in the name of the whole body. An election by compromise is effected by selecting, in the first instance, an arbitrator or compromiser, to whom the electoral body gives the power of choosing. [See CONCLAVE.]

ELEVATION. The Church has adored the Blessed Sacrament from the time of its institution. St. Ambrose says, "We adore in the mysteries the flesh of Christ, which the Apostles adored." "No one eats that flesh," says St. Augustine, "without first adoring it."[1] But the outward signs by which the Church has expressed this adoration have not always been the same.

In the Greek liturgies the elevation of the Eucharist takes place shortly before the communion. Ancient authors tell us how at the elevation the curtains which concealed the sanctuary during the rest of the canon were drawn aside and the sacred mysteries presented by the priest for the adoration of the faithful. Formerly in the Latin Mass the Blessed Sacrament was elevated only at the words "omnis honor et gloria" just before the "Pater Noster." This is now usually known as "the little elevation." The elevation of host and chalice immediately after consecration was introduced in detestation of the denial of transubstantiation by Berengarius. It seems to have begun about 1100, for the ancient Ordines Romani and the liturgical writers Amalarius, Walafrid, and the author of the "Micrologus" are silent concerning it. Even after 1100 it was the host only which was elevated in some churches, and, indeed, according to Benedict XIV., the Carthusians still adhere to this old custom of elevating the host only after consecration. The further custom of ringing a small bell at the elevation began in France during the twelfth century, was introduced into Germany in 1203 by Cardinal Gui, legate of the Holy See, and is enjoined in several English councils. About the same time the ringing of the large bell at the conventual Mass was ordered in the statutes of some monastic orders. Ivo of Chartres, who died in 1115, congratulates Maud, Queen of England, on having presented the church of Our Lady at Chartres with bells which were rung at the consecration. (From Le Brun, "Explication des Cérémonies de la Messe;" and Benedict XIV. "De Miss.")

EMBER DAYS[2] (quattuor tempora). The Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday which follow December 13, the First Sunday in Lent, Pentecost, and September 14 (Exaltation of the Cross), are

[1] Ambros. De Spir. San. iii. 12. August. In Ps. xcviii., apud Le Brun.

[2] It may be regarded as nearly certain that the English word is not derived from "ember," in the sense of ashes. It may come from the Anglo-Saxon ymbren, a revolution or circuit. But more probably it is a corruption of the Latin quattuor tempora. The Dutch Quatertemper, German Quatember, Danish Kvatember, exhibit the corruption in its process. (From Smith and Cheetham.)

days of fasting, and are called in English Ember Days, in the Breviary and Missal "Quattuor Tempora," because these days of fasting recur in each quarter of the year. The Ember Days were observed at Rome in St. Augustine's time—nay, so ancient was the practice of observing them in that city that St. Leo ascribes an Apostolic origin to the fast. The same Pope says the object of the fast is that we may purify our souls and do penance as we begin each quarter of the year. The fast was introduced here by St. Augustine, the Apostle of England. At first the weeks in which the Ember Days occur were not definitely fixed, and even in the eleventh century a German council speaks of the Ember fast as jejunium incertum. According to ancient custom the clergy are ordained only on the Saturdays of the Ember weeks, while the whole Church fasts and prays. (See Acts xiii. ad init.)

EMBOLISMUS (also Embolis and Embolum). Literally, a prayer "thrown in" or "intercalated." It consists in an extension of the last clause in the Lord's Prayer, "Libera nos a malo," and occurs in all the liturgies, Roman, Mozarabic, Gallican, Greek, Coptic, Armenian, &c. In the Eastern liturgies it occurs immediately before the communion; in the Roman Mass, the embolismus ("Libera nos, quæsumus, Domine") is followed by the breaking of the host, the Pax with the accompanying prayer, two prayers in preparation for communion, and then by the communion itself.

Embolismus is also used by some mediæval writers instead of Epact. (Kraus, "Real-Encycl.")

EMINENCE (title of a Cardinal). Before 1630 the Cardinals of the holy Roman Church were addressed by the titles of "Most Illustrious" and "Your most illustrious Lordship" (dominatio); but in that year Urban VIII., by a consistorial decree, ratified and confirmed the report of the Congregation of Rites, recommending that the titles "Most Eminent" and "Your Eminence" should for the future be substituted for the above, and strictly confined (with the sole exception of the Master of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem) to the Cardinals, so that, on the one hand, if anyone, however highly placed (those of imperial and royal rank excepted), should address a Cardinal by any other title, no notice should be taken of his letter, and, on the other, any prelate of whatever rank, assuming these titles, was to be under the displeasure of the Roman Pontiff, and liable to various severe penalties. (Ferraris, Cardinales, art. 2.)

EMPIRE, THE HOLY ROMAN. The empire founded by Charlemagne with the aid of the Roman Pontiffs had come to nothing through the degeneracy of his descendants. In 962 it was revived, through the coronation of Otho I. King of Germany, by Pope John XII., and this was called the transfer of the empire from the Franks to the Germans (translatio imperii a Francis ad Germanos). The institution so founded lasted for eight centuries and a half, and in the course of ages German publicists, meditating upon its theory and its powers, invented for it the above designation. It was the Roman empire, for it represented and revived the Empire of Charlemagne, which again, according to the ideas of Latin Christendom, represented and replaced the old Byzantine empire, which had fallen into heresy. It was also the Holy Roman empire, and this not merely because it was erected with the benediction of the Roman Pontiff, but also because, whereas the old Roman empire was Pagan, this was Christian, and was bound to use that universal dominion which it had inherited in theory from Pagan Rome for the extension of the kingdom of Jesus Christ—that is, of the Catholic Church. As the Church was one, not many, and knew but one head on earth, the successor of St. Peter, to whom all nations and all individuals were de jure subject in their spiritual concerns, so, according to these reasoners, all temporal dominion was of right summed up in the one empire, governed by the one emperor, under whom, as his viceregents, the kings of the nations ruled in their respective countries. It is needless to remark that this brilliant generalisation scarcely emerged out of the region of theory; that it was never countenanced by the Popes; and that the kings of the Franks, the Normans, and the Spanish Goths, whose ancestors had never been subjugated by the Romans, were not likely to surrender an atom of their independence in deference to this figment of Ghibelline lawyers. Yet so captivating was the idea to the mediæval mind, that special protests were sometimes deemed necessary, as in the case of the Emperor Sigismund's visit to England in 1416, when as his ship lay off the shore at Dover, and he was preparing to land, the Duke of Gloucester, by Henry V.'s order, rode into the water with his sword drawn, and "inquired whether the imperial stranger meant to exercise or claim any authority or jurisdiction in England."[1] The answer being in the negative, he was allowed to land.

The crown of the Holy Roman Empire was elective, this being deemed, probably from the example of Papal elections, a more august mode of appointment than hereditary descent. The electors for a long period were seven in number, four secular princes, and three ecclesiastical; afterwards they became eight, and finally nine. Nevertheless the imperial crown tended to become hereditary, and from the accession of Albert in 1437 to the end the only emperors not of the house of Hapsburg were Charles VII. and Francis I. The first Napoleon, aiming at reviving in his own person the empire of Charlemagne, insisted after Austerlitz on the suppression of the ancient title; this was done in 1806, the reigning emperor taking the title of Emperor of Austria.

ENCLOSURE (clausura). Enclosure is that rule of the Church which separates a convent from the world by the prohibition or restriction of intercourse with persons outside its walls. From the nature of the case, since preaching and other active ministerial duties are incompatible with enclosure, only a certain proportion of the orders of men observe it; and in the case of these it relates principally to the admission of women to the interior of the monastery. Hence the term is commonly used of nunneries rather than of the convents of men. The Church desires that the entrance of any person into religion should be his or her free and voluntary act, done with a pure intention; and she enjoins that a postulant of tender years be closely examined on these points by the bishop.[2] She will not allow a postulant of either sex to be professed before the completion of the sixteenth year, and at least a year of probation, after taking the habit, must precede the profession.[3] Having thus provided, so far as possible, that persons of weak resolution and unstable character shall not be professed, she surrounds them, when once professed, with rigorous safeguards, with a view to minimise to the utmost that peril of inconstancy to which frail human nature is ever liable. The Council of Trent ordered that where the enclosure of nuns had been broken, it should be restored by the bishops, who were for the future to maintain it most strictly. "Let it not be lawful for any nun after her profession to go out of her convent, even for a short time, on any pretext whatever, except for some legitimate cause to be approved by the bishop, notwithstanding any indults and privileges whatsoever. And let no persons, whatever be their rank, condition, sex, or age, be allowed to enter within the enclosed part of the convent unless with the leave of the bishop or superior, given in writing, under pain of incurring excommunication ipso facto."[1] The "legitimate cause" was interpreted to extend only to three things—fire, leprosy, or some epidemic disease; but according to Barbosa other grounds are admissible: for instance, the danger, in time of war, of a convent falling into the hands of an undisciplined soldiery. The prohibition against anyone entering the convent prevents the chaplain or any other priest from entering the part of the church where the nuns sing, and requires that even the bishop, when the nuns are electing an abbess or other functionary, shall take their votes at the grate and not elsewhere. But there are certain cases of necessary exception: as when a nun is too ill to go to the confessional in the church, in which case the confessor must go to her cell and the sacraments must be taken to her; medical men and surgeons have also to be admitted, and some persons of the tradesman class; but these must always be accompanied by two of the older nuns. A bishop has power to order that no one shall go to a nunnery, even for the purpose of conversation at the grille, unless with his or his commissary's permission. (Ferraris, Clausura.)

It is, however, important to note that the legislation of the Church on enclosure applies, in its full strictness, only to the monasteries of real "moniales," and not to the numerous modern congregations of women bound by simple vows, whose convents are more properly called conservatoria.

ENCRATITÆ (ἐγκρατεῖς, ἐγκρατῖται). A Gnostic sect founded by Tatian in the latter part of the second century.

Tatian was by birth an Assyrian, taught rhetoric at Rome and became a Christian under the influence of Justin Martyr. After Justin's death his exaggerated theories on the evil inherent in matter led into definite heresy. According to Irenæus (i. 28), he adopted a fanciful system of "æons" similar to that of Valentinus and Clement of Alexandria ("Strom." iii. p. 548, ed. Potter); he belonged to the class of anti-Jewish Gnostics—i.e. he denied the divine origin of the Mosaic law. He denounced marriage as impurity, and made his followers abstain from animal food. Hence the name Encratites or "Continent." This false asceticism, which had its origin in the East, was widely diffused in early times, so that we need not be surprised to hear of "Encratites" or false ascetics who may really have had no connection with Tatian. Such were the Aquarii or ὑδροπαραστάται, so called because, regarding wine as evil, they would use water only in the celebration of the Eucharist. (Neander, "Kirchengeschichte," ii. p. 157.)

ENCYCLICAL (literæ encyclicæ). A circular letter. In the ecclesiastical sense, an encyclical is a letter addressed by the Pope to all the bishops in communion with him, in which he condemns prevalent errors, or informs them of impediments which persecution, or perverse legislation or administration, opposes in particular countries to the fulfilment by the Church of her divine mission, or explains the line of conduct which Christians ought to take in reference to urgent practical questions, such as education, or the relations between Church and State, or the liberty of the Apostolic See. Encyclicals are "published for the whole Church, and addressed directly to the bishops, under circumstances which are afflicting to the entire Catholic body; while briefs and bulls are determined by circumstances more particular in their nature, and have a more special destination."[1]

In early times the use of the term was not restricted as at present; thus the well-known letter of the Church of Smyrna, describing the martyrdom of Polycarp is headed Ἐπιστολὴ ἐγκυκλικός, a circular letter; and the same designation was given by St. Cyprian to his letters on the Lapsi. (Ferraris, Epistolæ, § 15.)

END OF THE WORLD. [See LAST THINGS.]

ENDOWMENT (Fr. dotation, Ger. Begabung). Any property permanently set apart, in order that its annual profits may contribute to the support of some institution of public utility or recreation, is an endowment of that institution. An ecclesiastical endowment is such property set apart for the support of a church, or of some institution the management of which is in ecclesiastical hands. From the fifth century the Church began to be richly endowed, chiefly with lands; at a later period lordships and jurisdictions were showered upon her, especially in Germany, where the three Prince Bishops of Cologne, Mainz, and Treves were Electors of the German empire. Our own forefathers, alike in Saxon and Norman times, were full of a generous zeal to secure by endowments the services of a permanent priesthood, and to provide for the competent or splendid celebration of the divine worship. A considerable part of the provision thus made was confiscated and squandered during the Reformation; what remained was, by the effect of the Acts of Uniformity and Supremacy, transferred to the Anglican body, and is still enjoyed by them. The calamities and oppressions under which English Catholics have existed during the last three centuries, have, till recent times, thrown great obstacles in the way of a renewed flow of endowments. Yet such instances are not quite unknown; we could mention a pious couple near Kendal, who bequeathed a good estate two or three generations ago to found a permanent mission in order to "evangelise the dales;" and there must be similar cases in other counties. In Scotland and Ireland, no less than in England, the old endowments belonging to the Catholic Church have been either lost or diverted from their original destination. In Scotland, through the extraordinary influence of Knox in the sixteenth century, the greater part of the population embraced the heresy of Calvin, and the Presbyterians of the "Established Kirk" still enjoy what is left of the ancient endowments. In Ireland, the Protestant Church, to which the power of England transferred the tithes and Church lands at the Reformation, was disestablished and nominally disendowed by the Act of 1869; but the compensations were calculated on so liberal a scale as almost to amount to re-endowment.

ENERGUMEN (ἐνεργούμενος—i.e. worked upon, as by a demon). A word of frequent occurrence in early Christian literature. The energumens correspond to the persons "possessed by a demon" (δαιμονιζόμενοι), "tormented" (ἐνοχλούμενοι), "overpowered by the devil" (καταδυναστευόμενοι ὑπὸ τοῦ διαβόλου), "with an unclean spirit" (πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον ἔχοντες), who are mentioned in Matt. iv. 24, Luc. vi. 18, Acts x. 38, Acts viii. 7, and elsewhere in the New Testament. In ecclesiastical language the energumens are also called "demoniacs," "possessed of the devil" (δαιμονιόληπτοι); and, among the Latins, "arrepti" and "arreptitii," sc. "a dæmone." We also find (e.g. in "Constit. Ap." viii. 12) the word χειμαζόμενοι—i.e. "the storm-tossed." The Church derived her belief in demoniacal possession from the words of Christ, who (e.g. in Matt. xii. 22 seq.) expressly appeals to the fact of his driving out the devil from the possessed as a proof of his divine mission. The Apologists generally prove the divinity of the Christian religion by the power which the Church had to heal the possessed; and among these Apologists, Tertullian, "Ad Scap." 2, speaks of the healing power as a fact generally recognised and of daily occurrence.

The number of possessed persons, or energumens, in the early Church originated a regular discipline with regard to them. This discipline began in the third century, died out in the East in the course of the following, while in Spain it continued in force till the seventh century. The energumens were divided into baptised and catechumens,[1] the former being examined (to ascertain the reality of the possession) at the altar, the latter outside of the church. Their names were put in a register, they were maintained at the expense of the Christian community, and had dwellings assigned them near the church.[2] They were set to work—e.g. in sweeping the church[3]—and led a penitential life. Sometimes the exorcist, with the bishop's approval, exorcised them privately[4]; sometimes the ceremony was performed by the bishop himself assisted by his clergy, after the "Mass of the Catechumens," with prayer, the sign of the cross, and laying on of hands. Other means of exorcism—e.g. application of blessed water and salt, of spittle, breathing upon them (exsufflatio, insufflatio), in some places anointing, were also used.

The older practice was to debar energumens, except at death, from all the sacraments till they were cured,[1] but the Council of Orange, in 441, admitted them to the sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist, if they behaved peaceably.[2] They were of course excluded from ordination, or, if ordained, from exercising their orders till their recovery was thoroughly proved. It is impossible to say for certain where they were placed in church; probably those who were violent were placed outside the church, those who were peaceable in the narthex, both classes being called up by the deacon nearer to the altar for the exorcism. When healed, the former energumen fasted for a period varying from twenty to forty days. He was dismissed by the priest, after prayer, and his name was entered in the list of the cured.

The Church, in the Roman Pontifical, still recognises the possibility of demoniacal possession; but cases of possession are infrequent or infrequently recognised, and the energumens no longer occupy the position and attract the interest which belonged to them in the early Church.

ENGLISH CHURCH. Anglo-Saxon Period.—The Angles, Saxons, and Jutes, who successively settled in England, unlike the German invaders of Gaul and Italy, did not mix with the conquered race, and appropriate to themselves the higher civilisation of their new country. The Britons were either exterminated or driven into the mountains of the West. The conquerors kept their own language almost entirely free from Celtic elements, preserved their German institutions unaltered, and continued their idolatrous worship for a century and a half. Gregory the Great, when still a monk, had admired the fair forms of Saxon slaves exposed for sale in the Roman Forum, and conceived the design of preaching the Gospel to their nation. After his elevation to the Papacy he despatched to England several missionaries, headed by the monk Augustine. They landed in Kent probably in the autumn of 596. Ethelbert, the Saxon king of Kent, consented to receive the missionaries. He listened with attention to the discourse of Augustine, and promised the strangers his protection as long as they should remain in his dominions. The protection of the king, and the active support of the queen, who was a Christian, produced the happiest results. On Christmas Day, 597, Ethelbert and ten thousand of his people received the sacrament of Baptism. Thanks to the wise directions of the Pope, Christianity made rapid progress. In 601 Augustine received from Rome the pallium and a band of new helpers: Mellitus, Paulinus, Justus, and Ruffinianus. Augustine was to consecrate twelve bishops, to make London the metropolitan see of the South, and York that of the North, each metropolitan having twelve suffragans. But this scheme was not carried out during his lifetime. Augustine enlarged an old Roman church in Canterbury, and consecrated it to SS. Peter and Paul. The neighbouring monastery later received the name of its founder. The saint died 604, after a fruitless attempt at union with the British bishops (see BRITISH CHURCH), and was succeeded in the see of Canterbury by Laurence. In Ethelbert's lifetime an episcopal see was founded at Rochester in Kent, and another at London. Ethelbert of Kent and Sebert of Essex died about 616, and were succeeded by pagan princes hostile to the new religion. A reaction set in: Mellitus, bishop of London, and Justus of Rochester, fled first to Canterbury, and thence to Gaul. Laurence was only prevented from joining them in their flight by a dream. In a short time Eadbald the persecutor became a member, and the chief supporter, of the Church. Mellitus and Justus came back, and both in turn succeeded Laurence in the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury. Peace was not restored in Essex until later. In 625 Paulinus, who had accompanied the princess Ethelberga to York, received from King Eadwin permission to preach the Gospel north of the Humber. Eadwin himself after a long resistance, embraced the new faith. His example, his support, and the wonderful zeal of Paulinus soon brought about conversions numerous enough to found a bishopric at York. Paulinus also preached, made conversions and built churches in the kingdom of Mercia. Penda, the pagan king of Mercia, to stop the progress of the faith, entered into a league with Cædwalla, king of the West Britons, and attacked and killed King Edwin in the battle of Hatfield (633). Paulinus and Queen Ethelberga fled south. Paulinus was made bishop of Rochester, then vacant, and laboured there until 642. Cædwalla retained hold of Northumbria until 634, when the Christian king Oswald defeated him at Dilston. Oswald had been educated by the Irish monks of Iona, and now invited them to preach the Gospel to his subjects. St. Aidan is the first of a long list of Irish priests and bishops who were destined by God to establish the Christian Church among so many tribes and in so many countries. (See IRISH CHURCH.) They were all monks. Beda, although blaming the Irish missionaries for the tenacity with which they clung to certain of their customs, has yet great admiration for their zeal and holiness. He praises especially St. Aidan, whose meekness and humility won the hearts of the Saxon youths, and secured him many followers. Oswald, like Edwin, fell in a battle against Penda (642). His brother Oswy succeeded at last (655) in freeing the country from the yoke of Penda. The death of this king and the victory of Oswy mark a turning-point in Christian history—the end of paganism in England.

Redwald, king of East Anglia, had received baptism in Kent, but soon reverted to his heathen worship. His son Eorpwald's conversion (632) was more sincere. Eorpwald's successor, Sigebert, brought over from Burgundy the missionary Felix, who, with the approbation of Archbishop Honorius of Canterbury, established a bishopric at Dunwich (635). About this same time Birinus converted the West Saxons. His episcopal see was Dorchester, afterwards transferred to Winchester. The Church only began to flourish in Mercia after the death of Penda. Cedda, Adda, Betti, and Diuma are the great apostles of this kingdom. In Essex also the Gospel again found favour. In 654 Cedda was created bishop of London. Wherever the work of conversion had been either commenced or completed by Irish monks, certain peculiarities of Irish church discipline had been maintained. They referred to the celebration of Easter, and to the form of the tonsure. Although not doctrinal, these differences were a perpetual source of dissension in the Church. King Oswy of Northumbria convened a synod at Whitby, in which the contending parties should discuss the questions in dispute (664). The principal speakers were Colman, bishop of Lindisfarne, in favour of the Irish or Scotch, and Wilfrid of York, in favour of the Roman practice. The king presided. After learning from Wilfrid's eloquent speeches that the Roman practice was sanctioned by the Council of Nice, by the decrees of the Apostolic See, and by the usage of the universal Church, he exclaimed: "Colman, is it so?" Receiving an answer in the affirmative, he resumed with a smile, "Who, then, is the greater in heaven, Columba or Peter?" All replied "Peter." "Then," said the king, "will I obey the decrees of Peter; for if he who has the keys is to shut me out, who is there to let me in?" The bystanders applauded the witticism, and the conference broke up. The result was, that several of the Scottish clergy passed over to the party of Wilfrid; and Colman, after a short interval, taking with him his own adherents and about thirty natives, returned to his monastery in the isle of Iona. The conference at Whitby established harmony in the Anglo-Saxon church; but many years elapsed before the question was set at rest among the Picts, the Scots, and the Britons. (Beda, iii. 25, 26; Lingard, "A.-S. Church," ch. i.)

The hierarchy was really established in England by Theodore of Tarsus, a Greek by birth. He was consecrated by Pope Vitalian (668), and landed in England in 669. The new archbishop visited the whole country, preaching and teaching everywhere. The princes, the clergy, the people received him with testimonies of the most profound respect. In 673 he held a synod at Hertford, at which were present the bishops Bisi, Putta, Leutherius and Winfrid; Wilfrid sent a representative. Ten decrees, chiefly on church discipline, were made, and accepted by the bishops at this synod. Theodore understood the necessity of more bishoprics, and of episcopal sees removed from the seat of temporal power. But in carrying out his reforms he occasionally ventured to transgress the letter of the Canons, conceiving himself justified perhaps by the wants of the people and the anomalous state of the Church. He divided the immense diocese held by Wilfrid into four parts, and gave a new bishop to each. Hence his celebrated dispute with that prelate. Pope Agatho, to whom Wilfrid appealed, seems to have approved Theodore's policy, though he condemned his treatment of the bishop. The same pontiff confirmed to Theodore and his successors the authority which he possessed by a decree published in a council at Rome (697) fixing the number of Anglo-Saxon bishops at twelve, of whom the Bishop of Canterbury should be the metropolitan, and the other eleven his suffragans. Theodore's successor, Brithwald, carried on the work of subdivision, but the increased number of bishops was not yet enough for the spiritual needs of the people. Beda was anxious that the original plan of Gregory the Great should be carried out, but the whole of the dioceses remained united in one single ecclesiastical province until by a decree of Gregory III. (Chron. Sax. anno 735) the bishoprics north of the Humber were formed into a separate province subject to the metropolitan of York, and Egbert, the bishop of that see, was duly invested with the pallium from Rome. Offa, the powerful king of Mercia, obtained from Pope Adrian (787) a decree raising Lichfield to be metropolitan see for East Anglia and Mercia. By authority of Leo III. this decree was set aside (803) and the southern dioceses were once more united into one province. The cathedral chapters remained in the hands of monks, but Theodore made provision for the formation of a secular clergy, and for the establishment of parishes in connection with the manors. Even in time of war synods were held. The organisation of the Church paved the way for the unitication of the seven kingdoms. The predominance of monks in the Church made ecclesiastical dignities less liable to become as it were hereditary in certain families; the bishops were but little exposed to the bad influences of princely favour. Nowhere, except perhaps in Ireland, was there ever shown the same eagerness to embrace the monastic life: kings, bishops, and nobles abandoned their worldly position to lead a life of solitude with God. Nowhere were the clergy honoured as in England; the priest ranked with the thegn, the bishop with the ealdorman, the archbishop with the atheling. But this honourable status was not without its dangers; it involved the clergy in worldly concerns. Especially after the invasion of the Danes was the discipline of the Church relaxed; it almost seemed that the Northman would bring upon the Anglo-Saxon Church the same ruin which the Anglo-Saxons had brought upon the British Church. Europe owes it to Alfred the Great that the Northmen were unable to found a great monarchy in France and England. The Danes, instead of subjecting the Saxons, became fused with them into one people. During the long wars churches and monasteries had been destroyed and the priests put to death. Religious zeal had all but disappeared. Alfred was obliged to send abroad for monks to fill the monasteries he had rebuilt. He also did much to revive science and art, yet with scanty results. No poet like Caedmon, no historian like Beda, no learned men like Aldhelm and Alcuin, no missionary like Boniface, were forthcoming. Dunstan, Abbot of Glastonbury, and later Archbishop of Canterbury, is the only man of commanding importance during this period. From 943 to 988 this great prelate was the adviser and the right hand of the kings Edred, Edgar, and Edward II., the reformer of Church and clergy. He introduced into the monasteries the strict rule of St. Benedict; he filled the cathedral chapters with monks, and endeavoured to stem the torrent of abuses. Danes and Normans still continued to invade the country, but the monasteries were respected, and were almost the only safe refuge during the raids of the invaders. The reign of Ethelred (979–1014) was disastrous to England, and led to the elevation of Canute (1016–1035), whose wise administration to a certain extent remedied the sores of Church and State. Edward the Confessor showed an excellent will, but the baneful influence of the Godwins prevented him from giving it effect. Simony was rife during his reign, and unworthy bishops were appointed.

We have devoted a separate article to the examination of the faith and discipline of the Anglo-Saxon Church.

Norman Period 1066–1216. — The Norman Conquest could not fail to exercise vast influence upon the Church. The Saxon bishops were, for the most part, strenuous supporters of Harold. The power which they wielded over their countrymen made it expedient for William to oust them from their sees and put Norman prelates in their stead. The abuses which had crept in during the long struggles between Saxons, Danes, and Normans gave him a colourable pretext for so high-handed a proceeding. Stigand, the Archbishop of Canterbury, was excommunicated by Pope Alexander II., and was afterwards deprived of his see by the papal legate. It must, however, be acknowledged that the Norman bishops were men of virtue and learning. Lanfranc, St. Osmund, and especially St. Anselm, re-established ecclesiastical discipline and boldly upheld the rights of the Church against the tyranny of their own Norman sovereigns. Although, as we have seen, during the Saxon period the English Church was in communion with and subject to Rome, yet the semi-barbarism and isolation of the country told upon its communications with the rest of Christendom. One of the most important consequences of the Conquest was the establishment of closer connection between England and the Continent. The Norman kings held possessions on both sides of the Channel; their subjects passed freely to and fro from the mainland to the island. Hence we are not surprised to find that the power of the Popes manifested itself more during the early years of the Conquest than during the later years of the Saxon rule. Appeals and pilgrimages to Rome became more frequent, and papal legates visited the country armed with extraordinary powers. A separation was made between ecclesiastical and civil courts, and the canon law was recognised. But these various changes of personnel and procedure serve only to bring out the identity between the Saxon and Norman Churches. William and Harold belonged to the same religion: the expelled Saxon bishops differed in no way concerning doctrine from their Norman successors.

But while the Conquest strengthened the position of the Church and brought her into closer union with Rome, it also introduced the elements of strife between the civil and ecclesiastical powers. Under the Saxon kings the extensive lands belonging to the Church had been held by alodial title or in frankalmoign (free alms). According to the feudal system all lands were held of the king by military tenure, and the holders were his vassals. Hence William insisted that all bishops and abbots should go through the ceremony of investiture (see that art.) just like any other barons, and should be subject to the same exactions. Thus bishoprics and abbeys were purposely kept vacant for years together, during which time the king claimed, on the analogy of a lay fief, to receive all the profits for his own use; and when at length a successor was nominated to the vacant benefice, a fine was demanded equivalent at least to the relief which would have been payable by a lay heir. Some account of the history of the struggle will be found in the art. on Investiture. Henry II. was dissatisfied with the compromise accepted by his grandfather, and sought to establish the complete supremacy of the State over the Church. By the Constitutions of Clarendon the ecclesiastical tribunals, established by the Conqueror in accordance with the principles of the Canon Law, were shorn of almost all their authority; ecclesiastical penalties were not to be inflicted without the king's consent; elections to bishoprics and abbacies were to take place in obedience to the king's writ, and the incumbent elect was to do homage to the king before consecration; the chief clergy should be on a footing with the barons as to feudal duties; no ecclesiastic should quit the realm without the royal licence; and no appeals should proceed further than the archbishop's court without the king's consent. The Church found a worthy champion in Thomas à Becket. His death secured the downfall of Henry's system.

The reign of John is a most important one in the history of the English Church. Here we find clergy and people banded together to secure their freedom from the royal tyranny. In a disputed election to the see of Canterbury, Innocent III. set aside both the candidates of the king and the chapter, and nominated Stephen Langton, who was already a cardinal. No better choice could have been made. Langton was a man of great learning and ability; a worthy successor to Lanfranc, Anselm, and Becket. The king refused to allow him to land. Innocent laid the kingdom under an interdict (1208) [see INTERDICT], and afterwards excommunicated John. The struggle lasted till 1213, when the king submitted to Pandulf, the papal legate, and did homage to him as his liege lord. It is no part of our business to tell the story of the great Charter. We should note, however, that the first signatory is Stephen, "Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church"; that another is Pandulf, "sub-deacon and servant of the Lord Pope"; that the first article declares that the English Church should be free, and that this freedom has been "confirmed by the Lord Pope, Innocent III."

The Medieval Period 1216–1531.—The signing of the Magna Charta is the beginning of the history of the English people. Henceforth the names Saxon, Dane, and Norman fell into disuse; men called themselves, and spoke, English. We have already described the faith and practices of the earlier periods. We have now to inquire what was the religion of Simon de Montfort, Edward III., and Henry V., names bound up with the glories of English freedom and English valour. The church of old England was in full communion with the rest of the Catholic Church, identical with it in faith and in worship, and subject to the See of Rome. Every archbishop of Canterbury acknowledged the Pope's supremacy, and received in return the pallium which was the sign of his authority and the pledge of his submission. This fact clearly shows that the faith of the English church was the same as that of Rome. The great medieval Council, the Fourth Lateran, which is looked upon by Protestants as setting the seal on "Roman abuses," was held in the same year as the signing of Magna Charta (1215), and the English ambassador was present. The English church was therefore committed to all its enactments concerning transubstantiation, confession, indulgences, and the primacy of the Pope, and the condemnation of the Albigenses and Waldenses. We have not space to describe at any length the faith and devotions of this period. Two admirable works by Father Bridgett, "The History of the Blessed Sacrament in Great Britain" and "The Dowry of Mary," prove most convincingly that in the days of Merrie England the people were thoroughly Catholic. They went to Mass, to confession, and to Holy Communion. They were especially devout to our Lady. The Rosary was in common use; the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception was taught at Oxford, and it was from England that the feast spread through Europe. The shrine of Our Lady of Walsingham was famous throughout Christendom. "Among the royal pilgrims we hear of Henry III. in 1241, Edward I. in 1280, and again in 1296; Edward II. in 1315; Edward III. in 1361; David Bruce in 1364: Henry VI. in 1455; Edward IV. in 1469; Henry VII., with the young prince, afterwards Henry VIII., in 1505; Henry VIII., in company with Catherine of Arragon, in 1510" ("Dowry of Mary," p. 305). The usual form of will was: "I bequeath my soul to Almighty God, our Blessed Lady, St. Mary Virgin, and to all the company of heaven." Everyone who had it in his power left money for Masses for the repose of his soul. Thus Henry V., the hero of Agincourt, provided that three Masses should be said for him every day while the world lasted. One of these at least was always to be a Mass of the Blessed Virgin, on Sunday of the Assumption, on Monday of the Annunciation, on Tuesday of the Nativity, on Wednesday of the Conception, and so on. The liturgy used by the clergy was much the same as that used in Rome (see infra, Liturgies). All the great orders of the Church, both of men and of women, flourished in England (see Benedictines, Carthusians, Cistercians, Premonstratensians, &c.). The mendicant friars made their way into England soon after their foundation. St. Dominic himself preached in the city of London. The names Greyfriars (Franciscans), Blackfriars (Dominicans), Whitefriars (Carmelites), Crutchedfriars, Austinfriars (Augustinians), besides Charterhouse (Carthusian monks), still testify to the various convents of these orders in London. During the reign of Edward III. Oxford became more famous even than Paris as a school of theology. St. Edmund of Canterbury (d. 1242) had introduced there the study of Aristotle, and his most famous pupil was Roger Bacon, a Franciscan (d. 1292). The university also claimed as her children Richard Middleton, William Ware, William de la Marre, Duns Scotus, Occam, Grosteste, Adam Marsh, Bungay, Burley, Archbishop Peckham, Bradwardine, Fitzralph, archbishop of Armagh, and Thomas Netter (Waldensis).

It is usual to appeal to Acts passed under Edward I. and Edward III. and to the history of Wyclif as proofs of the anti-papal character of the Church of old England. We shall deal with these in separate articles, but we may remark in passing that the way in which the Lollard heresy was condemned shows how Catholic the mass of the people were. The statutes of Mortmain and Provisors deal with difficulties likely to arise between the Pope and Catholic sovereigns. A Protestant king would treat the Church in far more summary fashion. This is how Edward III. addresses Clement IV.: "Our most holy Father in Christ, and Lord, the Pope by Divine Providence, Chief Bishop of the Holy Roman and Catholic Church, &c. . . . We desire your Holiness to recollect how obedient our royal family, the clergy, and laity of our kingdom have hitherto been to your see," &c.

The Wars of the Roses wrought great havoc in the church, and threw it more and more under the power of the crown. Still, as late as the reign of Henry VII., there was little to forebode the coming storm. Even the early years of Henry VIII.'s reign seemed favourable to the church. Had Wolsey been a worthy successor of Lanfranc, Anselm, Thomas, and Edmund, the schism might have been averted. Unfortunately, it was he who supported the repudiation of Catherine, and thus paved the way for Henry's violent action against Rome.

The Reformation Period 1531–1563. The separation of England from the communion of the Catholic Church, and the establishment of a national institution, retaining the old titles of the sees, the church lands, the tithes, and portions of the old ecclesiastical discipline, were transactions not easily or suddenly effected They may be regarded as spread over a period of thirty-two years, from 1531, when Henry VIII. first claimed the title of Supreme Head of the Church, to 1563, when the adoption of the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion by the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, at the very time when a general council was sitting at Trent, consummated the schism, and launched the Anglican church on an independent course.

In 1530 the bishops, with Archbishop Warham at their head, were in full communion with Rome; clergy and laity alike acknowledged that when a religious question arose the ultimate appeal lay to the chair of Peter; and the Christianity of an Englishman was the same as that of a Frenchman or a Spaniard. But there was a body of sectaries scattered through the country, the Lollards, fanatically attached to subversive ideas, assisted by the numerous abuses which great wealth had brought into the Church, and promising a "pure Gospel" to their followers, like the Cathari of the middle ages. As the Vandals found allies in the Donatists, so any enemy who might attack Catholicism in England was sure of the enthusiastic support of the Lollards. Wolsey died in 1530; and Thomas Cromwell then gave the king the famous advice to follow the example of Gustavus Vasa—who had carried through a religious revolution in Sweden—and by a breach with Rome bring the clergy into a state of unconditional submission to himself. Two objects which he ardently desired might thus, Henry saw, be compassed—one, a divorce from his wife; the other, the replenishment of his treasury from the wealth of the Church.

The first step was taken in 1531, when the Attorney-General filed a bill against the whole body of the clergy as having been the "fautors and abettors" of Wolsey in breaking the Act of Premunire. [See Premunire.] The Convocation voted a large grant of money to the king, imagining that nothing more was required of them; but Henry refused to receive it unless words were inserted in the preamble to the grant, importing that he was the "protector and only supreme head of the Church and clergy of England." The consternation of the clergy was great; they debated the matter, and finally consented to go to the utmost verge of lawful compromise. They recognised the king as the "chief protector, the only and supreme lord, and, as far as the law of Christ will allow, the supreme head," of the English Church and clergy. The saving clause preserved the concession from being heretical, but it was evidently perilous; for the king might, and in fact did, employ the remaining words for his own purposes, and omit the saving clause.

Archbishop Warham died in 1532, and by the appointment of Cranmer as his successor Henry secured a pliant instrument in the prosecution of his designs against the Church. The Pope consented to the appointment and expedited the usual bulls; under the authority of these Cranmer was consecrated, and took in public the oath of canonical obedience to the Pope, having previously made a private protest before witnesses that his oath should not prejudice the "rights of the king," nor his own co-operation with him in "reforming" the Church of England. Events now moved rapidly. Cranmer declared the king divorced from Catherine (1533), and Acts of Parliament were passed (1534) abolishing all appeals to Rome, making the "King in Chancery" the final court of appeal in ecclesiastical causes, and recognising him as the supreme head of the English Church. By a clause in the Act of Supremacy a new oath was imposed on the bishops, by which they were required to recognise, without any saving clause, the supremacy of the king, and to abjure that of the Pope. All the influence of the new primate was employed in getting the bishops to take this oath; still it remains matter for amazement that they were found so pliable that all, with one exception, did so. That exception was Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, who for the crime of refusing to the king his title of supreme head of the church, was thrown into prison and after a time beheaded (1535). A few days afterwards Sir Thomas More suffered death for the like offence.

The English church was now in a state of schism, being separated from the see of Peter, through union with which it had been for nine hundred years in communion with the Church universal. But no other change was made, and by the statute of the Six Articles (1539) Henry strove to repress the rising tide of heterodox innovation. The dissolution of the monasteries (see SUPPRESSION OF MONASTERIES) gave great power and wealth to the reforming party. In the next reign, that of Edward VI., the Protestant party obtained the reins of power. First one Prayer Book (1549), and then another (1552)—the second diverging considerably more from Catholic doctrine than the first—were substituted for the Missal and Breviary. In these changes, Cranmer and his associates, several of whom were foreigners, were unceasingly active. The bishops generally—such is usually the lot of time-servers—found that if they were expected to give up Rome in the last reign, they had to give up a great deal more in this, even fundamental doctrines of the Catholic faith. Several, as Gardiner, Tonstall, Day, Heath, and Veysey, resisted, with more or less of consistency, the novelties which the primate and council were continually foisting upon them, and were deprived of their sees. The majority, it is to be feared, acquiesced in all the iniquities and follies of the reign, even in that monstrous injunction of the council (1552) requiring them to remove the altars from all parish churches in their dioceses. A formulary of faith, in forty-two articles, was drawn up by Cranmer and Ridley, but too short a time before the death of Edward to allow of its being either embodied in a statute or assented to by Convocation.

In the reign of Mary, all the religious changes that had been made under Edward VI. were, so far as possible, undone, and the old state of things restored. Cardinal Pole was made archbishop of Canterbury, the authority of Rome was recognised, and the nation reconciled to the Holy See. Everyone knows with how great severity Mary's government proceeded against the Protestants, Cranmer, Ridley, Latimer and many others being burnt, and hundreds forced to flee for their lives into foreign countries.

At the accession of Elizabeth the bishops, and the higher clergy generally, were staunch Catholics. But it was Elizabeth's evident interest as the daughter of Ann Boleyn—whose marriage with her father two Popes had declared to be null and void—to renounce the authority of Rome and throw herself into the arms of the Protestant party. Counsellors and ministers of great ability and determination were soon by her side, ready to confirm her in this course, and to point out the best means for effecting it. Pole was dead; Heath, archbishop of York, held the seals as chancellor; they were immediately taken from him, and given to Nicholas Bacon, a Protestant. Elizabeth made it known at once that she did not believe in transubstantiation, by forbidding the Bishop of Carlisle to elevate the host when saying Mass before her in her private chapel. Seeing this, Archbishop Heath, upon whom the office fell, as Canterbury was vacant, refused to take a part in her coronation; Oglethorp, of Carlisle, alone among the bishops, was found sufficiently complying. Parliament met early in 1559, and in the course of the session two important Acts, those of Supremacy and Uniformity, were passed. In the first the queen was styled, not "supreme head" of the Church, but "supreme governor, as well in all spiritual or ecclesiastical things or causes as temporal." Practically, these words had the effect of severing England from the Holy See, and throwing her into schism, just as effectually as the earlier form. By the Act of Uniformity, the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. was restored, and its use made compulsory, some slight alterations being introduced, the object of which was to make acquiescence less difficult for those who leaned to the Catholic doctrine.[1]

The English laity, as represented by Parliament, had now adopted the Protestant religion; it remained to see what the bishops and clergy would do. The bishops, all but one, stood firm. Only Kitchen, of Llandaff, could be induced to take the oath imposed by the new Act of Supremacy. Had the inferior clergy shown a similar spirit, it is possible that the plans of the Court would have failed; for it was notorious that the elections had been grossly tampered with by the agents of the Government, and that the general feeling in the country was far less favourable to Protestantism than the easy passing of the Act of Uniformity appeared to indicate. But although a large number, perhaps about half, of the cathedral clergy, archdeacons, and heads of colleges at the universities, followed the lead of the bishops, and refused the oath, yet the other half, driven on by interest, fear, or conviction, to unsay those pledges of fidelity to Rome which they had solemnly given, with the mouth if not with the heart, in the reign of Mary, consented to abjure the Pope, and adopt the Erastian principle that the sovereign of a country should have the supreme control of its religion. This being so, the Government feared not to eject the recusants at once, for they knew that among the men of university training whose Protestant sentiments had made them exiles under Mary, they would find numbers more or less qualified in point of character and learning to take the vacant posts, and eager to obey the Government in all things.

But it was necessary to find a working head for the new Church, and after some time Matthew Parker was pitched upon, and consecrated archbishop of Canterbury, at Lambeth, according to the ordinal of Edward VI., in December 1559. [Anglican Orders.] Parker had been a Catholic priest, and the head of a college at Cambridge; nevertheless, in violation of his canonical obligations, he had married a wife; and the irregularity thus incurred obliged him to remain in hiding during the reign of Mary. All the bishops who refused the oath were deposed. Three of their number (the bishops of St. Asaph, Chester, and Worcester) escaped to the Continent; the first-named, Thomas Goldwell, took part in the later sittings of the Council of Trent. Men were soon found to accept the temporalities of the vacant sees, with all the conditions attached to them by the State. Thus Grindal was made Bishop of London; Cox, of Ely; Cheney (who, Camden tells us, had been a warm friend and admirer of Luther), of Gloucester; and Jewell, of Salisbury. With equal ease the vacancies in the ranks of the higher clergy and the authorities at the universities were filled up.

To consummate the severance of the new church from Catholic Christendom, it was still necessary to provide it with a distinct symbol. This was done in the Convocation of 1563, which unanimously adopted, on Parker's suggestion, the revised Articles of Edward VI. From forty-two they were reduced to thirty-nine, but the omitted articles referred to

[1] The words of administration in the book of 1549 ("The body of Jesus Christ," &c), which have a Catholic sound, were now prefixed to the Zwinglian form of administration ("Take and eat this in remembrance," &c.), employed in the book of 1552; and so the words have remained ever since.

points of minor importance. Substantially the Creed then adopted, and ever since adhered to by the Anglican church, represents the opinions of Cranmer and Peter Martyr. A useful note in Lingard's History of England (vol. vi., note GG) analyses the divergences of the religious system put forth in the Thirty-nine Articles from Catholic belief. In few words it may be stated that, while the Articles adhere to the ancient doctrine on the Trinity, the Incarnation, and the Redemption of man, they broach novel views on justification (the Lutheran tenet of justification "by faith only" being distinctly adopted), on Purgatory (which they deny), and on the Sacraments (which they reduce from seven to two). They also declare that general councils may not be summoned except by the commandment and will of princes (Article 21); that they may err even on matters of faith (ibid.); that all the patriarchates, both East and West, have erred in matters of faith (Article 19); that the English sovereign (though he or she must not meddle with "the ministering of God's word or of the Sacraments") has supreme authority over all ecclesiastical persons and in all Church causes within his or her dominions (Article 37); and that the Pope has no jurisdiction in England (ibid.)

The necessity of finding a firm support in the Government against the Catholic party, which was still strong down to the accession of James I., seems to have driven the Anglican leaders into the excessive Erastianism exhibited by the Thirty-nine Articles. This, while it gave them strength on the side of the Government, alienated from them large numbers of the more conscientious and consistent Protestants, and more than any other single cause has contributed to that progressive attenuation of the national Church by secessions which at the present day has left her with little more than half the English people within her pale. For an account of the procedure of the Holy See with reference to Elizabeth, see DEPOSITION, BULL OF.

The Persecution Period 1563–1829. The Acts of Uniformity and Supremacy passed at the beginning of Elizabeth's reign caused much consternation among sincere Catholics; nevertheless it is clear that there was a much larger number who were exceedingly unwilling to oppose the Government, and who flattered themselves that if they complied for a while and attended the Protestant service the storm would blow over, and the Mass be restored as before under Mary. Ribadeneira[1] states that in the first years of Elizabeth the Catholics in great numbers frequented the parish churches, thinking it sufficient if they did not enter or leave them in company with Protestants! But this was stopped as soon as the matter was referred to a committee of theologians (one of whom was Laynez) at the Council of Trent, whose unanimous decision was that such attendance at Protestant worship was sinful. The oath of supremacy, not being generally tendered even to the clergy, and not at all to the laity unless they wished to hold office under the Crown, did not at first cause much difficulty. But the lawfulness of the oath was warmly discussed, and its essential repugnance to Scripture and tradition demonstrated, in writings which soon began to issue in swarms from the presses of Flanders, where Catholic exiles found a secure refuge. The Government of Elizabeth found a legislative, if not a theological, answer ready in reply to the Catholic pamphleteers. In 1563 a law was passed by the obsequious Parliament making the second refusal of the oath of supremacy an act of high treason, punishable with death. The Emperor Ferdinand, in whose dominions at that time Protestants received a full toleration, wrote to Elizabeth, appealing for more indulgence towards the English Catholics, and asking that they might have one church in every considerable town in which to celebrate their worship. This, Elizabeth, whose imperious humour would not brook that any of her subjects should have a different religion from herself, flatly refused.

The other persecuting Acts of this reign, or the chief of them, were as follows:—

1. Statute of 1571. In the preamble, offences against the Act of 1563, and the late insurrection in the North, are named as circumstances calling for fresh legislation. It is enacted that if any persons procure or use bulls for reconciling persons to the "usurped authority" of the see of Rome, or if any should "obtain or get from the said Bishop of Rome or any of his successors . . . any manner of bull, writing, or instrument, written or printed, containing any thing, matter, or cause whatsoever . . . then all and every such act . . . shall be deemed to be high treason; and the offender and offenders therein," on conviction, "shall suffer pain of death, and also lose and forfeit all their lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods, and chattels." After the passing of this Act, any man who might get a dispensation from Rome to marry his first cousin did so at the risk of being reduced to beggary and hanged! We have given the very words of the statute, stripping them of technicalities, because even now it is a common belief with Protestants that the Catholic martyrs under Elizabeth died for treason, not for religion. If the Government could justly make into a treason the profession of what had been the religion of the country for nine hundred years, then the Catholics were traitors, but not otherwise. Treason meant, under the old English law,[1] compassing the sovereign's death, or levying war within the realm, or joining his foreign enemies,[2] and must be proved by some overt act. What resemblance is there between any of these offences and such acts as the refusal to swear that the Queen is supreme head of the Church, or persuading a person to become a Catholic, or being absolved by a priest and reconciled to the Church? These acts did not change their nature by being called "treasons"; the only difference was, that after the passing of the Elizabethan statutes the blood of the Catholics could be shed under colour of law, instead of openly and avowedly for "cause of religion."

2. Statute of 1581. Any act of persuasion to the Romish religion was declared by this statute to be high treason, and punishable as such. Anyone, after the end of the session, who should be willingly absolved by, and promise obedience to, "the said pretended authority," being taken, tried, and convicted, was to "suffer and forfeit as in cases of high treason." By another clause, any person saying Mass was to forfeit two hundred marks and be imprisoned for a year; anyone hearing Mass was to forfeit one hundred marks, and also undergo a year's imprisonment.

3. Statute of 1585. This Act ordered all Jesuits, seminary priests, and other priests to quit the kingdom within forty days after the end of the session; if any such should be found after that date, they were to be adjudged traitors, and suffer as in case of high treason. Any person sheltering or aiding such Jesuit, &c., was to be "adjudged a felon without benefit of clergy, and suffer death."

4. Statute of 1587: for the speedier execution of the Act of 1581. It made void all dealings with property, subsequent to 1558, by persons who had not attended, or should not attend, the Anglican service, and declared such property forfeit to the Crown. Everyone who had been convicted of not going to church was to pay a fine calculated at the rate of 20*l.* per month since the date of such conviction.

5. Statute of 1593: against "Popish recusants." Such were "to repair to their own homes, and not to travel five miles therefrom; if they had not goods to satisfy the monthly fine of 20*l.* for non-attendance at church, they were to abjure the realm: and if they refused to do so, they were to suffer as felons."[1]

These laws were not intended to be a brutum fulmen; they were skilfully designed with a view to terrify the English people into embracing the royal religion, and to kill and reduce to beggary those who preferred the religion of their fathers. Being vigorously executed, they accomplished to a great extent the ends proposed; and if a Catholic remnant still survived at the end of the reign, and the estates of many Catholics still remained to them, this was not because the laws were deficient, but because common humanity and English good-nature induced many who had conformed themselves, to screen their less complying friends, so far as they could, from a persecution which they felt to be iniquitous. Under these laws the following persons lost their lives in the reign of Elizabeth:—

besides thirty-two Franciscans said by

[2] "No layman was brought to the bar or to the block under its provisions" (those of the Act of 1581); Green's Short History of the English People. Possibly not; but Mr. Green should have added that under other Acts of the same class fifty-eight laymen were put to death for religion.

Mr. Law to have been starved to death in prison in 1583.[1] The names of many others are recorded as having "died in prison," slowly sinking under the effects of the noisesomeness and filth of the horrible bastilles of those days. In the above list there is one layman who died under the torture. No statesman ever made a more systematic use of torture to extort the confessions which he wanted than the sanctimonious Burleigh. Under his direction Topcliffe, the pursuivant, put the noble Robert Southwell ten times to the torture, to make him confess in whose houses he had been staying; but not a syllable could be extracted from him. "The rack," says Mr. Hallam, "seldom stood idle in the Tower for all the latter part of Elizabeth's reign."[2]

The Holy See regarded with sorrow and alarm the sufferings of the English Catholics, and the rapid progress of the schism. It is commonly said that Paul IV. spoke roughly to Sir E. Carne when he announced to him Elizabeth's accession, but at last declared that if she would place herself in his hands he would do what he could to serve her. This story appears to rest only on the authority of Sarpi, the historian of the Council of Trent. It is certain that in May 1560 Pius IV. made friendly overtures to her; for we have the text of a letter of that date,[3] announcing, in courteous and even affectionate terms, that the Pope was sending to her Vincenzo Parpalia, whom she knew personally, to confer with her; that he earnestly desired to accord to her whatever she might wish for the confirmation of her princely dignity; and that nothing could express the joy of himself and of the fathers about to attend the Council (of Trent) were they to hear of her returning into the bosom of the Church.[4] Parpalia was not allowed to come into England, and the work of anti-Catholic legislation went on. Remonstrance and admonition having proved useless, the Holy See resolved, while there was yet time, before a generation educated in Protestant schools had grown up, to employ against Elizabeth the censures of the Church. Pope Pius V. published a bull for this purpose in 1570 [DEPOSITION, BULL OF]. It failed of its effect; and the efforts made by Sixtus V., in 1587 and 1588, to dethrone her by means of the fleets and armies of Philip II., and terminate the miseries of the Catholics, similarly miscarried. Nothing remained but to console and sustain the recusants as much as possible under the persecution, and hope for better times under a new sovereign. In July 1600, Clement VIII. wrote to the nuncio in Flanders that he was very anxious on the subject of the English succession, and instructed him, as soon as the "misera femina" was dead, to write to the English Catholics, urging them to postpone every other consideration to the one paramount object of having a king who would, if not protect, at least leave free the Catholic religion.

The effect of the laws described above, executed with cold, ruthless, stealthy tenacity by very able administrators, who were zealously aided by the Anglican clergy, was to reduce the profession of Catholicism, in the last years of the reign, to a minimum. No cruel stratagem, no conscience-rending device, was spared; husbands were made responsible for the conformity of their wives, wives for that of their husbands; accumulated fines for non-attendance at church held up before fathers the prospect of ruin and social descent for their sons, for whom yet they could scarcely by any sacrifice obtain a Catholic education; the ancient universities were perverted; the ancient schools were perverted; the town populace, long since won over by the coarse satires of the Lollards, was everywhere against Catholics; the circumstances of the time made it easy to fix on them the brand of disloyalty. If anyone wishes to understand their unhappy condition in detail, let him read the report of Father Holtby, in 1594, to Garnet the Provincial, published in the third volume of Dodd (ed. Tierney). It is commonly estimated that at the end of the reign about half the population were still Catholics; but this can only be understood of secret inclinations, if, even so limited, it be true; those who actually practised their religion must have borne a much smaller proportion than this to the mass of the population.

The time came when she who, for the security of her crown, had shed so much blood, broken so many hearts, ruined so many lives, had to depart out of this world. "Heaven was just," says the Catholic historian, "in making her inconsolable who had been the author of so much grief to others."[1] She fell into a settled melancholy; would sit silent in her chair for days and nights together; and when urged by the Lord Admiral to go to her bed, told him that if he had seen what she saw there, he would not ask her. "She became tedious to herself, and troublesome to all about her."[2] While she was in this state the Archbishop of Canterbury and other prelates called to see her, at which she was very angry, "bidding them be packing, saying she was no atheist, but knew full well that they were hedge priests, and took it for an indignity that they should speak to her."[3] Such—assuming that the words are correctly reported—was her final estimate of those "Anglican orders" which she had done so much to establish. In this state of mind she died.

Aware that James I. had carried on the government of Scotland in a tolerant spirit, and not foreseeing what an insurmountable attraction the theory of "headship of the Church" would have for a learned fool, and how it would work on a despotic temper, the English Catholics hailed with joy his accession to the throne. But in the following year (1604) was passed an Act "for the due execution of the statutes against Jesuits, seminary priests, and other priests." It was enacted that two-thirds of a Catholic landowner's real estate might be seized to meet the fine of 20*l.* per month for not attending church, if the money was not paid. Under Elizabeth many Catholics, without much molestation, had provided for the education of their children abroad. That scanty liberty was cut off by this statute, which fined anyone sending a child abroad for education "in Popery," for each offence 100*l.*, and made the person so sent incapable of inheriting or enjoying any property, real or personal, unless he conformed to the Established Church. Another clause prohibited the keeping of a school by or in the house of any recusant.[4] The alarmed Catholics, still unwilling to believe that the hopes which they had indulged must be renounced, petitioned the king for the free exercise of their religion in private houses, reminding him how much they had suffered "for your good mother's sake."[1] For answer, James issued a proclamation (September 1604) banishing all the Catholic missionary priests out of the kingdom. This climax of tyranny drove some of the Catholics to desperation; they began to conspire, and the Gunpowder Plot (1605) was the result. Nothing can be fairer than what Bellarmine writes on this subject: "I excuse not the deed; I hate murders; I detest conspiracies; but no one can deny that men were driven to despair. For the Catholics hoped . . . . that under a new prince, who had always been noted for clemency, and whose accession they had cordially welcomed, they would draw breath again after so long a persecution, and be free to retain that faith and religion which the king's own mother and all his ancestors had piously practised. But when they saw that the cruel edicts of Queen Elizabeth were confirmed, that crushing fines were imposed on those refusing to frequent heretical places of worship, and that under colour of accusations for breaches of the law they were being gradually despoiled of all their property, some among them, who could not put up with their wrongs, driven to despair, framed that plot which we and you alike deplore."[2]

Soon after the Gunpowder Plot, James, with the assistance of Bancroft and Christopher Perkins, a renegade Jesuit, framed a new oath of allegiance for Catholics, the object of which was to divide them—to extract as much disloyalty to the Holy See from those who took it as was compatible with not absolutely withdrawing their obedience—and to mitigate the foreign outcry against the persecution in England. To understand what followed, it is necessary to describe the measures which had already been taken to give English Catholics a new organisation. While the hope was not yet extinct that the nation might be restored to Catholicism, and some of the old bishops deposed by Elizabeth were still alive, questions of government and jurisdiction remained more or less in suspense. When, however, after the foundation of a seminary college at Douay[1] by Allen, an ex-canon of York, in 1568, followed by a similar foundation at Rome in 1579, English priests came over into England in considerable numbers, and Jesuits and Franciscans hastened to the post of peril, questions of jurisdiction and administration could not but emerge. In 1597 Father Parsons drew up a petition to the Holy See requesting that two English bishops might be appointed, one to reside in England, the other in Flanders; this last being ready to take the place of his English brother, should he fall into the hands of the persecutors. The petition also recommended that the bishop in England should be assisted by seven or eight ecclesiastics of higher rank—archpriests or archdeacons.[2] It was not thought prudent at Rome to do all that the petition recommended; but to provide a head for the struggling mission, Cardinal Cajetan (1598), the protector of the English nation, appointed George Blackwell archpriest, with a council of twelve consultors, of whom six were nominated by the Cardinal, six were to be selected by Blackwell himself.

In 1606 the king caused an "Act for the better discovering and repressing of popish recusants" to be passed, which contained the new oath of allegiance above mentioned. The Catholic was no longer required to swear that the king was the supreme spiritual authority in England. "He was to declare that James was lawful king, and that the Pope had no kind of authority to depose him, or to authorise others to depose him, or to release his subjects from their allegiance. The person thus swearing was moreover to declare that he would support the king, notwithstanding any excommunication or deprivation. . . . He was to add: 'And I do further swear that I do from my heart abhor, detest, and abjure as impious and heretical this damnable doctrine and position, that princes which be excommunicated by the Pope may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or any other whatsoever.'"[3] The theory underlying this oath evidently was, that the right of a king to his throne was original and jure divino, and that no power on earth, whether emanating from his own subjects or from any other source, could lawfully depose him. In times when a high doctrine of royal prerogative was generally accepted, such an oath, it was thought, would be particularly ensnaring to Catholics; and so it proved. The archpriest Blackwell published an opinion favourable to it, and advised that it be taken. Cardinal Bellarmine, who had been a fellow-student with him, wrote a letter gently remonstrating against the course he was taking, and reminding him how inconsistent it was with the teaching which they had received. James, with the help of Bishop Andrewes, then published an "Apology for the Oath of Allegiance," which Bellarmine met with a "Responsio" (1610), under the feigned name of Matthias Tortus. In this masterly treatise the Cardinal shows that for a Catholic to swear that he would continue to obey the king in spite of any sentence of excommunication by the Pope was as much as to say that the Pope was not the head of the Church, had no power of binding and loosing given him by Christ, and could do nothing against a heretic king. It was equivalent to saying that the duty of a man to his king was antecedent to, and of higher obligation than, his duty to God and the Pope His vicar. But this touched faith, and was not a matter of civil allegiance merely, as the king and his Anglican advisers laboured to prove.[1] The Pope (Paul V.) wrote a brief to the English Catholics in 1606, and another in 1607, warning them against taking the oath; and after some time the general body of English Catholics carefully refrained from doing so. But not only did a contumacious minority accept or at least defend it, but it cannot be doubted that a large number of waverers, thinking or pretending to think that continued adhesion to their religion was inconsistent with their civil duty, took this occasion of conforming to the Establishment. The steady continuance of sanguinary repression of course contributed to this result. According to the list in Dodd[2] twenty-four Catholics were executed for religion under James I., but Mr. Law[3] gives the names of twenty-seven, of whom eight were laymen. These executions were scattered pretty evenly over the years of James's reign. The king's resolution to seek a wife for the Prince of Wales among the Catholic royal families of Europe, not the Protestant, inspired new hopes at Rome, as we learn from a touching letter addressed to him by Urban VIII. on October 2, 1623.[1]

The hopes created by James's matrimonial projects were not entirely defeated. Though the Spanish match fell through, a marriage was arranged with Henrietta Maria, daughter of Henri Quatre and sister of Louis XIII., the Pope granting a dispensation in consideration of articles in the marriage treaty promising a free exercise of their religion for Henrietta and her attendants, and some relaxation of the penal laws for the English Catholics. This relaxation, if we regard the reign as a whole, actually took place. It is true that Charles did not carry out the stipulation in favour of the Catholics uniformly; but it must be remembered that he had to deal with a Parliament and a populace which a long course of Protestant teaching and preaching had now inflamed with a superstitious hatred of Catholicism. Whenever Parliament met, they petitioned the king to execute the penal laws more rigorously, and the rejoicings of the mob in London at the news of the failure of the Spanish marriage had shown how strong was the popular prejudice. Charles could not openly defy this mass of popular sentiment; we read accordingly of proclamations issued by him ordering priests to quit the kingdom, parents to recall their children from foreign schools, &c., and in two cases (1628) the blood of Catholics was shed.[2] But after the dissolution of 1629 the penal laws gradually almost ceased to be executed; no one was put to death for many years; the celebration of Mass was little impeded; even the fines for recusancy, unless the king's wants were urgent, were languidly exacted.[3] Still, seventy years of severance from Rome had effectually done their work: the nation was now Protestant. Panzani, a secret agent sent by Urban VIII. to England in 1635, reported that the Catholics in the kingdom were about 150,000 in number.[4] Among these doubtless a much larger proportion were persons of property and standing than was the case in the general population. Numerous conversions added to their strength about this time. Panzani declares in the Report just quoted that "while he was in London, almost all the nobility who died, though reputed Protestants, died Catholics." Goodman, the Anglican bishop of Gloucester, died a Roman Catholic. Secretary Cottington, Secretary Windebank, Crashaw the poet, Sir George Calvert the coloniser of Maryland, Sir Toby Matthews the diplomatist, Abraham Woodhead, one of the Oxford proctors, Cressy, a canon of Windsor, with many others, submitted to the Church before the middle of the century.[1] It was to these conversions that Milton, whose religious sympathies were Puritan, referred in his "Lycidas" (1637):

> "Besides what the grim wolf, with privy paw, > Daily devours apace, and nothing said."

The Catholics began, even in London, to go openly to Mass; schemes of reunion were in the air;[2] Laud's ritual innovations, and the measures of harsh repression taken in the High Commission Court against the Puritans, all seemed to point one way.

In the civil war between the king and the Parliament, which soon broke out, the English Catholics, to a man, took the king's side. This has been spoken of sometimes in their honour, sometimes to their dispraise; but, in fact, they had no alternative. It was no preference for an absolute compared with a constitutional monarchy which led the descendants of the men who forced reforms from John and the first Edward, now to rally to the royal standard; but a simple political necessity. They could expect some justice from the king; they could expect none from the Parliament. The popular party under Charles I., and the country party in the next reign, reserved all their indignation against intolerance for Protestant persecution of Protestants; Protestant persecution of Catholics was in their eyes right and necessary. This is the more remarkable because at this very time the Protestants across the Channel were enjoying full toleration under the Edict of Nantes. It is, however, an indisputable fact, and, besides being proved in many other ways, it is established by a mere reference to the returns of the executions of Catholics during the reign. Between 1625 and 1640, only the two persons already named suffered death; but in the period between the meeting of the Long Parliament in the autumn of 1640 and the death of Cromwell in 1658, the penal laws claimed twenty-four victims. A few of these were executed by royal authority, that authority being put in force in consequence of pressure from the Parliament; but the greater number were hanged at Tyburn, after the king had ceased to govern in London. For the death of the aged Father Southworth, hanged in 1654 solely for his priesthood, Cromwell, who was then at the head of the Government, was responsible. There is therefore nothing surprising in the devotion with which Catholics fought and suffered in the cause of Charles I. Many of them fell in battle: e.g. Robert Dormer, Earl of Carnarvon, killed at Newbury (1643), and Sir Arthur Aston, who perished in the massacre after the storm of Drogheda (1649). The pages of Dodd record the names, services, and manner of death of many others. It was estimated (though the proportion is probably too high), that out of about five hundred gentlemen who lost their lives for Charles in the civil war, a hundred and ninety-four were Catholics.[1] A finer type of a brave and loyal gentleman, "true as the dial to the sun," than the Marquis of Worcester,[2] lord of Raglan Castle, it would not be easy to produce. When Parliament got the upper hand, the Catholics were treated with great severity: their estates were often confiscated, when their Protestant neighbours were suffered to compound. After the king's execution they ceased to play an active part in public life; nor did they seek to maintain relations with the exiled royal family. Cromwell's government, on the whole, treated them leniently. But, in truth, after the battle of Worcester (1650) all parties were sick of bloodshed, and this feeling protected for some years the Catholic priests, and caused a comparative toleration of their worship.

Reverting to the subject of ecclesiastical organisation, we find that the archpriest Blackwell (who, being thrown into prison after the Gunpowder Plot, had consented to take the new oath of allegiance) was on this account deprived by the Holy See of his office and of all faculties (1608), George Birkhead being appointed to succeed him. Harrison succeeded Birkhead in 1614. Our space does not permit us to do more than glance at the dissensions which troubled the Catholics, arising out of the contention of certain priests that Blackwell's jurisdiction was invalid, and out of differences between seculars and regulars. The necessity for the presence of a bishop in England became more and more manifest, and at length, in 1623, Dr. William Bishop was appointed by Gregory XV. as the first vicar apostolic. He erected a chapter, which exercised some kind of jurisdiction, in the face of considerable doubt and opposition, down to 1695, when a decree of Propaganda appeared, declaring that since the deputation of the four vicars apostolic in 1688, all previously existing jurisdictions had ceased. Dr. Bishop dying in 1624, Dr. Richard Smith succeeded him in the following year, but withdrew into France in 1629, in consequence of a proclamation having been made for his arrest, and never again returned to England. He died in 1655. The Holy See did not deem it prudent to appoint a successor for many years, though strongly urged to do so by Sir Kenelm Digby and others.

Charles II., who, from the time of his enforced residence on the Continent, appears to have been intellectually convinced of the truth of Catholicism, but had not moral courage enough to avow it, was as favourable to the English Catholics all through his life as he dared to be. The Pendrells, honest Catholic yeomen who sheltered him while he was in hiding at Boscobel after the battle of Worcester, were now rewarded with a pension, which their descendants are said to receive to this day. Between 1660 and 1677 not a single Catholic was executed: two Test Acts, however, were passed, requiring that before entering upon any office under the Crown, or taking his seat in Parliament, a man must receive the sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England. The effect of these statutes, joined to the other penal laws, was to make English Catholics mere sojourners in their own land till the passing of the Emancipation Act in 1829. In 1678, through the machinations of Shaftesbury, the frantic popular excitement about a supposed "Popish Plot" arose, and between that year and 1685 the blood of twenty-four victims, all absolutely guiltless of any crime, flowed upon the scaffold. The last of these was Oliver Plunket, the saintly Archbishop of Armagh. Charles II. himself was reconciled to the Church on his deathbed by Father Huddleston.

James II. had become a Catholic, while Duke of York, and his change of religion was generally known about 1673. When he came to the throne in 1685, he was full of zeal for Catholic interests; but it was a zeal little "according to knowledge." Moreover, the scandalous immorality of his private life justly damaged his advocacy; pious Protestants could not be blamed for regarding with distrust the efforts of the married lover of Catherine Sedley[1] to advance the interests of his religion by over-riding the existing laws. It was a time when special caution was necessary, and James proceeded with singular rashness. The Catholics had by this time dwindled fearfully;[2] their political weight in the country was gone; Parliament was more likely to add new penal laws against them than to repeal the old ones; their one hope lay in the favour of the executive. Nor need this hope have been fallacious; for the English, when not alarmed or flurried, are a good-natured and indulgent people; the penal laws were intrinsically unjust; and the exemption of here and there an individual from their stringency by means of the dispensing power, assuming that the individual so exempted had been really fit for posts of public trust, would have led to no commotion. That the dispensing power was really a part of the royal prerogative, as till then understood, and might lawfully be exercised, was decided by eleven out of twelve judges at Sir Edward Hales' trial in 1686, and cannot truthfully be questioned. But James, with that perverse stupidity which was natural to him, proceeded to use his power to dispense with, as if it were equivalent to a power to repeal, the law, and filled the public service with Catholics to an extent far beyond what either their numbers or their qualifications justified. He gave commissions in the army to a number of Catholic officers, and caused Catholic soldiers to be freely enlisted; he ordered four Catholic lords to take their seats in the Privy Council without taking the test required by law; and he actually made Father Petre, one of the worst qualified men in England for such a post, a privy councillor, although the appointment, owing to the strong opposition raised, remained in abeyance.[1] He worried the two universities, especially Oxford, where he forced his candidate, Parker (who had professed himself a Catholic), upon the fellows of Magdalen instead of the President of their choice; made Massey (another Catholic) dean of Christ Church; and induced the old Master of University (Obadiah Walker) to fit up a chapel for Catholic worship within the college precincts. But the most utterly foolish and suicidal act of all was when, borrowing a weapon from the anti-Catholic armoury of Queen Elizabeth, he appointed a court of Ecclesiastical Commission to control the Anglican Church, and by its means suspended the Bishop of London, because he had not taken severe measures against one of his clergy who had preached against the Court! The members of the commission, it is true, were Protestants, with the exception of the crafty Sunderland, a nominal convert, who boasted of having counselled rash courses to the king, the sooner to arouse the Protestant feeling of the country. But they were mere courtiers, and the odium of their acts justly fell on the king, who appeared to be using an ecclesiastical supremacy which his own Church disowned and condemned, in order to vex and weaken the body for whose behoof it was originally claimed. None can wonder that the indignation felt was general and deep.

All this time the Whig leaders were secretly negotiating with William of Orange; an army of fourteen thousand veterans was equipped with all the expedition and secrecy possible; an invasion was determined on; and the landing of the troops was safely effected in Tor Bay in November 1688. The general history of the period shows how the shameless treachery of Churchill and others, and the skilful use of calumnies against the "Papists,"[1] paralysed the resistance on the king's side. Yet nothing can be more clear, on the whole, than this—that it was the solid military strength of the foreign troops who had been landed which enabled the Revolution to succeed. That strength would not have sufficed without those calumnies, and without the king's unpopularity; but these last causes could not have overturned the throne without the presence of the Dutch troops. Macaulay describes with exultation William's entry into Exeter on the 9th of November, at the head, not only of his Dutch regiments, but of mercenary battalions of Swedes, Brandenburghers, Swiss and even negroes, followed by a formidable train of artillery. Against these veterans James's inexperienced troops, though much superior in numbers, would probably have made no effectual stand; and Churchill's desertion may have had more motives than one. As Flamininus proclaimed the liberty of Greece at the Isthmian Games, so William displayed a banner inscribed with "the Liberties of England;" but a thoughtful Englishman reading the narrative might well repeat the verse of Wordsworth—

[2] According to a return quoted by Hallam, the number of Catholics above sixteen soon after the Revolution was only 13,856, which would give under 30,000 for the whole Catholic population. Const. Hist. ch. xv. However, this number, as he adds, "appears incredibly small."

[1] James tried hard to obtain the Cardinal's hat for F. Petre, but this the Pope (Innocent XI.) courteously but firmly declined. Dryden, who was a good judge of men, augured ill from the political elevation of the favourite (Hind and Panther, book iii.)

"Ah! that a conqueror's words should be so dear!"

The Revolution was accomplished; for Catholics, both in England and Ireland, a long period of humiliation began. Nevertheless, from one point of view, the event justified them and confounded their adversaries. There was, then, a "deposing power," after all! Catholics had been tortured and put to death, not for maintaining only, but simply for refusing to deny, that a king who grossly abused his trust might justly be deposed by the sentence of the Pope, as the common father of Christendom. Protestantism had maintained that this was a wicked doctrine: that no power could depose an anointed king; the duty of passive obedience had been solemnly enunciated by the University of Oxford only five years before the Revolution. Now, on a sudden, the king was deposed, and most Protestants were delighted. It appeared, therefore, that there was a lawful "deposing power," but that it resided, not in the Pope, but in any strong political party assisted by a foreign army. The case resembled, in some respects, the struggle of the League with Henri Quatre in the sixteenth century. The Catholic League, helped by the Pope, prevented the unreconciled Henry from reigning peaceably; the Whig party, helped by a Dutch army, prevented the Catholic James from reigning at all. Which of these foreign interventions—the helping power being moral in the first case, material in the second—involved the greater amount of national humiliation, it may be left to the justice of the future to decide.

From 1688 for nearly a hundred years English Catholics were debarred from any share in the public life of the nation and subjected to countless disabilities and indignities. A new batch of penal laws came in with William "the Deliverer." First it was enacted (1689) that Papists and reputed Papists should remove at least ten miles from Westminster. Another statute of the same year ordered that Papists and reputed Papists should be disarmed, and that a horse worth more than 5*l.* belonging to any Papist might be seized. In the Toleration Act (1689) a proviso was inserted, "that neither this Act, nor any clause, article, or thing herein contained, shall extend, or be construed to extend, to give any ease, benefit, or advantage to any papist or popish recusant whatsoever." In the Bill of Rights it was declared that no Papist, nor anyone that married a Papist, should inherit the crown. In a later statute (1699) "for further preventing the growth of Popery," a reward of 100*l.* was offered for information leading to the conviction of a Catholic priest for saying Mass or keeping school, and such priest was to be imprisoned for life. It contained also provisions of which the object was to disinherit Catholic landowners, and transfer their estates to the next of kin being, or becoming, Protestant. The Act of Settlement (1701) confirmed the decision of the former Act, by which the son of James II. had been included in the sentence of deprivation passed against the father, and settled the crown on the Princess Sophia and her issue, being

[1] "Danby," says Macaulay, "acted with rare dexterity." At a general meeting of the gentry and freeholders of the three Ridings which had been summoned to York to address the king on the state of affairs, "the discussion had begun, when a cry was suddenly raised that the Papists were up, and were slaying the Protestants." They were more likely, as Macaulay says, to be trembling for their own safety; but the thing was believed, the populace were gulled, and Yorkshire went for William.—Hist. of Eng. ch. ix.

Protestants. In the Bill of Rights before mentioned a new oath of allegiance was inserted, by which aspirants to public employment were required to deny that any foreign prelate – and therefore, by implication, the Pope—had or ought to have any ecclesiastical or spiritual jurisdiction within the realm. The object being now to exclude English Catholics—not, as it had been under James I., to entrap them—this was the simplest way of attaining the end proposed, since no Catholic could take the oath without abjuring his religion. In violation of the treaty of Limerick (1691) to which William's faith was pledged, the Irish Parliament framed, in the course of this and the next reign, their notorious penal code, with the deliberate object of destroying the nationality, breaking the spirit, and plundering the remaining property, of the Catholic people of Ireland.

A large proportion—perhaps the majority—of the English people regarded William as a usurper; many of the very men who had set him up, in particular Marlborough and Russell, repented of what they had done, and opened secret negotiations with the exiled Court; there were the war in Ireland, the plot of Sir J. Fenwick, James's conciliatory Declaration of 1693, and the war carried on by France from 1691 to 1697. Everything however miscarried—partly through William's sagacity and good fortune, but chiefly owing to the rooted aversion of a community long inured to heresy to come to any terms with Catholicism. As Pope says—

> Hopes after hopes of pious Papists failed,
> While mighty William's thundering arm prevailed.

James died in 1701, and Anne his daughter succeeded in the following year. Her brother, James III., was brought up at the French Court; the chivalrous generosity of Louis XIV. never suffered him to feel that he was a dependent and a helpless exile. If the young man would have consented to embrace the Anglican religion, his accession, upon Anne's death, would have been effected with ease. Curious evidence of this may be seen in Lord Middleton's correspondence with Cardinal Gualterio.[1] For instance, writing in 1712 to complain of a certain coldness and want of sympathy on the part of the Pope (Clement XI.) towards his unfortunate master, Middleton says this is all the harder to bear when the king is surrounded by temptations, and "the English are resorting to every means, in the endeavour to gain him and bring him over to their side; he would have but to comply, in order to be recalled, and to reign peaceably in his three kingdoms." But, he adds, his master's religious faith is too firm and pure to allow him to listen to such overtures for a moment.

As soon as Anne was dead, James made the attempt to regain the throne of his fathers for which he had been long preparing; and the rising of 1715 was the result. But for the incompetency of the leaders, Mar and Forster, opposed as they were by Whig chiefs of great vigour and ability, the enterprise might have succeeded; for the rule of a foreigner who could not speak a word of English was most unacceptable to the great majority of the people. Both after this rising, and the much more serious one of 1745, the scaffold streamed with the blood of Jacobite and Catholic traitors, men who died bravely for hereditary right, and were immolated by the Whigs on the altar of revolution and parliamentary sovereignty.

The elder Chevalier died in 1758; the younger, as time wore on, was said to have fallen into vicious courses. Despairing of ever seeing the ancient line restored, the Catholics of England had begun to cool in their loyalty to the Stuart family, just about the time when the disasters of the later years of the War of Independence had warned the English Government of the expediency of conciliating the proscribed classes in the population of England and Ireland. Sir George Savile's Act of 1778 repealed the worst portions of the statute of 1699; a new oath of allegiance was framed, which it was possible for a Catholic to take without denying his religion; and Catholic noblemen and gentlemen flocked up to Westminster in great numbers to take it. It would ill become us, who are in the enjoyment of full civil rights, to sit in judgment on the conduct of men so severely tried as were the English Catholics of those days. Yet it may be remarked that their abandonment of the Stuart cause, whether justifiable or not, was far from bringing them the advantages which they expected from it. Parliamentary life and public employment were still barred against them by the Test Acts. Fifty years had still to elapse before those barriers were removed by the Act of Emancipation. During all that time the Catholics—at least an educated and influential section of them—were incessantly agitating; they were ready to go to lengths which seem to us ridiculous; to call themselves "Protesting Catholic Dissenters"—give Government a veto on the appointment of bishops—pledge themselves to support the Anglican Establishment—and repudiate the temporal jurisdiction of the Roman Pontiffs in every conceivable form,[1] if only they might be admitted within the pale of the constitution. All was in vain; and it was not till the imminent danger of civil war in Ireland, with a great man like O'Connell leading the Catholics, frightened the English Parliament into new courses, that the Catholic claims were conceded (1829). It is also indubitable that the sight of so many Catholic gentlemen coming up to London to take the oaths excited the slumbering bigotry of the Protestants: Wesley wrote several violent anti-Catholic tracts; the Protestant Association was formed; and the terrible riots of 1780 wrecked in a week—for the London mission at least—the slow and difficult reparations of two hundred years.[2] Moreover—as if some secret link existed in the minds of many Catholics between loyalty to their princes and fidelity to their religion—the abandonment of the Stuarts was followed by the open defection from the faith of several Catholics of high standing, and even of some priests.[3] The death, in 1807, of the last male descendant of James II., Henry, Cardinal of York, appeared to the general public to confer [4] on the fortunate House of Hanover, besides its existing titles of possession and Parliamentary sanction, the title also of hereditary right. During the long Continental war, the Catholic body strenuously supported, with whatever social and political influence was left to it, the king and the aristocracy, in their struggle against the crowned anarchy in France.

Reverting again to the subject of ecclesiastical organisation, we find that, after the long interval of nearly sixty years (1629–1685) during which there was no resident bishop in England, the Holy See, at the request of James II., nominated four bishops of sees in partibus to be vicars apostolic in as many districts into which England was now divided—the London, the Midland, the Northern, and the Western. The first holders of these vicariates were Drs. Leyburn,[1] Gifford, Smith, and Ellis, and the succession was from this time uninterrupted. The saintly bishop Challoner governed the London district, at first as coadjutor, from 1741 to 1781, dying at the age of ninety. The rugged, energetic, noble-hearted Milner, Bishop of Castabala, author of the "End of Controversy" and many other well-known works, was vicar apostolic in the Midland district from 1803 to his death in 1826. The "Rules of the Mission," which put an end to many disputes of old standing, were settled by a bull of Benedict XIV. in 1753.

A new division was made in 1840, when the number of vicariates was raised to eight.

The Second Spring. — Soon after Emancipation (which, as said above, was obtained for English Catholics by the growing political power of their Irish brethren), what is known as the Tractarian movement developed itself within the English Church (1833). The chief leader and most gifted representative of the movement, John Henry Newman, followed by Dr. Ward, Mr. Oakeley, and several hundreds of the clergy and laity of the Establishment, came over to the Catholic Church in or about the year 1845. An Irish immigration during the last forty years has largely increased, in all the large towns, the Catholic element; so that the total Catholic population in England and Wales is believed at the present time to be at least one million and a half. The number of clergy of and above the sacerdotal order, secular and regular, within the same limits, is two thousand five hundred.

In 1850, by an apostolic brief of the late Pope Pius IX., the privilege of being

[2] The number of Catholics was now considerably increased, and "appears, by the returns made in the House of Lords in 1780, to have been [in England and Wales] 69,376." Husenbeth's Life of Bishop Milner, p. 91.

[3] Milner gives the names of nine peers, four baronets, and five priests, with an "&c." after each list. See Suppl. Mem. p. 44, note. He is speaking of the year immediately following 1780.

[4] It did not really do so; for the lines of Savoy and Savoy-Modena, being descended from Charles I., have a better title to the crown on the legitimist principle than the House of Hanover, which traces back to Elizabeth, Charles I.'s sister.

governed by bishops in ordinary, after an intermission of nearly three hundred years, was restored to the English Catholics, to the unspeakable satisfaction of all concerned, though to the consternation of many who were not concerned, who raised an extraordinary hubbub about what they called the Pope's "insolent intrusion." Parliament hastily passed an Act (which, after remaining inoperative for some years, was repealed), prohibiting the new bishops from taking territorial titles. By the Papal brief, the whole kingdom, with Wales, was formed into one province under the new Archbishop of Westminster, Cardinal Wiseman, with twelve suffragan sees: Beverley, Birmingham, Clifton, Hexham, Liverpool, Newport and Menevia, Northampton, Nottingham, Plymouth, Salford, Shrewsbury, and Southwark. In 1878, the diocese of Beverley was divided into two new dioceses, Leeds and Middlesbrough; and in 1882 the new diocese of Portsmouth was formed out of Southwark.

There has been little opportunity for English Catholics since the Reformation to serve their country in civil or military capacities, because they have been usually under the ban of the laws. In literature, the field being comparatively open, many among them have attained to distinction. The names of Pope and Dryden will occur to everyone; besides these may be mentioned Habington, Crashaw, Massinger, Alban Butler, Bishops Challoner and Milner, Cardinal Wiseman, Waterton, &c. &c.

Enough has been said in this article to show how baseless are the claims of the Protestant Church of England to be identical with the Church in England before the Reformation. A body without any teaching authority or unity of belief or worship, cannot rightly be called a Church at all. Low Church, Broad Church, and High Church must first settle which of them is the Church before they can set up the continuity theory. No doubt there is some external likeness between Ritualism and medieval Catholicism. But the great principle of authority is wanting to the Ritualist. It is the chaotic state of Anglicanism which proves most convincingly that it cannot be the same as the old Church. In truth we need no subtle arguments or learned researches to make good our claim. It speaks little for the logical power of Englishmen, that they applaud the anti-Italian, anti-Papal utterances of the Archbishop of Canterbury, whose see was founded by the Italian monk Augustine, at the bidding of the Roman Pope Gregory.

ENGLISH COLLEGE AT ROME. A school and hostel for the use of Englishmen dwelling at or visiting Rome is said by Matthew of Westminster to have been founded by Ina, King of Wessex, in 727. Matthew of Westminster is somewhat a late authority; his statement, therefore, cannot be accepted with confidence. Malmesbury ("Gest. Reg." lib. ii.) asserts that the school was founded by Offa, King of Mercia. On the other hand, Matthew Paris[1] tells us that this same Offa only visited the school, in 791, and found it flourishing; also that he endowed it for all time to come with an annual penny payable by every family in his kingdom. However this may be, we have it on excellent authority[2] that the school of the English nation, "Angelcynnes scolu," was burnt down in 816. Tradition said that it was rebuilt by Egbert, again burnt down in 853, and restored by Ethelwulf, the father of Alfred.[3] In 884, Pope Marinus freed it from all tribute, at the request of Alfred.[4] Nearly three hundred years afterwards, St. Thomas of Canterbury is said to have resided at the hostel and visited the church near it, in the Via di Monserrato, formerly built by Offa in honour of the Holy Trinity.[5] Close to this church, two centuries later, in 1380, "certain Englishmen, being in Rome, procured licence of the Pope to build a hospital."[6] The old school and hostel seem to have disappeared; the church, soon after the martyrdom, had received the name of St. Thomas; it was desecrated by the French Jacobins. Among the founders were two bishops (Braybroke of London and Brampton of Rochester) and some of the principal citizens of London. The hospital was for the use of English travellers or pilgrims; a gentleman was to be lodged, but not fed, for three days; a commoner was to be lodged and fed for eight days; if a pregnant woman was confined there, she was to be kept without charge till after her purification, and then to depart with the child: but if she feared to take the child with her, it was to be maintained till it was seven years old. A considerable endowment must have been provided in order to enable so munificent a charity to be carried out. In 1449, the hospital was rebuilt on an improved plan; to meet the expense a collection was made in every parish in England; but the plan is said to have answered but ill, owing to the great cost of transmitting the money. Under Henry VIII. several persons whom fear of the tyrant had driven from England were relieved in this Roman hospital. When the Catholic bishops were driven from their sees at the accession of Elizabeth, Thomas Goldwell, Bishop of St. Asaph, came to Rome, and was allowed by the Pope to have the use of the hospital, along with several Marian priests and two or three laymen. The same Goldwell soon afterwards sat as one of the fathers of Trent.

A great change now passed over the hospital; it had heretofore served to supply the material wants of the few English who visited Rome: it was now to be remodelled, and serve for the future the spiritual wants of the whole English nation, then fast lapsing into heresy. The generous soul of Gregory XIII., moved with a deep compassion for the state of England, and instigated by Dr. Allen (afterwards Cardinal) and Owen Lewis, Archdeacon of Cambrai, resolved upon the conversion of the hospital into a missionary college. For this purpose (1578) he added plentifully to the old rents, assigning, till other provision should be made, 3,000 crowns annually for the support of the college from the Apostolic Datary, and making Cardinal Morone, the legate whose able diplomacy had done so much for the success of the Council of Trent, its first protector. The bull effecting all this begins Quantam bonitas. The design was that the college should maintain about sixty students, all English, and that these should swear to go on the English mission on the completion of their education as might be directed by their superior. Dr. Maurice Clenock was nominated the first rector, but in about a year[1] the college was made over to the Company of Jesus, who had the charge of it down to the suppression of the society in 1773. The supply of students came at first from the Rheims seminary, afterwards from the Jesuit school of St. Omer. Gregory XIII. enriched the college with many gifts and privileges; Sixtus V. (Peretti), though he favoured its design, found himself compelled by financial difficulties to make a large deduction from the revenue hitherto assigned to it from the Datary; Gregory XIV. raised the grant again, though not to its former level. By 1647 the college could count among its alumni forty priests who had suffered martyrdom in England. Pictures of many of these hung upon the interior walls of the college previous to the havoc and rapine made by the French invaders in 1798. So near to certainty was their chance of winning the palm considered, that when St. Philip Neri the founder of the Oratory met any of the students, he used to salute them with the words, "Salvete, flores martyrum!" ("Hail, ye flowers of the martyrs"). On the disputes and difficulties which commenced in the sixteenth and continued on in the seventeenth century, because some of the students, either for the sake of a more secure subsistence, or in the belief that it could not be wrong to embrace a more perfect way of life, neglected the missionary oath by which they were bound to serve as seculars on the English mission, and joined religious orders, some particulars may be seen in Flanagan, vol. ii. ch. 23. All such proceedings were severely condemned by a brief of Alexander VII. dated in 1660. After the suppression of the Jesuits, and till the French invasion, the college appears to have been managed by seculars. The advent of the Jacobins involved it and most of the other colleges in ruin: and it was only restored in 1818, during the pontificate of Pius VII., who appointed Dr. Robert Gradwell rector Nicholas Wiseman, afterwards Cardinal, was rector under Gregory XVI. (1831–1846), and celebrated the Pope's visit to the college, in 1836, by a charming Latin address, which may be seen inscribed on the walls. The dress of the students is the soutane, the mantellone, or long cloak, of black cloth, and the clerical hat. Among the Cardinal-protectors since the

[1] The cause of Dr. Clenock's removal was an unhappy difference which arose between the Welsh and English students. The latter complained that the rector, a Welshman, showed partiality towards his countrymen, and became insubordinate. Being required to obey or leave Rome, they, to the number of twenty, chose the latter alternative. See Flanagan's Church History, v. l. ii. ch. 12.

EPARCHY (ἐπαρχία). This was the Greek word for provincia. On the transfer of the term to the ecclesiastical organisation, it meant an ecclesiastical province governed by a metropolitan (ἔπαρχος) and containing several bishops' sees. (For this use Suicer, in his "Thesaurus," quotes Macarius of Ancyra.) The Council of Antioch (341) limited the exercise of a bishop's power to his own ἐπαρχία; by which some have understood "diocese;" but it is better to understand it of his ecclesiastical province.

In the Russian schismatical church at the present day a bishop is called an "eparch;" in 1839 there were in Russia forty-six "eparchies" or episcopal sees.

EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF. The Third General Council met at Ephesus in 431, defined the Catholic dogma that the Blessed Virgin is the mother of God, and condemned the contrary error of Nestorius.

1. The Occasion of the Definition.—The Church, which had taught the reality of Christ's human nature in opposition to the Docetæ, expressly defined His true and perfect Godhead when it was denied by the Arians; and at a later date the question as to the way in which these two natures were united began to be agitated. Early Fathers had used different expressions to indicate this union, but they had not investigated, or at least discussed, the point with scientific precision. Ignatius speaks of Christ as "bearing flesh" (σαρκοφόρος);[1] Tertullian describes Him as "clothed with flesh;" very often the early Fathers use the word "mixture" (κρᾶσις, commixtio) of the union between the two natures.[2] No doubt these expressions are meant to express the Catholic doctrine that the two natures of God and Man are united in the one Person of the Word, that the one Christ is both God and Man; but the theological controversies which began in the fourth century made it plain that formal definition on the union of the two natures of Christ was imperatively demanded.

The doctrine of Apollinaris, who taught that the divinity in Christ supplied the place of intellect which is proper to man, amounted to a denial that Christ really was perfect man and to a confusion of the divine with the human nature. In opposition to this false doctrine, great teachers in the school of Antioch, particularly Diodorus of Tarsus, and Theodore, afterwards Bishop of Mopsuestia, fell into error at the opposite extreme. Theodore, who developed the idea of Diodorus and is the great representative of the school, in his anxiety to maintain the perfect manhood of Christ, conceived of Him as a man in whom God the Word dwelt—i.e. he confessed, not that the Word became man (ἐνανθρώπησις), but merely that the Word, who dwells in all good Christians, dwelt in a special way and with extraordinary power in Christ (ἐνοίκησις). True, he distinguishes the indwelling of the Word in Christ from His indwelling in Christians, pointing to Christ's supernatural birth, His sinlessness, and to the fact that, owing to the union between the Word and Christ, the latter participated in the glory of the former; still, far as he may have been, and doubtless was, from intending it, the logical result of his premisses was to reduce Christ to a mere man, differing from others in the degree and not in the kind of His union with God. Further, Theodore, as he did not acknowledge the unity of Person in Christ, was forced to recognise in Him two different and distinct agents. [See COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM.] Catholics say "God suffered," "the man Christ raised the dead," because the one Person of the Word suffered in His human, raised the dead in the might of His divine nature, just as in the case of ordinary men it is the one personal being who reasons with his mind and moves with his body. Here Theodore was at issue with the language of Scripture and the Fathers from the earliest times. St. Peter says (Acts iii. 15) the Jews "killed the prince of life," and one of his earliest successors, Clement of Rome, speaks of "the sufferings of God." In particular, Theodore refused to call the Blessed Virgin Mother of God, although the title had been approved by Origen, Alexander of Alexandria, and Athanasius.[1] Only in a loose sense, he urged, "could Mary be called the Mother of God, viz. because God dwelt in Christ after an extraordinary manner. Properly speaking she bore a man, in whom the union with the Word had begun, but was so far from being perfect that he was not [till his baptism called the Son of God." In another place he writes, "It is madness to say, God was born of the Virgin; not God, but the temple in which God dwelt was born of Mary."

Nestorius was a younger contemporary of and belonged to the school of Theodore. Born in a Syrian town, Germanicia, he came for his secular education to Antioch, entered a monastery there, became afterwards a priest of the cathedral, and made a good reputation by his eloquence and strictness of life. In 428 he was consecrated Bishop of Constantinople. Almost immediately afterwards the strife on the title θεοτόκος began: indeed, Nestorius said he found the strife already kindled when he came to Constantinople. In homilies, fragments of which are preserved, Nestorius defended the doctrine which had been propounded by Theodore, to the great scandal, not only of priests, but of lay people. The orthodox cause was defended in Constantinople itself by the bishops Eusebius of Dorylæum and Proclus of Cyzicum, while Cyril of Alexandria stated the true doctrine in a sermon preached at Easter 429, and wrote twice to Nestorius, conjuring him to recant. Cyril's letters were in vain, and both he and Nestorius referred the case to the Roman bishop. The Pope, Celestine I., called on Nestorius to recant within ten days, and commissioned Cyril to depose him in case of refusal. At a council held in Alexandria Cyril published twelve anathemas against the doctrine of Nestorius. Nestorius answered with twelve anathemas of his own. John of Antioch, Theodoret of Cyrus, and others sided with Nestorius, and to restore peace the Emperor Theodosius II. convoked a council at Ephesus in 431. Pope Celestine wrote to Theodosius on May 15 of that year promising to send legates.

2. The History of the Council.—For some time the bishops who had assembled at Ephesus waited for the arrival of John, Patriarch of Antioch; when, however, there seemed to be no hope of his arrival, the council opened on June 22. There were 160 bishops present, and before the end of the first session this number had increased to 198. The Fathers met in the cathedral dedicated to the Mother of God, and Cyril, who, as the Acts expressly say, represented the Pope, presided. Nestorius refused to appear, on the ground that the council was not complete so long as John of Antioch and his bishops were absent, while a considerable number of bishops from Asia Minor, including Theodoret of Cyrus, refused to take part for the same reason. During the session, which lasted late into the night, letters of Cyril, Nestorius, Celestine, as well as passages of the Fathers confirming the Catholic faith, were read and compared with the utterances of Nestorius, who was at last solemnly deposed by the council. All the bishops subscribed this sentence. The people of the town received the news of the result with great joy. The city was illuminated in many parts, and the bishops were escorted home with torches.

Candidian (who represented the emperor at the council) and Nestorius protested against the proceedings as null and void, because they had taken place before the arrival of the Antiochene bishops. John of Antioch came at last on the 26th or 27th of June, and in a council of forty-three bishops deposed Cyril with Memnon, Bishop of Ephesus, and excommunicated all who agreed with them. On July 10th the second session opened, in presence of the three Papal legates, two of whom, Arcadius and Projectus, were bishops; the third, Philip, a priest. The legates were directed by the Pope to see that his sentence against Nestorius was carried out, and, in case of approval, to confirm the acts of the synod. The Pope's letter was received with acclamation by the council, and the Fathers declared that in their condemnation they had but followed the sentence and rule (ψῆφον καὶ τύπον) of Celestine. In the third session, the legates approved the resolutions passed before their arrival. In the fifth, John of Antioch and his bishops were excommunicated. The Fathers also addressed a letter to Celestine, giving a history of the council and stating their acceptance of the Western decrees against the Pelagians. In the sixth session, the Nicene Creed was read and all new symbols of faith prohibited; in the seventh and last, Cyprus was declared independent of the Antiochene Patriarchate; a circular letter was addressed to the whole Church, and six canons were published. The legates signed the decrees, and they were confirmed next year by Pope Sixtus III. The emperor was at first extremely averse to the proceedings of the Ephesine

Council, and he began by declaring it his will that both Cyril and Nestorius should be deposed. At last, however, he sent deputies to meet the bishops at Chalcedon and examine the matter, and he ended by accepting Cyril's doctrine and allowing him the quiet possession of his see. Nestorius was confined in his old monastery at Antioch, and afterwards banished to Upper Egypt, where he died in 440. It was only gradually that the Syrian bishops made peace with the Egyptian and Western bishops. However, this opposition of the former really arose from personal feeling and misunderstanding rather than from difference of faith; and less than two years after the council, early in 433, peace was restored between Antioch and Alexandria. Some, however, of the Antiochene bishops, particularly Theodoret of Cyrus, continued their opposition longer. The priest Ibas, on the other hand, was heretical as well as schismatic; he was devoted to the doctrine of Nestorius, and his friends, failing to obtain toleration within the Roman empire, emigrated to Persia, where one of them, Barsumas, founded a Nestorian church at Nisibis. The later history of the Nestorians will be found in a separate article.

Two points in the history of the council seem to call for further explanation.

First, it may be well to state more fully the definitions of faith promulgated by the Fathers at Ephesus. They declare that the Blessed Virgin is mother of God (θεοτόκος[1]), because she "after the flesh bore the Word from God, who had become flesh: that the Word is united substantially (καθ' ὑπόστασιν) to flesh"—i.e. as substance to substance; whereas the Nestorians made the union one of Person to Person, and so merely accidental[2]; that the same person (τὸν αὐτὸν) is God and man, so that it is heresy to distinguish the things which the Scripture says of Christ in such a manner as to say that some belong to the man, conceived of as with a proper existence over and above the Word of God (παρὰ τὸν ἐκ θεοῦ λόγον ἰδικῶς νοουμένῳ), others only to the Word. Further the council anathematises those who call Christ a man "who bore God" (θεοφόρον); who say that the Word is the God or Lord of Christ; that the risen Christ is to be adored with the Word; &c., &c.

Next it is to be observed that the council forbade alterations in, or additions to, the Nicene Creed, for special reason. The Nestorian party at the time were using a Creed which had been written by Theodore of Mopsuestia and imposing it on Quartodecimans who wished to join the Catholic Church. To prevent abuses of this kind the council prohibited the use of any other Creed than that of Nicæa, under pain of excommunication. But this was plainly a disciplinary rule, which a competent authority had imposed and a competent authority could abrogate.

EPIGONATION. [See VESTMENTS, GREEK.]

EPIPHANY (ἐπιφάνεια). A feast kept on January 6 to commemorate the manifestation of Christ's glory—(1) when the Magi adored Him; (2) in His baptism, when the voice from heaven proclaimed Him the Son of God; (3) in the miracle of changing water into wine, when Christ began His miracles and "manifested" His glory. In the fourth century the feast of the Epiphany ranked among the greatest of the Church's solemnities. Sometimes, as appears from St. Gregory Nazianzen, the baptism only of Christ was commemorated on the Epiphany, and hence probably the Greek name for the feast, "the holy day of lights" (ἡ ἁγία τῶν φώτων ἡμέρα), which alludes to the "illumination" of baptism, or possibly to a very ancient tradition that at Christ's baptism lights appeared on the Jordan. However, the Breviary hymn for the day, composed by Prudentius in the fourth century, proves that the threefold commemoration on the Epiphany is ancient in the West.

The vigil of this feast is not a fasting day, because the whole Christmas season is regarded as a prolonged feast. There is no invitatory in the matins of the day, probably because the psalm "Venite" occurs in Nocturn III. Solemn baptism was given in the East on the vigil of the Epiphany; and at the present day among the Oriental sects it is usual for the clergy to bless the river of the place at this time, and the devout plunge, despite the cold, into the hallowed water. (Thomassin, "Traité des Festes.")

EPISCOPACY. [See BISHOP.]

EPISTLE. A portion of Scripture read after the collects and before the Gospel in the Mass. This portion of Scripture is generally, but not always, taken from the Epistles of the Apostles, and above all from those of St. Paul; whence in old MSS. of the Missal it is inscribed "De Apostolo." Sometimes, however, it is taken from the Old Testament; in the Ambrosian and Mozarabic Missals there are two lessons read before the Gospel—one from the Old, the other from the New Testament. In early times letters of bishops and Popes were sometimes read at Mass, especially letters of peace and communion testifying to the unity which bound orthodox bishops to each other, and to the see of Peter. Our present arrangement of the Epistles and Gospels is commonly attributed to St. Jerome.

[1] "Dei genetrix" rather than "Dei mater" is the accurate translation.

[2] The old Latin version renders ὑπόστασις here by "substance:" see Petav. De Incarnat. vi. 17.

The priest who celebrates always reads the Epistle, but in high Masses it is also sung by the subdeacon, who receives special authority to do so at his ordination. However, the old forms of ordination make no allusion to any such function of subdeacons, and till the eighth century it was the lector, not the subdeacon, who used to exercise it. The Congregation of Rites permits a clerk in minor orders to sing the Epistle at high Mass, if a subdeacon cannot be had, but the clerk must not wear the maniple. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss.")

EPISTOLÆ ECCLESIASTICÆ. Of these there are many kinds, the following being the most important:

1. Apostolicæ. Letters written by the Roman Pontiff in virtue of his apostolic authority, whether they be constitutions, or briefs, or rescripts, &c.

2. Commendatoriæ. [See COMMENDATORY LETTERS.

3. Communicatoriæ. Letters granted to all who were in the communion of the Church, and cultivated peace with her.

4. Confessoriæ. Letters by which martyrs and confessors for the faith entreated bishops that particular Lapsi (persons who had consented to sacrifice) might be restored to the peace of the Church.

5. Decretales. [See DECRETALS.]

6. Dimissoriæ. [See DIMISSORIALS.]

7. Encyclicæ. [See ENCYCLICAL.]

8. Enthronisticæ. Letters addressed by bishops after their consecration to other bishops, in testimony of their faith and orthodoxy, and that they might receive from them letters of peace and communion in return.

9. Formatæ. Both commendatory and dimissorial letters were anciently called by this name, after the Nicene Council had ordered that they should be composed according to a certain form. Some are of opinion that they were so called from the form of the seal attached to them. The object in either case was to assure the receiver of the genuineness of the letter. In later times it came to mean a letter of orders, containing certain signs, usually Greek letters, only understood by the bishops, certifying that an order had been conferred on the bearer.

10. Paschales. Letters by which metropolitans announced to their suffragans, and these to their clergy, the right time of keeping Easter.

11. Pastorales. Letters of instruction sent to particular churches, as some of those of St. Paul and of St. Ignatius. (Ferraris, Epistolæ; Wetzer and Welte, Literæ Formatæ.)

ERA (Lat. æra). The word is probably derived from æra, the plural of æs, which seems to have been used in classical times in the sense of "a given number." It has been proposed (art. by Mr. Hensley in the "Dict. of Christ. Antiq.," Smith and Cheetham) to use era of any succession of years commencing at a certain date, and epoch of the date from which such era is reckoned. But this appears to be a departure from the ordinary use of the word for which sufficient reason is not shown. It seems better, with the writer in Ferraris, to distinguish between era, a date fixed upon by the consent of some nation or community, and epoch, a date fixed by chronologers.

There is no trace in the Old Testament of the Jews having dated events from a recognised era until we come near to the time of Christ. Attempts seem to have been made to establish an era, but they came to nothing. We read of events which happened "in the second year of their going out of Egypt" (Num. i. 1), or "in the twentieth year" (2 Esdras i. 1), or "in the thirtieth year" (Ezech. i. 1); but in none of these cases did the event temporarily chosen as an era come to be generally used as such. The indications of time in the Old Testament are usually, therefore, either vague ("in the days of Josias the king," "in the days of Heli the priest," &c.), or else they are taken from the regnal years of some king ("in the first year of Cyrus," 1 Esdras i. 1: "in the third year of the reign of Joakim," Dan. i. 1, &c.). Not till the time of the Machabees did the Jews use an era, and then it was one adopted from the Greeks—that of the Seleucidæ.[1]

Setting aside the systems of computing time in use in Hindostan and China, we find no earlier adoption of an era than that by the Greeks, who began in the fifth century before Christ, and perhaps earlier, to date events by the "Olympiad," or period of four years, in which they happened, the first Olympiad being that the first year of which was distinguished by the victory of Coræbus, and was found to answer to the year B.C. 776. Thus A.D. 1 is the first year of the 195th Olympiad.

Era of Rome, A.U.C. The exact date of this era has been much disputed, but the determination made by Varro is generally received, according to which it fell in 753 B.C.

Era of Nabonassar. Ptolemy and other ancient astronomers employ this era, which is named after a king of Babylon who is said to have delivered his countrymen from bondage to the Assyrians, and corresponds to 747 B.C.

Era of the Seleucidæ. This corresponds to the 1st October 312 B.C., at which date Seleucus Nicator recovered Babylon from Antigonus, and founded his empire. It is called also the Greek era, and the era of contracts. The Jews adopted it, as we have seen, and used it till the eleventh century after Christ, when they substituted for it the supposed date of the creation of the world. It is still used by the Arabs.

Spanish Era. This corresponds to 38 B.C., and "is supposed to mark some important epoch in the organisation of the province by the Romans."[2] It was employed in the Peninsula long after the Christian era had come into general use in Europe, having been "preserved in Aragon till 1358, in Castile till 1383, and in Portugal till 1415."[3]

Christian Era. Called also the Dionysian era, from Dionysius Exiguus, a Scythian abbot, who, writing at Rome early in the sixth century, computed that Jesus Christ was born in the year of Rome 754, and proposed that events should be dated from His Incarnation. This era soon came into use at Rome, and gradually spread to other countries; the Venerable Beda, by adopting it in his "Ecclesiastical History," greatly assisted in its wider diffusion. It cannot be exactly correct, for Herod the Great, according to Josephus, died in the year of Rome 750, and our Saviour must have been born some considerable time before his death. It is usual to make a correction of four years on this account, and to date the Crucifixion A.D. 29 instead of A.D. 33; but Hefele and others would put back the birth of Christ as much as six or seven years—to A.U.C. 747.[1]

Era of Diocletian. This era, which is still used by the Copts in Egypt, corresponds to A.D. 284. It was in general use in the Western Empire, till displaced by the Christian era.

The Indiction. This became a common way of reckoning time in the Eastern Empire, the indiction being a period of fifteen years, and the first indiction deemed to commence on September 24, A.D. 313.

The Hegira. This era, which is the date of Mohammed's flight from Mecca, and is used by all Mussulmans, corresponds to 622 A.D.

Era of Constantinople: called also the Byzantine era. This was long in use among the Greeks and Russians, and is still employed by the Albanians. It reckons from the Creation, which it dates 5508 B.C.

Jewish Era. This is used by the modern Jews, and is also referred to the creation of the world, which it dates in 3761 B.C.

Chronologers have invented the "Julian period," a multiple of the number of the years in the solar cycle (28), of those in the lunar cycle (19), and those in the Indiction; of this product, 7980 years, they place the first year in 4713 B.C., because in that year all three cycles stood at 1 simultaneously, and will not do so again till A.D. 3268. Into years of this Julian period, any year expressed in terms of any one of the above-named epochs may be converted. But in fact no era could be devised, or can be conceived, which is more convenient for dating events either before or after it, than the Christian, and it cannot be doubted that, with the advance of the world in civilisation, this era will supersede all others. The Republicans of the first French Revolution, conscious how much the human imagination is influenced by these things, attempted to substitute the commencement of their own blood-stained republic, September 1792, after first inaugurating it by the massacre of the eleven hundred prisoners in the jails of Paris, as the year 1 of the new period of universal fraternity; but the attempt did not survive the suppression of the anarchical factions. M. Comte, the founder of Positivism, recommended to his followers the adoption of this revolutionary epoch, or of a similar one framed by himself; but it is not known that the Positivists as yet make much use of it. ESPOUSAL (sponsalia) is defined by Gury as "a deliberate promise to marry made by each party, expressed by outward signs, each being capable of entering upon such an engagement." This definition implies that the engagement refers to the future—i.e. the parties do not give themselves to each other there and then, but promise to do so on a future occasion. The promise must be made and accepted on each side. Each party must be aware of the obligation incurred; hence there can be no binding engagement between children who have not come to the use of reason, &c. Each party must act freely. Lastly, there must be no impediment which would nullify the marriage, or even make it unlawful—e.g. one cousin cannot bind himself or herself to marry the other, because, till a dispensation is obtained, a union between the two would be no marriage at all. If a valid engagement has been made, then neither can lawfully withdraw from it, unless the other gives consent, or unless changes have occurred or circumstances come to light which alter the nature of the case. Thus a man, having engaged to marry a girl whom he thought virtuous, would not, of course, be still bound if she turned out to be of bad character.

The engagement may be made, and is at present made, in most parts of the Church, without ceremony or publicity of any sort. Among Romans a man sent a ring of iron to his future wife; and this custom was adopted by Christians. The annulus pronubus is mentioned by Tertullian. St. Gregory of Tours speaks of the man as presenting his intended wife with ring (sponsalius annulus [sic]) and shoes. The Franks used to betroth their wives with pieces of money—a relic, according to Chardon, of the old custom of buying girls from their parents. Betrothal among the Greeks takes place with prayer and much solemnity in the church, and on the same day as the marriage. (Historical portion from Chardon, "Hist. des Sacrem.")

ESPOUSALS (DESPONSATIO) OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN. A feast kept on January 23. An office commemorating this event was written by the famous Gerson. In the sixteenth century Paul III. allowed the friars and nuns of the Franciscan Order to recite an office of the Espousals. The office was simply that of the Blessed Virgin's Nativity, except that a new Gospel was chosen and the word "nativitas" was changed into "desponsatio." However, a special office of the Espousals was written by the Dominican Peter Doré and approved by the same Pope, Paul III. An indult of Benedict XIII., in 1725, permitted its use throughout the States of the Church. The feast is kept in England as a greater double. (Benedict XIV. "De Fest.")

ESTABLISHMENT, CHURCH. A state of things in which the civil power, for political and moral ends, recognises a particular religion in preference to all others, and regards its ministers, as such, as bodies corporate, capable of suing and being sued, of holding property, and transmitting it to their successors.

The questions bearing on the utility of a Church establishment have long been keenly debated in this country between the Anglicans and the non-established Protestant sects; but Catholics are little concerned in the controversy. A word or two of criticism on the chief arguments advanced is all that we shall offer. What the Anglicans say as to the advantages secured to a nation by the public recognition, on the part of the civil power, of Christianity and its ministers, is of course perfectly true; and when they appeal to history, and show what benefits accrued to English society from Ethelbert's supporting the Roman missioners, or Ethelwulf's appropriation of the tithe to religious uses, or from many other like acts on the part of our civil rulers, it is impossible not to agree with them. So long as Englishmen continued to be of one religion, and to be in communion with the Holy See, the benefits of Church establishment, on the whole, were undeniable. Religion, by it, was brought to every man's door; it lent a form and a splendour to human life; and an Englishman's fidelity to Jesus Christ and His Church was made easier for him by the fact that the king to whom he owed loyalty was, no less than himself, an obedient son of the same Church, and also its zealous protector. The chief drawback accompanying these benefits of establishment was that, in times of lukewarmness and relaxed discipline, kings, egged on by worldly counsellors, availed themselves of the connection between Church and State to impede free communication with Rome (laws of Provisors, Præmunire, &c.), and to bring the heads of the Church in England more under their own power. This evil tendency, long operating, with other causes, brought the Church in this country to the ruin which we have attempted to describe in the article ENGLISH CHURCH. But to return to the Anglican argument. Down to the Reformation, as has been said, we differ little from them in our estimate of the benefits of establishment. Since that time, as they maintain,[1] the same Catholic Church has continued to be established in England with the like beneficial results; to which we must reply that the common sense of mankind and the received use of words are against them. Everyone but an Anglican can see that it does not follow—assuming that Church establishment was beneficial before the Reformation—that it is equally beneficial now, because the body established is no longer the same. Whether, and how far, the present Anglican establishment is beneficial, is a question on which we cannot here enter.

On the other side, the great argument of the Nonconformists against Establishments is that there is no guarantee for their being applied in support of pure Christianity, and that they may thus become the means of stereotyping error. "Human establishments . . . . have been, and are, productive of the greatest evils; for in this case it is requisite to give the preference to some particular system; and, as the magistrate is no better judge of religion than others, the chances are as great of his lending his sanction to the false as the true."[2] As between the Anglicans and the Dissenters, this seems to be unanswerable. "The magistrate"—i.e. Elizabeth and her Government—established Anglicanism in 1559, and things have so continued to the present day; but "the magistrate" was not infallible, nor were the handful of divines who assisted him; he may, therefore, have applied the forces of Establishment to the support of what was more or less false; and, of course, the Dissenters hold that he did so apply them. Against a Catholic theologian the argument is powerless; for, although it is quite true that the magistrate, as such, is "no better judge of religion than others," yet, if he allows himself to be guided by the Church and the Pope, he rests upon a basis of infallible truth, and his action in applying the forces of Establishment to the support of religion cannot, in that case, be either mistaken or mischievous.

EUCHARIST. The Catholic doctrine on the Eucharist is stated with great clearness by the Council of Trent, Sess. xiii. xxi. and xxii. The Church regards the Eucharist as a sacrament and also as a sacrifice, so that our treatment of the subject falls naturally into two great divisions, to which we will add supplementary remarks on the adoration and reservation of the Blessed Sacrament. Considered as a sacrament, the Eucharist is the true body and blood of Christ under the appearance of bread and wine. Like all the sacraments, it was instituted by Christ, and like them, it consists of an outward part—viz. bread and wine, or the appearance of bread and wine; and an inward or invisible part—viz. the body and blood of Christ with the grace which they impart to those who communicate worthily. But as this definition of the Eucharist is rejected by most Protestants, and as there are many other points concerning this mystery which need explanation, we are obliged for the sake of clearness to make many subdivisions and to take the points in debate one by one.

I. The Eucharist as a Sacrament.

(a) Its Institution, including the Matter and Form.—Christ Himself instituted the Eucharist on the night before His Passion. The first three Evangelists and St. Paul in his first Epistle to the Corinthians give the history of the first Eucharist. Our Lord, they tell us, took bread into His hands, and having given thanks (εὐχαριστήσας, Luc. xxii. 19, whence the name Eucharist), He broke it and gave it to His disciples, saying, "This is my body which is given for you: this do for a commemoration of me." In the same manner He took the chalice and said, "This is the blood of the New Testament which is shed for you." From this it appears that bread and wine are the matter to be used in the sacrament. It is certain, further, that wheaten bread ought to be used, for the Council of Florence declares that "wheaten bread and wine" are the matter of this sacrament, and nearly all theologians hold that no other kind of bread can be used without invalidating the sacrament, because, when bread without further qualification is mentioned wheaten bread would be commonly understood.[1] The Council of Florence, in the Decree of Union, defined that consecration either in leavened or unleavened bread is valid. Latin priests are bound to use the latter; Orientals, except Maronites and Armenians, use the former. It is certain that the Latin Church follows the use of Christ Himself, for leavened bread could not have been employed at the paschal supper, so that the violent attacks made on the Latin Church for its use of unleavened bread by Michael Cærularius in 1043, and often repeated by the schismatic Greeks, are clearly unwarranted. It is impossible to ascertain with certainty the use of the ancient Church on this head. Sirmond contends that even the Latins used leavened bread for eight hundred years and more. Authorities of equal reputation—viz. Mabillon and Christianus Lupus—hold that the Latins have always used unleavened bread since Apostolic times. Bona thinks that, whereas the Greeks have always used leavened bread, the Latins in the early ages used either leavened or unleavened bread according to convenience, and that the use of the latter was not obligatory among them till the tenth century.[2] The wine must of course be the fermented juice of the grape. Water is mixed with it according to a custom which must have been followed by Christ (for the paschal wine, which He used in the first Eucharist, was always so mixed), and which is proved to be Apostolic, both because it is mentioned by Justin Martyr[3] in the sub-Apostolic age, and because it is followed at this day, not only throughout the Catholic Church in all the varying rites according to which Mass is said, but also by all heretical sects which have preserved the priesthood, with the single exception of the Armenian Monophysites.[1] But the mixture of water with the wine does not belong to the essence of the sacrament, and it must be made in small quantity, since wine, not wine and water, is a constituent part of the matter of the sacrament. Lastly, the bread and the wine are consecrated by the words "This is my body," "This is my blood," as has been shown in the article on CONSECRATION.

(3) The Real Presence.—The Council of Trent, Sess. xiii. De Euch. can. 7, teaches that, after the consecration, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, are contained "truly, really, and substantially in the sacrament of the most Holy Eucharist," and it anathematises those who say that Christ's body and blood are there in sign and figure only, or virtually. Christ is in the Eucharist truly—i.e. the words "This is my body" are not, as the Zwinglians contend, a mere figure; He is there really—i.e. objectively, so that His presence does not depend, as Calvin said it did, on the faith of the recipient. He is there substantially, which word excludes the Calvinistic error that Christ's body is in heaven and nowhere else, though it exercises its virtue and power in the Eucharist.

The real presence is clearly implied in Scripture. It was taught first of all by our Lord Himself in the synagogue at Capharnaum, just a year before His Passion. On the day preceding this discourse He had fed the five thousand by the miraculous multiplication of bread, and the crowd went to Capharnaum next day in quest of Him (John vi.). Christ rebuked them, because they set greater value on earthly bread than on the food of the soul; and they asked Him for a "sign" in confirmation of His authority. The miracle of the day before was not enough. He had, after all, only fed the crowd with common bread. What was that to the miracle of the desert? "Our fathers eat the manna in the desert, as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat." Christ answered that He was the true bread come down from heaven; the food of the soul to those who believed in Him, as the manna had been the food of the body. So far—i.e. down to verse 50—there is nothing in the discourse to prove the real presence. But Christ goes on to say, "The bread which I will give" is (not my doctrine but) "my flesh." "He who eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life." The future tense (the bread which I will give) shows that the mysterious gift of which Christ spoke was not yet bestowed. It was possible to believe in Him, but it was not possible as yet to eat His flesh and drink His blood. This feeding on Christ's flesh and blood can only refer to the Holy Eucharist. No doubt Christ might most fitly have spoken of belief in Himself as a feeding on heavenly bread; but to describe faith in Him as a feeding on His flesh and blood would be a violent and unnatural use of words in any language, and as addressed to Jews it would have been worse than unnatural. They were accustomed to use the words "eating a man's flesh" metaphorically, but the metaphor signified, not to accept a man's doctrine, but, on the contrary, to treat him with brutal cruelty. Thus the Psalmist speaks of his enemies coming near him to "eat his flesh;" and Job uses similar language of his false friends.[1] Our Lord, therefore, speaks of a literal, not of a metaphorical, eating of His flesh and drinking of His blood. Another argument for the Catholic interpretation is supplied by the way in which Christ's words were received. The Jews exclaimed, "How can this man give us his flesh to eat?" Whereupon our Lord, instead of explaining that He meant only to say that they must believe in His doctrine, repeated His former assertion in the most solemn and emphatic manner: "Amen, amen, I say to you, unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, you have not life in you. . . . My flesh is truly food, and my blood is truly drink." Others who heard the doctrine from His disciples found it hard and intolerable. To remove the scandal they had taken, Christ appealed to that divine power which He was to manifest in His Ascension, and added, "It is the spirit which quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing: the words which I have spoken to you are spirit and life: but there are some of you who do not believe." In the first part of this verse Christ cannot have meant to say that His flesh was absolutely unprofitable: to do so would have been to contradict the substance of His previous discourse, even if we accept the ultra-Protestant interpretation of it. Christ was to give His flesh for the life of the world, so that He could not speak of this flesh as utterly unprofitable. His meaning is that flesh in itself, even His own flesh apart from that Spirit which God had given Him without measure[1] and which was united to it, could not be of any avail. Nor again, in the latter part of the verse, "The words I have spoken to you are spirit and life," does Christ contrast faith in His words with feeding on His flesh, for, apart from other objections, our Lord does not speak of His word generally, but of those particular words which He has just uttered and which some of His hearers did not believe. The discourse in the synagogue had been a scandal to them, and our Lord declares that His words, far from giving any real occasion for scandal, were spirit and life to those who received them; the fault lay not in Him or in His words, but in their unbelief.

[1] Cajetan (apud Billuart, De Euch. diss. iii. a. 1) denied that the use of wheaten bread was absolutely necessary. "Αρτος is the word used by the Evangelists, and that means wheaten bread, μάζα being the word for barley bread.

This exposition is confirmed by the last part of the chapter. Clearly, the Evangelist did not think that Christ had softened down or explained His mysterious promise, for he goes on to tell us that from that time many of Christ's disciples went back and walked no more with Him, so that our Lord was constrained to ask the twelve Apostles if they also would go away.

At the last supper, Christ explained by the institution of the Eucharist that mysterious eating His flesh and drinking His blood which He had announced a year before in the synagogue of Capharnaum. He celebrated with the chosen twelve the paschal rite. This rite was a sacrifice commemorative of Israel's redemption; it was, indeed, the one commemorative sacrifice of the old law. Further, it was a feast upon a sacrifice, and the eating of the paschal lamb bound the Israelites together in the unity of the Jewish Church. Christ, as His disciples knew, was the true paschal lamb, come to take the sins of the world away. As He substituted His atoning death for the sacrifice of the paschal lamb, so He gave His body and blood in place of the lamb on which they had been used to feast. Just when He was about to abolish types and shadows by His death, He instituted for all time the new paschal rite which was more than a type or shadow. It was to be at one and the same time a sacrifice commemorative of the redemption, a feast on Himself, the Lamb of God, the great means of sanctification for His people, and the bond which was to unite the "Israel of God" throughout the world. He said of the bread, "This is my body;" of the wine, "This is my blood," and He invited His disciples to eat and drink of the banquet prepared for them.

St. Paul, in 1 Cor. x., testifies to the same doctrine. He warns his disciples against participating in the sacrifices offered to idols, and points out the inconsistency of eating the flesh of victims offered to idols and also eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ. Christians are to "flee from idols" because they receive the Eucharist. St. Paul contrasts the real flesh of victims sacrificed to idols with the real flesh present in the great Christian sacrament. "I cannot partake," he says, "of the table of the Lord and the table of devils"—i.e. of idols. And in order that there may be no possibility of mistaking the sense of his words, he asks, "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a participation in (κοινωνία) the blood of Christ? the bread which we break, is it not a participation in the body of Christ?" St. Paul does not say that the consecrated bread and wine are a symbol of Christ's body and blood, but a participation in them. He uses the very same word (κοινωνοί) to describe the "partaking" in the Jewish altar. Persons "partook" in Jewish and heathen sacrifices by really eating the flesh of the victim; just in the same way they "partook" of the Christian Eucharist. But the participation in each case was ordered to ends widely different from each other, so that it was a gross inconsistency to unite any two of the three different participations with each other.

We can only select a few from the mass of patristic testimonies to the doctrine of the real presence. St. Ignatius, St. John's disciple, is arguing against the Docetæ, who denied the reality of our Lord's body altogether. St. Ignatius[1] points out the consequences of this unbelief. Not admitting that our Lord took on Himself true flesh, those men "abstained from the Eucharist and prayer, because they do not confess that the Eucharist is the flesh of our Saviour Jesus Christ." Had the Church of those days believed that the Eucharist was no more than a symbol, there was nothing in the celebration of the sacrament which need have offended them. They granted that our Lord had an apparent body, and they could offer no objection to the commemoration of His death under a symbolic form. But they could not partake in a sacrament which professed to communicate the true body of Christ, for the simple reason that they denied the reality of Christ's body altogether. It may be worth while to mention in passing that the celebrated Protestant commentator Meyer[1] admits the force of this passage. In an historical account of the Eucharistic doctrine, appended to his commentary on St. Matthew, he allows that St. Ignatius, in opposition to the Docetæ, "undoubtedly states the doctrine that in the Eucharist Christ's flesh and blood are given in a real way." In the earliest account which we possess of the Eucharistic celebration among the primitive Christians we find the same unhesitating belief in the real presence. "This food," says Justin Martyr, who died in the year 166, "is known among us as the Eucharist. . . . We do not receive these things as common bread and common drink; but as Jesus Christ our Saviour, being made flesh by the Word of God, had both flesh and blood for our salvation, so we have been taught that the food over which thanks have been given (εὐχαριστηθεῖσαν), through prayer in His words, and from which our blood and flesh are nourished in such a way as to be changed, are the flesh and blood of that Jesus who was made flesh."[2] Some words in this passage are very difficult to understand, or even to translate, and they have proved the crux of commentators, but the part relating to the real presence is clear and simple. Justin considers the presence of Christ's flesh and blood in the Eucharist as certain as the fact that He took flesh and blood in His Incarnation. And here again we may remark that Meyer interprets St. Justin exactly as we have done. At the close of the second century, St. Irenæus, the disciple of St. Polycarp, who was the disciple of St. John, uses the very argument against the Gnostics which St. Ignatius had employed against the Docetæ. Against the Gnostic error that the material world is evil and that Christ was not the Son of that inferior God who made the world, St. Irenæus, argues thus: "If the Lord came from another father, how did He act justly when, taking the bread of the creation which lies around us, He confessed that it was His own body, and affirmed that the mixture of the chalice [wine mixed with water] was His own blood?"[1] Again, repelling the Gnostic error that the flesh is incapable of salvation, and so would not rise again, St. Irenæus argues that on the Gnostic theory Christ would not have redeemed us with His blood, or sanctified our bodies with His own body and blood in the Eucharist. "If this flesh of ours is not saved, then clearly the Lord did not redeem us with His blood, nor is the chalice of the Eucharist the communication of His blood, nor the bread which we break the communication of His body. For there is no blood except that which comes from veins and flesh and the rest of man's substance, which human substance the Word of God truly became. He redeemed us with His blood; . . . and since we are his members and are nourished through His creatures, and since He Himself bestows His creatures on us, . . . He confessed that the chalice [taken] from the creature was His proper blood, with which He bedews our blood, and the bread [taken] from the creature He affirmed with a strong affirmation to be His proper body, from which He nourishes our bodies."[2] Let the reader observe that St. Irenæus puts the blood of Christ in the Eucharist in the same category with that shed on the cross, the former being real, just as the latter was real; next, that Irenæus tells us what he means by blood—viz. literal blood, taken from the veins; lastly, that Irenæus intimates that he is speaking of a stupendous mystery, for he tells us that our Saviour solemnly or strongly affirmed (διεβεβαιώσατο) that the bread was His proper body. We may conclude our patristic citations on this head with a few words from Cyril of Jerusalem (died 386). "Since then He has declared and said of the bread, 'This is my body,' who after that will venture to doubt? And seeing that He has affirmed and said, 'This is my blood,' who will raise a question and say it is not His blood?"[3] Even if the witness of Scripture to the real presence were doubtful, the fact that a doctrine so mysterious, so difficult to reason, found such speedy and universal acceptance throughout the Church that Ignatius a disciple of St. John could take it for granted in his controversy with heretics, should be enough to turn the scale in favour of the Catholic interpretation.

(γ) Transubstantiation.—It is not enough to confess Christ's real presence in the Eucharist. The Council of Trent requires us further to confess the "change of the whole substance of the bread into the body, of the whole substance of the wine into the blood [of Christ], only the appearances of bread and wine remaining; which change the Catholic Church most fitly calls transubstantiation." The word "transubstantiation" appears to have come into use during the controversy with Berengarius, and a person who rejected it as "foolish and barbarous" would not thereby fall into heresy, though his conduct, Suarez says, would be scandalous and rash, and would expose him to just suspicion of heresy. But the word implies a truth beyond the mere fact of Christ's presence in the sacrament; and this truth is of faith. It is necessary then to begin by explaining the word.

The Church has adopted the distinction made by the Aristotelians between substance and accident. The essence or substance is that which constitutes the thing, which makes it what it is, and it is distinct from accidents or qualities which may change while the thing itself remains. Common sense teaches us this distinction. If water undergoes certain accidental changes—e.g. if having been cold it becomes heated to the boiling point—we still call it water: in other words, we recognise the fact that though the water has become hot instead of cold, the substance of water is there still, and that the change is merely accidental. If, however, the water were changed by natural process into blood, or grape-juice, or again by miracle into wine, anyone would see that not merely the qualities, but the thing was changed. The substance of water would have ceased to be, and would have been replaced by that of grape-juice, blood, or wine. Substance is the inner reality in which the qualities or accidents inhere, or in the more exact language of the Schools, substance is that which naturally stands by itself without any subject or substratum in which it inheres. An accident is that which naturally inheres in a substance as its subject or substratum. Now, whereas the change which the elements in the other sacraments undergo is an accidental (whereas, e.g., the water in baptism remains water, and simply receives a new power to cleanse from sin), the change of the elements in the Eucharist is an essential or substantial one. The substance of bread and wine ceases to be, for it is changed into Christ's body and blood. In one respect, however, this substantial change differs from all other substantial changes. In other cases, when one substance changes into another, the accidents also change. Here the accidents of bread and wine remain unaltered; and so long as they remain, the body and blood of Christ also remain concealed beneath them. Hence it follows that in the Eucharist there is no deception of the senses. What we see, feel, or taste in the Blessed Sacrament is real, for the accidents are real entities, and the accidents are all that the senses ever do perceive. From the existence of the accidents reason infers that of the substance to which they naturally correspond, but with regard to the Eucharist this inference would be false, since faith assures us that in this case the accidents conceal the body and blood of Christ, not the substances of bread and wine. It is, moreover, because the accidents remain that the Eucharist is a sacrament. They constitute the outward part – they are the sensible sign of that refreshment of the soul which follows from a worthy reception of the Blessed Sacrament.

Taking for granted the real presence, we may fairly claim to prove the doctrine of transubstantiation from the words of consecration as given in the Gospels. On the Lutheran theory of consubstantiation—according to which the substances of bread and wine are still present after consecration, though the substance of Christ's body is there also—Christ could not have said "This is my body," but only "My body is here"—"My body is present with this bread." The sensible signs or accidents indicate the substance which underlies them; so long, therefore, as the substance of bread remains, the proposition "This is bread" must be true, and any other proposition—e.g. "This is Christ's body"—must be false. It is of no avail to urge that Christ's body is also present. The question is not whether it is present, but whether it is directly indicated by the accidents of bread. If the substance of bread remains, the natural connection between accidents and substance remains also; and to say of bread "This is Christ's body" is not less absurd than it would be to say of bread in which a gold coin was concealed "This (pointing to the bread) is gold." True, we may point to a cask and say "This is wine," because everybody knows that the cask is meant to contain liquid, and by a permissible licence of speech we put the thing which contains for that which is contained in it. But the accidents of bread are not intended, on the theory of consubstantiation, either by nature or use, to contain the body of Christ; and the word "this" could only signify the substance of bread visible by its accidents.[1]

We pass to patristic testimonies, and here we shall have an opportunity of adding to the proofs from tradition already given for the real presence; and we shall also be able to set the doctrine of transubstantiation in a clearer light, and to show that, although the term is philosophical, the truth which it implies is very simple. The Fathers, then, imply this belief in transubstantiation when they say that the bread is changed into or becomes the body of Christ; because, on any theory except that of transubstantiation, the substance of bread remains, and is not, therefore, changed into another substance. The following quotations are taken from Cardinal Franzelin's treatise on the Eucharist. Tertullian, "Adv. Marc." iv. 40, says: "Taking bread, He made it His body." Cyril of Jerusalem, "Cat." iv. 1, 2: "Of old He changed water into wine, which is akin to blood, in Cana of Galilee; shall we think Him unworthy of faith now that He has changed wine into blood?" The change of water into wine was, of course, an instance of transubstantiation; so, also, according to Cyril, is the change effected in the Eucharist. "Before consecration," says St. Ambrose, "De Myster." ix. 54, "it is called something else; after consecration it is named blood; and thou sayest 'Amen'—i.e. it is true." St. James of Sarug writes: "From the point of time when He took bread and called it His body, it was not bread, but His body." Theodoret, on

[1] The argument given from the words of consecration is adopted by most theologians, and seems to be favoured by the language of the Council of Trent, xiii. 4. However, Scotus and Durandus denied that the words in themselves proved transubstantiation.

Matthew xxvi. 26: "It [the bread] is changed by a wonderful operation, though to us it appears bread. . . . . Bread, indeed, it appears to us, but flesh in fact (τῷ ὄντι) it is." Against such testimonies (which might easily be multiplied) it is useless to quote passages from Scripture or the Fathers in which the appearances which remain after consecration are called bread and wine. They are naturally called according to the outward appearance which they present; and it would be easy to prove, by the same argument, that Catholics at the present day do not believe in transubstantiation.

(δ) The Mode of Christ's Presence.—The Council of Trent defines that Christ is contained whole and entire under either species—i.e. that His body, blood, soul, and divinity are given both under the form of bread and under that of wine. Where Christ's body is, there His Godhead must be also, because by the hypostatic union the Godhead became indissolubly united to human nature. Moreover, as Christ, having died once, lives for evermore, it follows that the human soul must needs be united to that risen and glorified body which we receive in communion. Hence Christ speaks of eating His flesh as equivalent to eating Him.[1] Further, the same kind of reasoning certifies that Christ is given whole and entire under either kind. True, the force of the words of consecration puts the body under the appearance of bread, the blood under the appearance of wine; but Christ has no body except that glorified one united to His blood—no blood except such as is united to His body. Otherwise Christ would be slain over again every time Mass is said; for on each occasion the body would be separated from the blood. Again, the constant practice of the Church relieves us from any fear that this reasoning may be precarious. Since the Council of Constance it has been the general law in the West that all except the celebrant should communicate only under the species of bread. And the Church, though it has changed its discipline in this matter, has by no means introduced a new principle. Infants among the early Christians received communion under the form of wine, and sick persons, solitaries, &c., under the one form of bread. The principle was fixed—viz. that Christ was given whole and entire under either species; it was merely the application of this principle which varied. [See COMMUNION.]

The Council of Trent goes on to say that whole Christ is present under every separate part of each species (sub singulis cujusque speciei partibus, separatione facta). What has been said in defence of Christ's presence under either species admits of obvious application here; and we will only add that Christ said of the divided host, "This is my body."

This seems the fitting place to explain what theologians mean by the spiritual presence of Christ's body in the Eucharist. It is not meant to deny that Christ's body in the Eucharist is a real one (such a denial would be heresy), but just as all bodies after the resurrection become spiritual without ceasing to be bodies, because they have certain properties of spirit; so it is with Christ's body in the Eucharist, only to a much wider extent and in a more wonderful way. At one and the same time Christ's body is in heaven and on a thousand altars. As the spirit is present entire in the whole body and in each part of it, so the body of Christ, with all its substance and qualities, is present in each host and in each part of the host. Consequently, the Eucharistic body of Christ is not extended in space—i.e. one part of Christ's body does not correspond to one particular part of the host. All this, of course, involves a series of stupendous miracles. It does not, however, imply any contradiction; and nothing, we know, is impossible to God Almighty.

(ε) The Ministration of the Eucharist is committed to priests. They alone can consecrate validly; for it was His Apostles, and not the faithful generally, to whom Christ said, "Do this for a commemoration of me." Justin, in his account of the Eucharist already referred to, speaks of the προεστὼς, or president, as the celebrant; and Tertullian, "De Coron. Mil." 3, tells us that the Eucharist "was taken from the hands of nobody else except those of the presidents." The "president" is evidently another word for the bishop, who, in early times, celebrated the Eucharist while the priests around him joined in the sacred acts as consacrificantes. The First General Council takes for granted that priests alone can consecrate. It condemns the abuse of deacons administering the Eucharist to priests, because it was unseemly that those who cannot sacrifice should "give the body of Christ" to those who could offer it (τοὺς ἐξουσίαν μὴ ἔχοντας προσφέρειν τοῖς προσφέρουσι δίδωσι τὸ σῶμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ).

The Eucharist of course remains the body of Christ whoever administers it. But priests alone do so lawfully and by virtue of their office.[1] Deacons may administer it if empowered to do so, and at one time they did commonly give the chalice to communicants [see DEACON].

(ζ) The Effects of the Eucharist.—To communicate with profit we must do so without the stain of mortal sin on the soul. This appears from St. Paul's words, 1 Cor. xi. 27, "Let a man prove himself, and so let him eat of the bread and drink of the chalice;" from the constant practice of Christian antiquity, as testified by the declaration of the Fathers, the exclusion of penitents from communion, the words "sancta sanctis" in the ancient liturgies; from the nature of the sacrament, which is intended as the food of the soul, and therefore can confer no benefit on a soul dead by sin.[2] In a soul duly disposed the Eucharist produces effects similar to those of natural food on the body. It unites us to Christ, the author of grace and virtue. It sustains and increases the spiritual life; it repairs the injuries done to the soul by sin, for it increases the love of God and of true virtue, and fills us with spiritual sweetness; on the same grounds it preserves the Christian from future falls. It is also both to soul and body the pledge of future glory, since Christ is bestowed on us for this special end, that we may preserve and obtain that happiness which God reserves for the virtuous; while the body has a new title to a glorious resurrection. It is fitting that Christ should regard the flesh of the worthy communicant with a special interest, and conform it in due time to His own glorified body.

II. The Eucharist as a Sacrifice.

A sacrifice is defined as "the oblation of a sensible thing made to God through a lawful minister by a real change in the thing offered, to testify God's absolute authority over us and our entire dependence on Him." This is not the place to discuss the history and meaning of the primitive sacrifices. Catholic theologians have generally taught that in sacrifice the life of the victim—or the existence of the thing, if the oblation be of a thing without life—is substituted for the life of those in whose name it is offered. The thing offered must be visible, for sacrifice pertains to external worship, and it is only in a metaphorical sense that the prayer of the heart and the like are called sacrifices. It can be made lawfully to God alone, for no other but He is the Lord of life and death, and the very act of sacrifice must effect a change which destroys, or tends to destroy, that which is offered, for without this destruction we should fail to confess by an external act God's supreme dominion, and so to satisfy the end of all sacrifice. Such sacrifices were offered from the earliest times to the true God by the patriarchs, and among heathen nations to their false deities. God accepted and approved sacrificial worship from the first; and when the law was given to the people of Israel sacrifice was enjoined and its mode carefully regulated on divine authority. Christ offered on the cross a sacrifice for our redemption, and from that moment the Jewish sacrifices ceased to have any efficacy. They were instituted to typify the sacrifice of Christ, and now that the reality had come the types were no longer needed. The worship of sacrifice, however, was not to cease in the Church, and the Council of Trent defines that in the Eucharist or Mass a true and proper sacrifice is offered to God.

The Old Testament[1] foretells this sacrifice of the Mass just as clearly as it predicts the sacrifice of the cross. No prophet seems to speak more lightly of the Jewish ritual than Jeremias. He looks forward to a time when the ark of the covenant will not be remade or even missed. "They will not say any more 'The ark of the covenant of the Lord,' and it will not be thought of; they will not remember it or miss it, and it will not be made again" (iii. 16). He looks forward instead to that new covenant which God will write on the heart. But is there to be no sacrifice under this new covenant? Let the following passage answer: "In those days Judah will be saved, and Jerusalem will dwell confidently, and this is the name which they will call it

[1] Concil. Trid. xiii. 8.

[2] One exception must be here made. Many theologians hold that a person who without fault of his own approaches communion in a state of mortal sin, for which he has supernatural sorrow, but not that sorrow known as perfect contrition, would be reconciled to God in the act of reception. Such a case might occur, e.g., if a person erroneously supposed that he had been absolved.

[1] The passages of Scripture here and elsewhere throughout this article are translated for obvious reasons from the original texts.

[Jerusalem], the Lord our justice. For thus saith the Lord, a man shall not be cut off to David sitting on the throne of the house of Israel; and to the priests, the Levites, a man shall not be cut off from before my face presenting the holocaust and offering the meat [or flour] offering and making sacrifice all the days. And the word of the Lord came to Jeremias saying: Thus saith the Lord, if ye will break my covenant [consisting in] the day and my covenant [consisting in] the night, so that there should be no more daytime and night in their season; then also shall my covenant be broken with David my servant, so that he should not have a son reigning on his throne, and with the Levites, the priests who minister to me. As the host of the heavens cannot be numbered, and the sand of the sea cannot be measured, so I will multiply the seed of David my servant, and the Levites who minister to me" (xxxiii. 16 seq.). Evidently this is a Messianic prophecy. The son of David is, as orthodox Protestants gladly admit, no other than Christ the son of David, and the Son of God. Surely, then, there is no escape from the conclusion that in the Messianic kingdom—i.e. in the Church—sacrifice will continue to be offered, and will last while sun and moon endure, or, in other words, till the end of the world and of the Christian dispensation. A recent Protestant writer who belongs to the sceptical school, and has scant sympathy with Catholic doctrine, admits that "taken literally, the eternity of Levitical sacrifices as expressed in xxxiii. 18, seems quite inconsistent with all else in Jeremiah's prophecies," and, "taken typically, only fits the sacrifice of the Mass to which Roman Catholic expositors refer it; for the sacrifices are to be offered continually in all time."[1]

Malachias, in a familiar passage, expresses the same idea still more strongly and definitely. He speaks of God as rejecting the Jewish sacrifices. "I have no pleasure in you, saith the Lord of hosts, and a meat [or flour] offering I will not accept from your hands." But is sacrifice to cease? On the contrary, "from the rising of the sun even to its going down great is my name among the Gentiles, and in every place incense is offered to my name, and a pure flour offering, since great is my name among the Gentiles, saith the Lord of hosts" (Malach. i. 10, 11). The sacrifices of the old law were offered only in Palestine; the new sacrifice of Messianic times is to be offered among the Gentiles. Jewish sacrifices could be offered only in one place; the new sacrifice is to be offered all over the world. The sacrifice here predicted cannot be that of the cross, which was made once for all on Calvary. The rabbins and Protestant scholars, whether sceptical or orthodox, have been utterly unable to explain this passage even plausibly. To say with Ebn Ezra and Kimchi[1] that the prophet means that the heathens would, if God commanded them to do so, offer acceptable sacrifice, is doing violence to the plain meaning of the words. Again, the whole context, which speaks of sacrifice in the literal sense, excludes the supposition that the offering of the Gentiles is to be a mere sacrifice of praise and prayer; nor would a prophet of the Persian period have regarded the offering of such a sacrifice in every place as anything extraordinary.[2] Still more desperate is Hitzig's interpretation, which attributes to Malachias the modern and utterly un-Hebrew notion that "Jahve, Ormuzd, Zeus (!), and perhaps others, were only different names of the one Supreme God." The sacrifice of the Mass, and that only, satisfies the requirements of a scientific exegesis.

Christ at the last supper fulfilled these prophecies and instituted the transfigured Passover of the new law, in which He Himself, the true paschal lamb, was to be continually sacrificed and eaten. When He blessed the bread and wine His eye was fixed on the morrow when He was

The LXX version of Jeremias omits some 2,700 words found in our Hebrew text, and gives many of the chapters in a different order, so that this omission need not surprise us. Hitzig, ad loc., and Kuenen, Het onstaan en de verzameling van de boeken de ouden verbonds, ii. p. 203, treat the passage as an interpolation. Ewald's opinion (Propheten, ii. p. 269) is diametrically opposite.

[1] Quoted by Steiner ad loc. in his commentary published in 1881.

[2] This interpretation, adopted by many Protestants (e.g. by Keil, ad loc.), is given in the Targum. In the Chaldee the verse is paraphrased thus: "Since from the rising of the sun and to its setting great is my name among the peoples, and in every time when you do my will, I will receive your prayer and my great name will be sanctified by means of you, and your prayer shall be as a pure oblation before me, since great is my name among the peoples, saith Jehovah of hosts."

to suffer and die; but His priesthood, begun when He assumed our human nature, was not to end with a single act of sacrifice. He was to continue it throughout time by the hands of His earthly representatives, who were to offer Him on the altars of the Church under the forms of bread and wine. He speaks of Himself under the forms of bread and wine as already in the state of a victim offered as sacrifice for men. He speaks of His body in the Eucharist as "given for you" (Luke xxii. 19), just as He had said a year before of "the bread which I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world" (John vi. 52). He says of the chalice—i.e. of the blood therein contained—that it is "shed for you" (Luke xxii. 20). We lay no stress on the fact that it is the present and not the future tense which Christ employs; to do so would show great ignorance of Scriptural usage. But the fact remains that Christ speaks of the body under the form of bread, of the blood in the chalice as presented in a sacrificial state for the life of men. The perpetual sacrifice of the altar was to be one with the sacrifice of the cross. The one offering worthy of God was to replace the typical sacrifices prescribed in the Pentateuch. The sacrifice of the altar was to represent and commemorate that of the cross and also to supply all that was wanting in the latter. The Jews were commanded to eat of their peace offerings and so to enter into communion with God. No one could eat of the sacrifice offered on Calvary, but Christians for all time were to feed on the divine victim present in the Eucharistic oblation. The sacrifice of the cross was offered once; in the sacrifice of the altar the Christian Church was provided with the noblest form of worship, to be offered day by day. The sacrifice of the cross was "dishonoured, without public testimony to its dignity and power." The sacrifice of the altar was to be the centre of the Church's worship and solemnities, the object of her unceasing veneration. It was to unite the faithful to God and to each other; it was to teach them how to offer themselves, body and soul, in sacrifice to God in union with the perfect sacrifice of Christ; it was to separate them wholly and utterly from participation in Jewish and heathen sacrifices. This last point is clearly brought out by St. Paul in a way which shows beyond possibility of mistake his belief in the Eucharistic sacrifice. In urging the Corinthians not to partake in heathen sacrifices he reminds them, as we have seen above, that the Eucharistic bread imparts the body of Christ, the chalice of benediction His blood, and he concludes, "Ye cannot partake in the table of the Lord and the table of devils." The table of devils was of course the heathen altar, and partaking in the table of devils means eating of the sacrifices offered to false gods, whom St. Paul declares to be really demons. The Apostle therefore sets altar against altar, sacrifice against sacrifice, communion against communion

This belief in the sacrifice of the altar has prevailed at all times and all places within the Church. St. Ignatius[1] tells the Philadelphians they must partake of one Eucharist, since there is one flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ; one chalice which unites us to His blood; one θυσιαστήριον or place of sacrifice. "The chalice," says Irenæus,[2] "which comes from this world of ours, He [Christ] confessed to be His blood and taught the new oblation of the New Testament, which oblation the Church, receiving it from the Apostles, offers in the whole world to God." "The oblation of the Church," he continues, referring to the prophecy of Malachy, "which our Lord taught to be offered in the whole world, is counted a pure sacrifice before God." He proves that Catholics alone have the right to celebrate this new oblation, heretics being excluded because a belief in the real presence is inconsistent with their other theories: Jews, because "their hands are full of blood, for they have not received the word which is offered to God."[3] This is nothing less than a distinct assertion of the Catholic truth that the divine victim who shed His blood for us on the cross applies to us the merits of His Passion, by offering Himself continually on the altar. We may add that the Fathers, from very early times, explained the words in Psalm cx., "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec," as referring to the Eucharistic sacrifice. They knew from the Epistle to the Hebrews that Melchisedec, "the king of justice and of peace," was a type of Christ. They remembered the words in Genesis xiv. 18, "Melchisedec, king of Salem, brought forth bread and wine, and he was the priest of God most high," and the prophecy in Psalm cx., "Thou art a priest for ever according to the order or manner of Melchisedec," and accordingly they found the reality typified by Melchisedec in the Eucharist when Christ offers Himself through His priests under the appearances of bread and wine. "Who," asks Cyprian, "is more truly a priest of God most high than our Lord Jesus Christ, who offered a sacrifice to God the Father and offered the same sacrifice which Melchisedec offered (that is bread and wine)—namely, His own body and blood?"[1] "His body," says St. Augustine, "is offered up instead of all those sacrifices and oblations, and it is given to the communicants." Ambrose, Chrysostom, and a multitude of other Fathers hold similar language. The ancient liturgies, written in many languages and used in many different parts of the Church, testify likewise to the universality of this belief. They speak of the "tremendous, divine, unbloody, the perpetual, the living sacrifice" of the Lamb "who, being sacrificed, never dies;" they declare that "our sacrifice is the body and blood of the priest Himself, Christ our Lord."[2]

Having established the truth of the Church's doctrine on the sacrifice of the Mass, it only remains to state and explain that doctrine more fully, avoiding, however, as far as possible, merely scholastic questions. All that is included in the idea of sacrifice is found in the Eucharist. There is the oblation of a sensible thing—viz. of the body and blood of Christ under the appearances of bread and wine. The oblation is made by a lawful minister—viz. by Christ Himself acting through earthly priests, who are His representatives. There is a mystical destruction of the victim, for Christ presents Himself on the altar "as in a state of death, because He is deprived of those functions of natural life which He exercised on earth, and because He is there with the signs of death through the mystical separation between body and blood"[3] made by the words of consecration. There is the protestation of God's supreme dominion, for the Mass is and can be offered to God alone. Moreover, it fulfils the form and ends of sacrifice. Like the holocausts, it offers homage to God; like the sin-offerings, it propitiates Him by the very fact that it is an oblation of Christ, the victim for our sins. Like the peace-offerings, it pleads for grace, for we offer here the victim of our peace. In this sacrifice of thanksgiving we offer God the most excellent gift He has bestowed on us—namely, the Son in whom He is well pleased. Lastly, the sacrifice of the altar is one with that of the cross. True, no blood is shed on the altar, nor does Christ die any more, so that it is by the sacrifice of the cross, not of the Mass, that we were redeemed from sin and its penalties. But on the cross and altar we have the same victim and the same priest, and therefore, in the words of the Council of Trent, the sacrifice of the Mass, though a commemoration, is "not a mere commemoration of the sacrifice on the cross." It is truly "propitiatory"[1] and may be offered for the living and dead, for sins and penalties, for satisfaction and other needs, spiritual and temporal. "Moved," says the same council, "by the oblation of this sacrifice, the Lord, granting grace and the gift of repentance, forgives crimes and sins, even if they be great;"[2] and in another place, that it is the most efficacious means of helping the souls in Purgatory.[3] The Mass is offered for the salvation of all the living and of all the dead who still suffer in the state of purgation; but it may also be applied specially for the needs of individuals. It is necessary that the priest should communicate in every Mass which he celebrates, for consumption of the species forms an integral part of the sacrifice, but it is not necessary that anyone else should do so. The Council of Trent does, indeed, express a desire that in each Mass the faithful who assist, as well as the priest, should communicate; but it "does not condemn, as private and unlawful, those Masses in which the priest alone communicates sacramentally, but approves and even commends them, since such Masses should be considered public (communes), partly because the people

The words of consecration would of themselves put the body only under the form of bread, the blood only under that of wine, were it not for the fact of concomitance explained above. in them communicate spiritually, partly because they are celebrated by a public minister of the Church, not for himself only, but for all the faithful who belong to the body of Christ."[1]

III. Adoration, Reservation, &c., of the Blessed Sacrament.

Several other subjects connected with the Eucharist are treated of under separate articles e.g. BENEDICTION, COMMUNION, CORPUS CHRISTI, EXPOSITION, PROCESSIONS, RESERVATION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT. But it will be well to state here one or two dogmatic principles relating to these matters. Christ gives Himself in this sacrament to be the food of the soul; and every host is consecrated in order that ultimately it may be received by the communicant. Thus the host which is used for Benediction is, after a few days, received by the priest at Mass, and the particles reserved in the tabernacle are all given to communicants and replaced by other particles. However, as food has the qualities which nourish before it is eaten, the actual reception being only the condition without which it will not actually nourish, so the Eucharist, so long as the appearances of bread and wine remain, is always the true body and blood of Christ. This truth appears from the words of institution. Our Lord said of the bread, "This is my body:" not "This will be my body the moment you receive it:" and it is defined by the Council of Trent, Sess. xiii. can. 4. In consequence of this belief, the Church has from the earliest times treated the Blessed Sacrament with the most anxious reverence. "We are full of anxiety," says Tertullian,[2] "lest anything of our chalice and bread should fall to the ground." Severe penalties were imposed, both in East and West, upon the ministers of the altar, if through their negligence any accident happened to the Blessed Sacrament. Again, the Church commands, and at the same time regulates by stringent laws, the reservation of the Blessed Sacrament for the sick. Lastly, Catholics pay to the Eucharist, present on the altar, reserved in the tabernacle, or carried in procession—to the Eucharist, in short, wherever it may be present—that supreme worship which is due to God alone. "The Eucharist," says the Council of Trent,[3] "is not the less to be adored because Christ instituted it in order that it might be received: for we believe that that same God is present in it of whom the eternal Father, bringing Him into the world, said, 'Let all the angels of God adore Him;' that God whom the Magi adored falling down before Him; who, finally, was adored by the Apostles in Galilee, as the Scripture bears witness." (A masterly summary of the New Testament doctrine on the Eucharist will be found in Döllinger's "First Age of the Church." Chardon, tom. ii., is the best authority on the history of the rites. The great work "Perpétuité de la Foi" is a storehouse of materials for the defence of the Catholic doctrine.)

EUCHOLOGY (Εὐχολόγιον). The book which contains the ritual of the Greek church, for the celebration of the Eucharist and other sacraments, and all ecclesiastical ceremonies. It corresponds to the Missal, Pontifical, and Ritual of the Latin Church. It was published by Goar, at Paris, in 1647, under the title "Euchologion, sive Rituale Græcorum, complectens ritus et ordines divinæ liturgiæ, officiorum, sacramentorum, &c., juxta usum Orientalis Ecclesiæ."

EUDISTS. A congregation of secular priests established under the names of Jesus and Mary for the purpose of training clergy and giving missions, and named after their founder, the Père Eudes. M. Eudes (a native of the diocese of Séez, in Normandy) was born in 1601. At the age of fourteen he made a vow of chastity, and, having a strong predilection for the ecclesiastical state, was received into the French Oratory, lately founded at Paris by the celebrated Abbé, afterwards Cardinal, de Bérulle. After being ordained priest, he laboured for several years as an Oratorian, chiefly in Normandy, preaching with great power and abundant fruit. Desiring to found a special congregation for the ends specified above, he left the Oratory, and, being joined by eight zealous priests, established the first house of his community at Caen in 1643. In the course of his long life he conducted no less than a hundred and ten missions in all the principal towns of France. He wrote several works, among which "Le Bon Confesseur" and "Le Prédicateur Apostolique" are distinguished. He died at Caen in 1680, leaving his community in a flourishing condition. The Eudists make no vows; yet very few, after being once incorporated in the congregation, have been known to leave it. They wear the ordinary dress of secular priests. It is their principle, while residing in any house of the order, scrupulously to obey the superior, although they are not bound by vow to do so. Frequent change of the superiors of the different houses, with the approval of the bishop, is a fundamental rule of their institute. They are said never to have been infected by Jansenism. At the Revolution the general of the order was M. Pierre Dumont, superior of the house at Coutances. His coadjutor, M. Hébert, was chosen by Louis XVI., in 1791, to replace his former confessor, who had taken the oath to the Civil Constitution of the Clergy. Soon after, he was arrested, and lost his life in the butchery of the priests at the Carmelite convent ordered by the Paris Commune in September 1792. There was a chapel in the convent garden: on the steps of the altar, before a statue of the Blessed Virgin, M. Hébert took refuge. The assassins broke in; one of them saw him, and, brandishing his sword over him, said, "Take the oath." "No," he replied; "I will not deny the faith." The murderer then attacked him, and despatched him with repeated blows of his sword. Eight or nine other Eudists were butchered in the same massacre. Many found refuge in England. In 1826 the order was revived, with F. Blanchard for superior; thirty years afterwards they were more than eighty in number, with four flourishing colleges, the chief house being at Rennes, in Brittany. Mgr. Poirier, the late Archbishop of Trinidad, who had himself been a Eudist, succeeded in procuring for them the formal approbation of the Holy See; before the Revolution, owing to the opposition of the Oratorians and other causes, they had only obtained partial approbation. (Hélyot.)

EULOGIÆ (from εὐλογεῖν, to bless, Matt. xxvi. 26). The Blessed Sacrament is the great bond of union among the faithful. "We being many," says the Apostle, "are one bread" (1 Cor. x. 17). However, when many of the faithful no longer communicated as a matter of course at every Mass,[1] the need was felt of showing by some outward sign that they were in full communion with the Church. Accordingly the celebrant consecrated so much only of the bread placed on the altar as was needed for the communicants; the rest of the bread was merely blessed and distributed to those who did not actually communicate, though they had the right to do so. The Eulogia, then, was a substitute—though of course a most imperfect one—for Holy Communion, whence the Greek name, ἀντίδωρον, "that which is given instead."

The custom can scarcely have arisen before the third century. In the fourth it was well known throughout the East.[1] In the West we find it mentioned by Gregory of Tours in the sixth century, and by the Council of Nantes in 658. The bread used was sometimes the same as that which was set aside for consecration; sometimes ordinary bread was placed on the altar and used for the Eulogiæ. Usually the latter bread was blessed after the offertory; but sometimes, as Honorius of Autun tells us, at the end of Mass. The Council of Nantes gives a form of benediction which the Church still employs in the blessing of bread at Easter. The Eulogiæ were not given to the catechumens, to the excommunicated, or to the possessed. Eulogiæ were also sent by one bishop to another in sign of intercommunion and as a mark of peace and good will. Here too the Eulogia was a substitute for the Eucharist, since in the earliest times the Blessed Sacrament itself was sent from Church to Church.[2]

Various traces of the Eulogiæ may still be discovered in the present usages of the Church. The ἀντίδωρον or Eulogia is still distributed among the Greeks, and the "Pain Bénit" is given in some French churches at Mass.[3] Moreover, words which occur in the canon of the Roman Mass after the consecration, "by whom, O Lord, thou dost ever create all these good things, dost sancti + fy them, quick + en them, ble + ss them, and bestow them on us," in all likelihood were used at first over the Eulogia, not over the Blessed Sacrament.[4] (Chardon; Hefele; Kraus, "Real-Encycl.")

EUNOMIANS. The followers of Eunomius, a disciple of Aetius [see AETIANS]. Eunomius, born of poor parents in Cappadocia, probably about 320, not feeling disposed to hold the plough, trusted to his wits for a living. After various adventures, he heard that there was a great teacher (Aetius) residing at Antioch. He went there, and, finding that Aetius had departed, followed him to Alexandria, where George, his countryman (a violent Arian), had at that time (356) intruded himself into the see of St. Athanasius. Eunomius attached himself to Aetius, and learned from him theology—i.e. Arianism. In 358, Eudoxus, an Arian, having established himself in the see of Antioch, sent for Aetius; he went there, accompanied by Eunomius. But a semi-Arian council held the same year deposed Eudoxus, and banished him and his friends from Antioch. Eunomius was sent to Midæa in Phrygia. Two years afterwards there occurred an extraordinary revolution; a council held at Constantinople raised Eudoxus to the patriarchal throne there, and made Eunomius bishop of Cyzicus. Here he soon began, in spite of the warnings of his friend Eudoxus, to broach his heretical opinions. Complaints were carried to the emperor (Constantius); and Eudoxus, being pressed on all sides, was obliged to depose him. This was in 361 or 362. Eunomius, retiring to his native country, lived there for many years, frequently ordaining bishops and priests, though he had been deposed. He made known his opinions freely; and his numerous admirers, considering that he had been ill-used by Eudoxus, attached themselves ardently to him in his misfortunes and took his name. St. Gregory of Nazianzum, writing to Nectarius, who had succeeded him as Patriarch of Constantinople in 381, calls Eunomius "our bosom mischief," τὸ ἐγκόλπιον ἡμῶν κακόν. Gregory, it will be remembered, was himself a Cappadocian.[1] The five orations of this author "De Theologia" are mostly directed against the Eunomians, who, he says, "confessed, when pressed in argument, that the Son was God, but said that it was only a participation of name and designation"[2]—i.e. not one of nature. St. Basil, another great Cappadocian († 379), also wrote a treatise against Eunomius. (Fleury, "Hist. Eccl." xii.–xiv.)

EUSEBIANS. [See ARIUS AND ARIANISM.

EUSTATHIANS. I. A congregation of fanatical monks, said to have been founded by the versatile Eustathius, Bishop of Sebaste, about 360, in Armenia. These monks, like the Cathari of later times, condemned marriage as impure, rejected the religious services of priests who had been married, and, while they disregarded the Church fasts, fasted on Sundays and feast days, like those satirised in "Hudibras"—

> "That with more care keep holiday
> The wrong, than others the right way."

The council of Gangra, the date of which is uncertain, condemned and suppressed these monks.

II. The party among the Christians of Antioch who, after the unjust deposition of their bishop (St. Eustathius) by the machinations of the Eusebians (330 or 331), refused to recognise any of the Arianising successors whom that faction thrust into the see, and would not hold communion with those who did so. When Meletius was appointed in 360 there was a prospect of peace; but although Meletius was personally orthodox, the Eustathian party would not accept him, because he had communicated with Arians. In a short time the Arian party, disgusted with Meletius for the open professions which he had made of agreement with the faith of Nicæa, obtained his deposition and the appointment of Euzoius in his place. There were now three bodies of Christians at Antioch: two orthodox—the Eustathians and the Meletians (i.e. those who held that the removal of Meletius was unjust, and regarded him as still bishop), and one heretical—namely, those in communion with Euzoius. Many holy bishops desired the termination of the schism between the orthodox parties: and (since Eustathius had died in exile) this result would soon have been brought about by the general reception of Meletius but for the officious zeal of Lucifer of Cagliari, who, going to Antioch in 362, consecrated Paulinus bishop. The Eustathian party at once recognised him; and through the influence, in a great measure, of Lucifer, he was recognised at Rome and in other parts of the West. Nevertheless, as Ballerini shows,[1] the mediate communion of St. Meletius with the see of St. Peter was not broken, for he was in full communion with St. Basil and others, who were in communion with Rome. This state of things lasted many years. St. Meletius, who had been allowed to return to Antioch, died in 381. His followers elected Flavian to succeed him; but the Roman see still recognised Paulinus as true Bishop of Antioch. Paulinus dying in 388, Evagrius was chosen in his place; but the Eustathian party had by this time dwindled to insignificant proportions, and Evagrius obtained little recognition either in East or West. At the death of Evagrius, Flavian succeeded in preventing the election of a successor, and was himself admitted to communion as Bishop of Antioch by Pope Siricius in 398. But a small Eustathian party lingered on for some years, until the vigorous action of Alexander, the second successor of Flavian, about 414, finally extinguished them.

EUTYCHIANS. [See MONOPHYSITES.]

EVANGELIARIUM or EVANGELISTARIUM. A book containing the sections of the Gospel to be read at Mass. Such a book is called by the Greeks εὐαγγέλιον; they give the name εὐαγγελιστάριον to a book which merely marks the beginning and end of each Gospel, but which gives, besides, rules for finding the Gospel on each Sunday, a calendar with canons for fixing the date of Easter Sunday (πασχάλιον δηνεκές), the tones of the chant, and the matins for the different Sundays.

EVANGELICAL COUNSELS. St. Thomas thus explains the difference between commandments and counsels. Eternal happiness is the end at which every man is bound to aim, and this end he cannot possibly reach except by the keeping of the commandments. The observance of the commandments, then, is a matter of absolute necessity for all who wish to be saved. He who makes the things of this world his end, and worldly prudence his ultimate rule of action, must needs forfeit eternal life and is laying up for himself everlasting misery in the world to come. However, a man may wish to do more than what is absolutely necessary to secure heaven. Instead of asking simply, "What must I do to be saved?" he may inquire what are the readiest and surest means of securing his salvation. He knows that if he makes the good things of this life his end, he has no hope of life in the world to come, and, recognising the danger there is in earthly pleasures, he tries to see how far he can keep from them. He learned from the commandments how to avoid being blinded by the god of this world, and to take the indispensable means of securing his salvation. Now the counsels come to his help. They teach him the shortest way to heaven, the most perfect manner of serving God. The great objects which men pursue are riches, pleasure and honour, the desire of the eyes, the desire of the flesh, the pride of life, spoken of by St. John. The three evangelical counsels encourage us, so far as we can, to renounce all these desires—to renounce riches for voluntary poverty, pleasure for perfect chastity, our own self-will and love of power for obedience to a religious superior.

The distinction between precept and counsel, although denied by the Protestant Reformers, is recommended by the common sense of mankind. We all feel and recognise in our ordinary language the difference between a man who simply does his duty and another who does acts of singular generosity. Moreover, this distinction is clearly marked by Christ. He told the young man that "if he would enter into life" he must keep the commandments, but that if he wished to be perfect he was to sell all he had and give it to the poor. St. Paul imposes strict precepts on the Corinthians (1 Cor. vii.) of abstaining from immorality, remaining in the married state if they had already entered it, &c. But he gives his "counsel" in favour of perfect chastity on the ground among others that it is easier for the unmarried to serve God with an undivided heart.[1] There is little occasion to dwell on the tradition of the early Church. In fact, the very quarrel of the Reformers with Christian antiquity arose in great measure from the high estimation in which the Fathers held the evangelical counsels. So strong was the feeling of the early Christians in favour of these counsels, that even in Apostolic times the danger was that men would refuse to see, not the excellence of virginity, but the lawfulness of marriage. (See 1 Tim. iv. 3.)

An objection is made to the whole idea of "counsels" on the ground that we cannot even keep the commandments perfectly. At the best we are "unprofitable servants." How, then, can we pretend to do more than the law of Christ requires? Now, it is most true that no one can perfectly observe either the precepts or the counsels of Christ. No one can observe either the one or the other at all without God's help, so that a man who thought he did his duty perfectly, and could therefore go on to do more than his duty, would show that he had not learnt the rudiments of Christian humility.

[1] The celibate state, he says, is καλόν—i. e. as Meyer translates it, "something morally excellent"—and, again, κρεῖσσον, of higher moral excellence.

But the saints who practised the evangelical counsels were of all men furthest removed from such Pharisaical pride. They attributed all that they did to grace, and sincerely acknowledged the imperfection of their best actions. Moreover, it is an obvious fallacy to speak as if by following the counsels, men take on themselves fresh difficulties, whereas the observance of the commandments is hard enough. On the contrary, a man who, being called to it by God's grace, embraces evangelical perfection, removes from himself numberless temptations to break the commandments. Indeed, all Christians find the necessity of following the counsels to a certain extent. Such is the weakness of human nature that a man who never gave away money he could keep without positive sin, never thought of foregoing a lawful pleasure of sense, never submitted to another except under the constraint of positive duty, would infallibly fall into sin. It is easy to imagine special cases in which a man finds that the religious life is the only one in which he can save his soul.

Again, it is urged that if the whole world followed the evangelical counsels, society would be disorganised and would rapidly come to an end. The answer to that is, that the evangelical counsels are not meant for most, much less for all. The state most perfect in itself would increase temptation and endanger the souls of those who lack the vocation, and therefore the strength, to follow it. Those who have the strength have been the salt of society, the men who cared for others because they forgot themselves, and exhibited an ideal life before a corrupt and sordid world. (St. Thom. "Sum." 1ª 2æ, qu. 108.)

EVANGELISTS. The authors of the four gospels, Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. The breviary office of Evangelists, says Gavantus, is the same as that of Apostles, except that they differ from each other in the prayer and in the lessons of the three nocturns; and he adds that the same arrangement is to be found in the most ancient MSS. of the Breviary.[1]

From the second century at latest the living creatures mentioned in Ezekiel and the Apocalypse were believed to typify the four evangelists. Commonly Matthew is supposed to be signified by the man, since he begins with the human origin of Christ; Mark by the lion, on account of the "voice of one crying" in the desert, at the opening of his gospel; Luke by the ox, the beast offered in sacrifice, since he sets out with the history of the priest Zacharias; John by the eagle, because he wings his flight at once beyond all created things to the contemplation of the eternal Word. This interpretation is found in Jerome,[1] and has been generally adopted. Irenæus,[2] however, assigns the lion to John, the ox to Luke, the man to Matthew, the eagle to Mark. Augustine, followed by Bede, makes Matthew the lion, Mark the man, Luke the ox, John the eagle. These symbols appear for the first time in Christian art on the mosaic of S. Pudenziana, assigned by De Rossi to the time of Pope Siricius, 384-398.[3]

EVIL, ORIGIN OF. The Church has combated and condemned two extremes of error on this point. The Gnostics and the Manichees, in early times, denied that God could be in any sense the author of evil. Hence, observing the patent fact that evil does exist in the world, they attributed the creation of material things to an inferior God; to a principle ignorant and defective, or even, as some of them asserted, positively wicked and malicious. Again, the Reformers, especially Calvin, went to the other extreme. Rightly maintaining that God is the author of all that exists, they made Him the author of sin. They shrank, at least after a time, from asserting this in plain words, but the Calvinistic doctrine that God predestines some men to eternal ruin, leaves them without the grace which is essential for good actions, and even instigates them to wicked actions ("Dei impulsu"),[4] is in fact tantamount to a declaration that God is the author of sin. Before stating the doctrine of the Church, which is opposed to the error of the Manicheans on the one hand, of Calvinists and Lutherans on the other, it will be well to give a brief sketch of St. Thomas's teaching on the nature of evil.

Evil according to the Thomist theology has no positive existence. It is the privation of good—i.e. not the mere absence of [1] Gavant. tom. II. § viii. cap. 1.

[4] "Homo justo Dei impulsu agit quod sibi non licet." Calvin, Instit. I. iv. 18, § 2. Beza and Zwingli teach the same doctrine in still more offensive terms. So did Melanchthon at first, but he and the Lutherans generally altered their doctrine on this point for the better. See the accurate and interesting account in Möhler, Symbolik, i. 1, § 4.

it,[1] but its absence in a person, an action, or thing, when the integrity or perfection of the person, action, or thing demands it. It is evil, e.g., for a man to be blind, for sight is a sense necessary to man's physical integrity: evil for wood to be subjected to the action of fire, because in such a case the wood is corrupted and soon ceases to be wood altogether: evil for a man to get drunk, because the drunkard secures a certain sensual pleasure at the cost of taking from his action that rectitude which would belong to it if it were moderated by reason and directed to God. The reader will now be able to understand the way in which St. Thomas classes the different kinds of evil. Evil may arise in the natural course of things in such a manner that it need not have any connection with the free will of creatures. Substances are corrupted, animals die, by the mere operation of natural laws. This is what St. Thomas calls "malum in corruptione rerum." Modern writers usually call it physical evil. Again, evil may be a privation inflicted just because it is contrary to the free will of him who has to endure it. This is "malum pœnæ," evil inflicted as punishment. Lastly, evil may consist in this, that the agent being free to conform his actions to God's law, refuses to do so. This is "malum culpæ," the evil of sin—evil in the strictest sense of the word.

There is no difficulty in admitting that God causes physical and retributive evil. He does not, indeed, intend even this kind of evil for its own sake, but He causes corruption and death because they subserve the order and perfection of the universe. The power of God is manifested, and the beauty of the world enhanced, by the constant changes which bring life out of death. So, again, God inflicts punishment because His justice requires that sinners should suffer, and that fear of God's judgments should lead men to take refuge in His infinite love. But God cannot be the author of sin: if so, God would Himself be responsible for it and would cease to be God, for holiness is His very essence. Sin arises only from defect in the free will of creatures who will not correspond to God's grace and order their actions to Him their last end. God does, indeed, for wise and holy ends, permit moral evil, and brings good even out of sin. The malice of persecutors occasioned the heroism of the martyrs, and enabled them to win their crowns.

It only remains to confirm the above by the testimonies of Scripture and the authority of the Church. Scripture, then, constantly declares that there is one God, who is the creator of all things, and is therefore the cause of physical evil from the very fact that He has made creatures subject to corruption. "The Lord killeth and maketh alive" (1 Reg. ii. 6). "Shall there be evil in the city, and the Lord hath not done it?" (Amos iii. 6). It also in numberless places speaks of God as inflicting punishment. He "renders to every man according to his works" (Rom. ii. 6). Vengeance is His, and He "will repay" (Heb. x. 30), though He has "no pleasure in the death of him who dieth" (Ezech. xviii. 32). These truths have been enforced by implication in the Nicene Creed and more explicitly by the Fourth Lateran Council. But God is not and cannot be the author of sin. His "works are perfect, and all his ways are judgments" (Deut. xxxii. 4). He is not a God that "wills iniquity" (Ps. v. 5). "Is there injustice with God? God forbid" (Rom. ix. 14). The contrary error is anathematised by the Council of Trent, Sess. vi. De Justif. cap. 16. (See St. Thomas, "Sum." i. qu. 48, 49.)

EX CATHEDRA. [See CATHEDRA.]

EXALTATION OF CROSS. [See CROSS.]

EXAMINATION OF BISHOPS. A bishop-elect has to make a profession of faith according to the formula prescribed by Pius IV. in the constitution In Sacrosancta, and to answer eighteen questions, which may be read in the Roman Pontifical. These questions relate "to the obedience due to the authority of the Church, to the moral conditions of a life truly episcopal, to the profession of revealed verities, and to the rejection of the opposite errors."[1] To the first question the bishop-elect replies, "So with my whole heart it is my will to consent and obey in all things"; to the eight following questions he answers Volo, "I will;" to the rest, Credo, "I believe." At the end the consecrator says, "May this thy faith, most beloved brother in Christ, be increased by the Lord unto true and everlasting beatitude." There is also a liturgical examination, which may be described as the formal outcome of the more strict inquiry into the canonical qualifications of the bishop-elect, already made in the process of information instituted in every such case by order of the Holy See.

EXAMINATION OF CONSCIENCE. It is necessary to ascertain the nature of the disease before remedies can be applied; and in the moral and spiritual life persons have to search their conscience in order to ascertain their past and present sins, that they may confess them to God, repent, and be forgiven, and take precautions against future falls. Spiritual writers recommend that this examination should be made at least every evening, in order to ascertain and to repent of the sins committed that day. Such examination is a matter of absolute necessity before approaching the sacrament of penance. The penitent must try, with such reasonable care as he would use in any other matter of grave importance, to ascertain at least all the mortal sins he has committed since his last confession; otherwise he is incapable of absolution.[1] (Concil. Trid. Sess. xiv. cap. 5.)

St. Ignatius, followed by many other ascetical writers, also recommends a particular examen to be made, at least daily, not on sin in general, but on that particular sin into which the individual most frequently falls.

EXARCH (ἔξαρχος, ruler). A bishop having charge of a province, and next in rank to a patriarch. The terms "Metropolitan," "Archbishop," "Exarch," and "Patriarch," are used by the early ecclesiastical writers with little discrimination; thus, in the First Council of Constantinople, we find the Bishops of Alexandria, Antioch, and Constantinople, who in later times were only known as patriarchs, denominated "exarchs." In the "Notitia Imperii" (supposed to have been compiled about the beginning of the fifth century) the (civil) diocese of Asia has ten provinces: the ecclesiastical "exarchia" of the same, eleven; and so in other cases. The Bishops of Ephesus, Heraclea, and Cæsarea in Cappadocia, were exarchs, and claimed to exercise jurisdiction over the metropolitans of their respective provinces. This brought them into conflict with the Patriarch of Constantinople: the subject was considered at the Council of Chalcedon; and the result was that the jurisdiction of these three exarchs was abolished, though they retained the title and the rank, and were allowed to sit in council next after the five patriarchs. (Thomassin, "Vetus et Nova Eccl. Disciplina.")

EXCOMMUNICATION. An ecclesiastical censure by which a Christian is separated from the communion of the Church. It is a power included in the power of the keys, or of binding and loosing, given by Christ to Peter and the Apostles, and may be deduced from our Saviour's words (Matt. xviii. 17)—"If he will not hear the Church, let him be to thee as the heathen and publican." For to treat a man as a heathen and a publican is to repel him from the Church and all things sacred—that is, to excommunicate him. We find it put in practice by St. Paul (1 Cor. v. 3), when he said of the incestuous Corinthian—"I . . . have already judged . . . him that hath so done, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, you being gathered together and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus, to deliver such a one to Satan," &c. St. Augustine explains: "Because outside the Church is the devil, as within it is Christ, and accordingly he who is separated from the communion of the Church is as it were delivered to the devil."

Excommunication is of two kinds, the major and the minor. The minor kind is an ecclesiastical censure, by which a Christian is deprived of the right to participation in sacraments,[1] and indirectly, as a consequence, of the right of receiving a benefice. It is incurred by communicating with a person under major excommunication, in any case where such communication is not excused.

The major excommunication deprives of all ecclesiastical communion, and is equivalent in substance to anathema, from which it only differs in regard to the formalities by which the latter is surrounded. For the major excommunication can be inflicted by mere force of law, or by the written sentence of a judge, whereas an anathema is publicly pronounced, and "cum strepitu."

Those under major excommunication again fall into two classes: tolerati, whom the faithful are not bound to avoid: and non tolerati (i.e. those excommunicated by name and publicly denounced, and those notoriously guilty, by themselves or others, of violence to clerics), with whom the faithful are forbidden to hold either religious or civil communication. Civil intercourse is, however, permitted, for the sake of the faithful themselves, under various circumstances and to various classes of persons.

[1] Ferraris.

Excommunications are also divided—and this is a most important distinction—into those ferendæ sententiæ, and those latæ sententiæ. In the case of the former it is enjoined that a sentence of excommunication be pronounced (e.g. "we forbid this on pain of excommunication; whoever does it, let him be excommunicated," or "will incur excommunication," &c.), but the delinquent does not actually incur the sentence till it has been inflicted by a competent judge. In the second case, the words of the law or other instrument are so chosen that upon a given act being done the doer of it falls at once under the ban of the Church, as when it is said—"let him incur excommunication ipso facto." Nor are such sentences unjust, as some have argued, on the ground that the delinquents who incur them have not been duly warned, as the Gospel requires, of the nature of their offence; for the law itself, which they must be presumed to know, is a standing and perpetual warning. At the same time, the excommunication latæ sententiæ is operative only in the internal forum and in the sight of God; to make it effectual in the external forum also it is necessary that the guilt be proved before, and declared by, a competent judge.

Excommunications are also divided into those reserved to the Pope, and those not reserved. Those of the first class now in force are enumerated in the constitution "Apostolicæ Sedis," issued by Pius IX., in 1869, in which are also specified all excommunications latæ sententiæ and ipso facto incurred henceforth in vigour.

If it be asked, Who can excommunicate? it may be answered, those who possess ordinary or delegated jurisdiction in the external forum in regard to those subject to them; but not parish priests (who have as such only jurisdiction in the forum of conscience), and never laymen or women. To the question, Who can be excommunicated? the answer is, that only Christians, alive and of sound mind, guilty of a grave offence and persisting in it, and subject to the judge giving sentence, can be excommunicated. Not Jews, therefore, nor Pagans, nor the unbaptised heathen, nor the dead; but the sentence may justly be inflicted on heretics or schismatics.

The effects of excommunication are thus summed up. "As man by baptism is made a member of the Church, in which there is a communication of all spiritual goods, so by excommunication he is cast forth from the Church and placed in the position of the heathen man and the publican, and is deprived accordingly of sacraments, sacrifices, sacred offices, benefices, dignities, ecclesiastical jurisdiction and power, ecclesiastical sepulture—in a word, of all the rights which he had acquired by baptism—until he make amends, and satisfy the Church."[1]

EXECRATION. [See DESECRATION.]

EXEMPTION. A privilege by which persons or places are withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the ordinary and immediately subjected to the Holy See. It may be compared to dispensation, the object of both being the same—viz. to avoid friction in government. It differs from dispensation, in that this last withdraws persons from the operation of a law, while exemption withdraws them from the authority of a ruler. To take familiar instances—religious are exempt in many respects from the jurisdiction of the bishops in whose dioceses their convents are; the Spanish people is dispensed, by a special Papal indult, from the observance of the general law prescribing abstinence from meat on Fridays.

The exemption of regulars from the jurisdiction of the ordinary is, however, carefully limited by the law; were it otherwise, the abuses and conflicts that would inevitably arise would more than counterbalance the benefits of the freedom of action which exemption confers on those possessing it. Speaking generally—in what relates to property and to delinquencies (unless attended by public scandal), and to their rule and conventual life, regulars are exempt; in what relates to preaching and the administration of the sacraments they are not exempt. For details treatises on canon law must be consulted. An important contribution to the latest law on this subject was made by the Constitution "Romanos Pontifices," published by His Holiness Leo XIII., on May 8, 1881, in which the relations between the bishops and the regular clergy in this country were more accurately defined. (Ferraris, Regulares, art. 2.)

EXEQUATUR. The right claimed on behalf of bishops or temporal rulers to examine Papal bulls and constitutions, and judge of the expediency of admitting them, before suffering them to take effect and pass into execution in their dioceses or territories.

With regard to this claim, so far as bishops are concerned, Benedict XIV.[1] laid down that it could have no reference to Papal constitutions treating of faith or morals, or of sacred rites, ceremonies, sacraments, and the life of the clergy, since such Constitutions cannot in any way be subjected to the judgment of inferiors. In regard to other matters, it is held that if a bishop is of opinion that the execution of a particular Constitution in his diocese would, on account of the existence of special circumstances, produce serious inconvenience or scandal, he may be justified in delaying its execution for a while, until he has laid these circumstances before the Pope, if at the same time he have the firm intention of obeying the final direction of the Holy See in the matter, whatever it may be.

The exequatur, as claimed on behalf of temporal rulers, differs little from the placitum regium, on which see under Canon Law. In England, the extreme doctrine of exequatur was carried out in the statute of Præmunire (1393), which "vindicated the right of the State of England to prohibit the admission or the execution of all Papal bulls or briefs within the realm."[2] Martin V., the able Pope elected at the Council of Constance, protested against this statute, but without effect; it was, however, greatly restrained in its operation by the exercise of the dispensing power of the Crown. In later times the sovereigns of Naples and Piedmont were conspicuous for their vexatious assertion of the exequatur: see a letter of Clement VIII. (1596), quoted by Ferraris, to Olivarez, the Viceroy of Naples. The Holy See has never admitted as a matter of right the claim of the State to impede the execution of Papal rescripts; but de facto, and to prevent greater evils, it has often acquiesced, and does so at the present day, in the exercise of this power. Thus, although the Roman Pontiff does not recognise the Italian kingdom as constituted by the revolutionary movements of 1860–1870, yet he allows Italian bishops on their election, that the churches may not be widowed of their chief pastors, to apply for the exequatur to the sovereign of that kingdom, as the de facto occupant of power.

Among the writers on canon law who have been favourable to the exequatur are Oliva (a celebrated Portuguese doctor), Salgado, and Van Espen. On the other side are Bellarmine, Suarez, Zallwein, Zaccaria (author of "Antifebronius Vindicatus"), Droste zu Vischering, and John de Dominis (writer of the treatise "Il Regio Exequatur," Naples, 1869). EXERCISES, SPIRITUAL. A name given by St. Ignatius of Loyola to a series of meditations on the truths of religion, accompanied by examination of conscience and considerations respecting present or future duty in the choice of a new state of life, &c., &c. St. Ignatius wrote them at Manresa, near Montserrat, in Spain, during the early days of his spiritual life. The saint had at the time little acquaintance with human letters, but the Spirit of God supplied to the full what was wanting in human learning, and the book abounds in maxims of extraordinary wisdom, and instruction in the highest points of spirituality. Meditation and retirement had always been practised by pious persons, but the admirable order of the meditations, the judicious choice of maxims, and the marvellous knowledge of the human heart shown in the book belong to St. Ignatius himself. There is no ground for disputing its authorship or for supposing, as a Benedictine writer has done, that the plan of the book was due to Garcias Cesniros, abbot of Montserrat. The person who makes the exercises is supposed to receive them from a director, and the exercises are arranged for a retreat of four weeks; they can, however, be adapted for a much shorter time. The exercitant begins with meditations on the end of man, and on the penalties of sin, that he may flee with horror from it; passes next to those on Christ's life and death, Christ being the model which we have to copy; and ends by contemplating the resurrection of Christ, happiness of heaven, &c., that he may learn to unite himself to God. The Exercises were written originally in Spanish, translated into Latin, revised and published at Rome in 1548; "all and everything" which they contain having been solemnly approved in a bull of Paul III. It is the glory of the Jesuits to be "men of the Exercises," and they have been from the first an instrument of extraordinary power for good in the hands of those apostolic men and great masters of the spiritual life.

EXORCISM and EXORCIST.[1] 1. The custom of attempting to drive out the devil from possessed persons was familiar to the Jews, as appears from Matt. xii. 27, Acts xix. 13. For this end they employed magical forms said to be derived from Solomon. Our Lord gave His disciples the real power of driving out demons, and in the earliest times this power was exercised by such persons, whether clerics or lay people, men or women, as had received the special grace (charisma) which enabled them to do so. However, in the middle of the third century, Pope Cornelius (apud Euseb. "H.E." vi. 43) speaks of the Exorcists as a special order of the clergy; and the Council of Laodicea, can. 26, forbids those who have not been ordained to exorcise either in church or in private houses. The so-called Fourth Council of Carthage (anno 396) prescribes a form for the ordination of exorcists the same in substance as that given in the Roman Pontifical and used at this day. The bishop gives the book of exorcisms into the hand of the person to be ordained, bidding him learn them by heart and receive power of laying his hands on the possessed. Innocent I. (Ep. i. ad Decent.) prohibited exorcists from exercising their ministry on the possessed without express permission from the bishop, and this law is still in force. The order of Exorcist is the third of the minor orders. Power is still given to drive out the devil, but the exercise of this power is restrained, and the order of Exorcist has come to be regarded chiefly as a step to the priesthood.

2. Catechumens, even if not possessed, still belonged in a sense to the kingdom of darkness, and exorcisms were from early times employed, as they are in our present Ritual, to snap the band between the soul of the candidate for baptism and the devil. As even baptism does not completely destroy the devil's power over the soul, these exorcisms are supplied after baptisms, when—e.g. a child in danger of death has been baptised without the ceremonies and afterwards recovers. Hence the exorcists of the ancient Church came to exercise a general superintendence over the catechumens as well as over the possessed. It would be their business, for example, to remove energumens and catechumens before the more solemn part of the Mass. This probably serves to explain the words the bishop addresses at this day to those who are to be ordained exorcists when he tells them it is their office to see that those who do not communicate "give place."[1]

3. Exorcisms are also used at this day by priests over inanimate objects—e.g. in blessing water for baptism, &c. This practice is also very ancient, for Cyprian (Ep. 70) alludes to it. It springs, not from any Manichean idea that matter is evil, but from the Christian doctrine that all creation, since the fall, has been marred by the powers of evil.

EXPECTATIVE. The right of being collated to a benefice not at present vacant. If the right be determined to a particular benefice, it is a survivorship; if not, it is simply a provision. The Popes began to create expectatives about the twelfth century, by issuing mandata de providendo to bishops and chapters in favour of clerks not ordained to particular benefices. These recommendations usually had reference to prebends and other preferment in capitular patronage. Kings followed the example of the Holy See, and began to claim the jus primarum precum, by which was meant the right of claiming for their nominees the collation to the first prebend in each chapter which might fall vacant after their accession. Chapters themselves gave the survivorships to some of their prebends to particular individuals, often on the ground merely of noble birth and social influence. The Third Council of the Lateran (1179) abolished all survivorships, but did not touch Papal expectatives, because they were indeterminate. The Council of Trent (sess. xxiv. can. 19, De Ref.) abolished these last also; but the decree was never carried into complete execution. (Wetzer and Welte, art. by Buss.)

EXPOSITION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT. The Church has adored Christ in the Eucharist ever since that great sacrament was instituted, as has been shown in another article (see EUCHARIST), but it is only in times comparatively modern that the most Holy Sacrament has been publicly exposed for the veneration of the faithful. In the learned and laborious work of Thiers on this subject, all that is known on the history of this devotion has been collected, and we take the following details from his book.

The procession of the Blessed Sacrament on Corpus Christi was probably introduced some time after the institution of the feast, under Pope John XXII., who died in 1333. We cannot be sure that even then the Blessed Sacrament was exposed, for the earliest vessels in which it was carried seem to have hidden it completely from view. However, Thiers found in a vellum Missal[1] dated 1373 a miniature portrait of a bishop carrying the Host in procession, the monstrance in which it is borne having sides partly of glass. We may thus reasonably conclude that in the fourteenth century the Host was exposed at least on Corpus Christi. In the sixteenth century it became common to expose the Host at other times—on occasions, e.g., of public distress—and generally the Blessed Sacrament was exposed for forty continuous hours. This devotion is still familiar to Catholics throughout the world as the usual form for the more solemn exposition of the Blessed Sacrament. The Host after High Mass (the Mass of Exposition) is placed on a throne above the altar in the monstrance. Persons are appointed to relieve each other night and day in watching and praying before it. On the second day a Mass "for peace" is sung, and on the third the Host is again placed in the tabernacle after a High Mass (that of Deposition).

The first introduction of this devotion was due, so far as can be ascertained, to Fr Joseph, a Capuchin of Milan (died 1556). He arranged the forty hours' exposition in honour of the time that our Lord spent in the tomb. In 1560 Pius IV. approved the custom of an association called the Confraternity of Prayer or of Death. They exposed the Host for the forty hours every month. In 1592 Clement VIII. provided for the public and perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament exposed on the altars of the different churches at Rome. The forty hours in one church succeeded to those in another, so that the Blessed Sacrament was always exposed in some church the whole year round. Earlier than this, in 1556, the Jesuits in Macerata exposed the Blessed Sacrament for forty hours in order to meet the danger of disorders prevalent at that time, and St. Charles adopted this devotion for Carnival with great zeal. At present the forty hours' prayer is observed during Lent in very many of the English and Scotch dioceses.

In the "Instruction" of Clement XI. and the decrees of the Congreg. Rit. there are numerous rules with regard to public exposition of the Blessed Sacrament. It cannot take place even in the churches of regulars without leave from the bishop or Apostolic indult. Twelve lights at least must burn before the Host. Relics and images must be removed from the altar of exposition, and no Mass celebrated there, so long as the Blessed Sacrament is exposed, except the Mass of Deposition, and the bell is not rung at the Masses which are said during the exposition at the other altars. (The great authority is Thiers in the work already quoted. The "Manuale Decretorum" contains numerous rules to be observed with regard to exposition.)

EXTRAVAGANTS. The fifth and sixth portions of the Canon Law are so called because they wander over various matters not touched upon in the Decretals, and because, till brought into the code, they had no recognised place in ecclesiastical jurisprudence. They consist (1) of the Extravagants of John XXII. (1316–1334), to the number of twenty constitutions, divided into fourteen titles; (2) of the Extravagants Common (so called because they issued not from any one Pope, but from several), divided into five books, containing a number of titles and chapters, each title being devoted to one or more "Extravagant" Constitutions. [See CANON LAW.] (Ferraris, Jus.)

EXTREME UNCTION may be defined as a sacrament in which the sick in danger of death are anointed by a priest for the health of soul and body, the anointing being accompanied by a set form of words.

St. James (v. 14, 15) describes the nature and effects of this sacrament. "Is any man sick among you? Let him call to himself (προσκαλεσάσθω) the presbyters of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord. And the prayer of faith shall save the sick man, and the Lord will raise him up, and if[1] he has committed sins, it shall be forgiven him." Let us see what the passage implies.

Oil was an ordinary means of healing familiar to the Jews, as appears from Luke x. 34 (cf. the "balm" in Jerem. viii. 22, xlvi. 11). However, it is plain that St. James does not here recommend an ordinary application of the medical art, for if so, apart from the objection that unction could only be of use in certain kinds of illness, he would have advised the sick man to summon the physician and not the presbyters of the Church. Nor, again, can we reasonably suppose that the Apostle is referring to those extraordinary gifts of healing (the χαρίσματα ἰαμάτων, 1 Cor. xii. 9) common in the primitive Church. There is not the faintest reason for believing that presbyters generally possessed any such powers; and it was imposition of hands, not unction, by which, as a rule,[1] the extraordinary grace of healing was conveyed.[2] Nor does St. James make any allusion to the χάρισμα or grace of healing in this place. The unction, then, of which St. James speaks was intended primarily to heal the soul. The chief effect of the rite is definitely stated: "The Lord will raise him up; and if he has committed sins, it shall be forgiven him." No doubt bodily cure is indicated also as an effect of the unction, for the words "the prayer of faith will save the sick man," "the Lord will raise him up," include bodily healing. But as St. James saw the first generation of Christians dying out before his eyes, he cannot have supposed that this unction of the sick was an infallible remedy for disease. In short, we have all the constituents of a sacrament in these two verses of St. James. There is the outward sign—viz. unction by the priest accompanied with prayer. There is the grace given on condition of faith and repentance—viz. forgiveness of sins, the renewed health and strength of the soul, and, if God sees fit, of the body. There is institution by Christ, for St. James could not have asserted that the unction would convey grace, unless Christ, the author of grace, had promised that the grace of forgiveness and spiritual healing should accompany the use of the oil. Lastly, the effective sign of grace was to be employed permanently in the Church, for St. James recommends its use to Christians generally without distinction of time or place, and we find clear though scarcely abundant traces of its use in Christian antiquity. "Origen," says Chardon (tom. iv. p. 383), "rightly considering this last sacrament as a complement to that of penance, marks it out (Hom. 2 in Levit.) as a means which God has put into our hands in order that we may cleanse ourselves from our sins. St. John Chrysostom ('De Sacerdot.' i. p. 384) uses the passage of St. James already quoted, to show that priests have received from Jesus Christ the power to remit sins. Pope Innocent I., the contemporary of this last Father, speaks of the sacrament still more clearly in his letter to Decentius. . . . He puts extreme unction among the sacraments, telling Decentius it should not be given to penitents (still unreconciled), because it is a kind of sacrament." We can now pass on to consider one by one different points in the administration and doctrine of the sacrament.

1. The matter of the sacrament, according to the Council of Trent (sess. xiv. cap. 1), is "oil blessed by the bishop." Most theologians hold that this blessing is essential, though it suffices for validity if the blessing has been given by a priest who has received jurisdiction to do so.[1] Innocent, in the letter already referred to, says priests are permitted to administer the sacrament if the oil has been blessed by the bishop. The Council of Florence, in the Decree of Union, prescribes that the unction is to be given with olive oil on eyes, ears, nostrils, mouth, hands, feet, and reins, and such is the present custom of the Church, except that the unctio renum is omitted in the case of women. Some theologians hold that without unction of the five senses the sacrament is invalid. On the other hand, Chardon proves that the discipline of the Church on this matter has varied at different places, and in different times, to an extraordinary degree. The common practice was to anoint the five senses, but sometimes the unction was given only on one

[1] Mark xvi. 18; but sometimes supernatural cures of the body were effected by unction. See Mark vi. 13.

[2] Probably it is not the sacrament of unction which is mentioned in Mark vi.; but we may reasonably believe that it foreshadowed the sacrament, and was meant to prepare the disciples for Christ's further teaching on this point.

[1] The Greek priests bless the oil of the sick by commission from the bishop, and this custom of theirs was approved by Clement VIII. in a Constitution dated 1598. See Billuart, De Extrem. Unct. art. 2.

place—e.g. on the breast or on the seat of the malady. According to the Roman ritual the oil is applied in the form of a cross. The outside of a priest's hands is anointed, the inside of a lay person's, probably because the inside of the priest's hands has already been anointed in ordination.

2. The form of words used in the Roman Ritual is (at the unction of the eyes), "By this holy unction, and by his most tender mercy, may the Lord forgive thee whatsoever sin thou hast committed by sight," the same words being repeated at each unction, except that for "by sight," "by hearing," &c., is substituted. The Greek unction is also accompanied by prayer. Still, although a vast number of mediæval theologians have maintained that the words must be precatory, and although both Latins and Greeks [1] do in fact employ a form of the kind, the ancient Rituals contain sometimes precatory, sometimes absolute forms, sometimes such as are partly precatory, partly absolute; and hence the best critics (Mérard, Martène, Chardon, &c.) deny that a precatory form belongs to the essence of the sacrament. It seems to be enough if the unction is given "in the name of the Lord" and the words indicate the grace conferred.

3. The minister of the sacrament is a priest. "Let him bring in the presbyters of the Church." It is certain that a priest only can give this sacrament, and the present discipline of the Church forbids anyone but the parish priest,[2] or some other priest with his leave, to do so. Some difficulty has been caused by the letter of Innocent, in which he lays down the principle that the oil of the sick is to be blessed by the bishop and then used by all Christians in their need: "Quod" (sic apud Chardon) "ab episcopo confectum, non solum sacerdotibus sed et omnibus uti Christianis licet, in sua aut in suorum necessitate inungendum." At first sight, no doubt, these words seem to mean that Christians generally could apply the holy oil, and Tillemont thought it impossible to take them otherwise. Chardon, however, and many other authors, explain the words to mean that with the oil consecrated by the bishop all Christians might be anointed in their need—viz. by the priest. In ancient times all over the world several priests jointly administered the sacrament, though examples are not wanting of the administration by a single priest, so that clearly the ancient Church did not consider the presence of more than one priest essential. Among the Greeks the sick man is anointed by seven, or if that is impossible, by three priests. "Sometimes," says Chardon, speaking of ancient usage, "one priest applied the holy oil while the other pronounced the form of prayer; sometimes all together anointed the different parts of the body, each reciting the same form. Sometimes several priests anointed one part, others other parts, the prescribed prayers being recited by the anointing priests in each case."

4. The persons who may receive the sacrament. (a) They must be sick, as St. James declares, and the Council of Trent understands the Apostle to speak of dangerous sickness. Hence the sacrament is not intended for persons ill but not dangerously ill, or, again, for such as are in danger of death but not from sickness. After a sick man, among the Orientals, has been anointed, the priests anoint each other and the bystanders with the holy oil, but Renaudot points out that the prayers are said only over the sick man, so that evidently there is no intention of administering the sacrament except to him. (β) The sacrament being intended to remit sin, it cannot be received, according to the common opinion, except by those who have committed sin after baptism. Infants, therefore, and all such other persons as have never had the use of reason, are incapable of the sacrament. (γ) In order that it may be received with profit, the recipient must be in a state of grace. All the Oriental Rituals, according to Renaudot, prescribe previous confession.

4. The effects of the sacrament are thus stated by the Council of Trent (sess. xiv. cap. 2): "The inner part (res) and effect of this sacrament is set forth in these words—'And the prayer of faith will save the sick, and the Lord will raise him up, and if he be in sins they will be forgiven him.' For this inner part (res) is the grace of the Holy Spirit, whose unction wipes away sins, if any are still to be atoned for, and the remains of sin" (i.e. the proneness to evil, torpor, and weakness left by past and forgiven sins), "raises and strengthens the soul of the sick man, by awakening a great confidence in the divine mercy, by which confidence the sick man being relieved bears more patiently the troubles and pains of his sickness, more easily resists the temptations of the devil, ... and sometimes obtains health of body when it is expedient for the health of the soul."

Of course the sacrament cannot be contemned without great sin, and very often a person may be under a grave obligation of receiving it, on account of the care he is bound to take of his eternal salvation. Still the sacrament is not in itself necessary to salvation, and this may account for the fact that we hear so little of it in the first ages of the Church, when the heathen persecution made its administration a matter of serious difficulty. Some authors of the twelfth century held that it could only be received once by the same person; and, on the other hand, some ancient Rituals show that it was once customary in certain parts of the Church to reiterate the unction during seven successive days. Chardon refers to several ancient Rituals in proof, and St. Rembert, bishop of Hamburg, was anointed, as we learn from a contemporary Life, on several consecutive days. It is now certain, from the words of the Tridentine Council, that the sacrament may be received again and again by the same person if he recovers from a dangerous illness and afterwards falls into another; but once only by the same person while he remains under the same danger of death.

5. The time of administration. The present custom of the Church is to give it after the reception of Viaticum. Formerly, it was usual to administer it before Viaticum, and Chardon gives numerous instances from the churches of England, France, and Germany, in which this order was observed. St. Thomas evidently was accustomed to see extreme unction administered first, for he says ("Sum." iii. 65, a. 3), "By extreme unction a man is prepared worthily to receive Christ's body." Even from ancient times, however, instances of the present order may be adduced, so that the matter cannot be of any great moment. (Chiefly from Chardon, "Hist. des Sacrements.")

F

FABRIC. A church—that is, a building set apart for the public divine worship of the faithful—can only be erected with the approval of the bishop of the diocese, and after due provision has been made, by endowment or otherwise, for the permanent sustentation of the cure. Once built, canon law adopts many precautions with a view to its fabric being kept in good repair. The Council of Trent ordered that bishops, on their annual visitations, should see that churches which required repair received it,[1] and a later decree[2] specified the funds on which, and the persons on whom, this obligation rested. A parish church fallen out of repair was to be repaired, first of all, out of the fabric endowment fund, if such existed. If there were no such fund, or it were insufficient, the charge was to fall on the patron or patrons, and other persons deriving any benefit from the parochial endowment. If these resources were insufficient, the bishop was to compel the parishioners by every means in his power, omni appellatione remota, to defray the cost of the necessary repairs. Finally, if the poverty of all concerned were such as to disable them from meeting the outlay required, the bishop was to annex the parish either to that of its mother church (matricis ecclesiæ) or to some neighbouring parish, with leave to use the dilapidated church for secular purposes not of a mean or degrading character, after having erected a cross there. The erection of a cross is not now required.

The actual state of the law as to the reparation of the fabric is stated by Ferraris to be this. Those are bound to it in the first place on whom either custom or a statute imposes the burden. If there be no such custom or statute, the part of the endowment, if any, reserved to the fabric must be resorted to. If there be no such part, the legal obligation next falls on the revenue derived by the parish priest from the benefice, after deducting what is sufficient for his decent maintenance. Next, all others deriving benefit from the parochial revenues—e.g. lay impropriators of tithe—are bound to contribute. Under this head many disputed questions have arisen, on which special treatises must be consulted. These disputes resemble, in certain points, the long controversy between the Anglican clergy and the nonconformists respecting church rates—a controversy settled a few years ago by an Act (1874) which relieved the latter from the burden.

In the case of a cathedral church, the bishop is bound to put and keep it in repair, reserving to himself the right of taking legal steps against those who are bound to aid him in doing so (e.g. the chapter, or, in the last resort, the inferior clergy), or against those on whom the obligation is imposed by custom.

In France the duty of keeping churches in repair rests on the conseil de fabrique, an institution organised with admirable skill and completeness by a decree and an ordinance dated in 1809 and 1825, and corresponding to the vestry of an Anglican parish. The official persons on the council are called marguilliers (churchwardens).

FACULTY. I. A constituent part of a university, being the body of professors, lecturers, teachers, graduates, and students engaged in the study of a particular department of learning (e.g. medicine, law, theology, &c.), or stamped as proficients in the same. In a narrower sense, the term "faculty" is restricted to the professors labouring in this department of learning. These, in a normal state of things, form a council which meets periodically, under a dean elected by themselves, to arrange all questions respecting the due ordering and development of the studies of the faculty. If a university be fully organised, it has five faculties, viz. theology, arts (or, philosophy and letters), law, medicine, and natural science.

II. An authorisation properly authenticated, addressed to any person or persons by the Roman Pontiff or some Catholic prelate, empowering him or them to perform some act or occupy some position which they could not otherwise legally perform or occupy, is called a faculty.

FAITH. An act of divine faith is the undoubting assent given to revealed truths, not because of the evidence which can be produced for them, but simply because they are revealed by God. Thus the truths which faith accepts are not evident in themselves, or if evident, as is the case with the truths of natural religion, are not accepted with divine faith, because so evident.

Divine faith excludes all doubt. So much is implied in the very word, for nobody would say that we put faith in a man's statement if we doubted its truth; and the faith required in the New Testament is clearly incompatible with doubt. "I know," St. Paul says, "in whom I have believed, and I am certain" (2 Timothy i. 12).

Yet this exclusion of doubt is not caused by the mere force of the evidence. No words are needed to show that the truths of the Christian religion—such, e.g., as the divinity of Christ, the personality of the Holy Ghost, the atoning efficacy of Christ's death—are not self-evident. Moreover, the evidences of Revelation, which is in the first place an historical fact, are not of such a nature as absolutely, like metaphysical or mathematical reasoning, to constrain assent. No doubt, from the fulfilment of prophecy; from the way in which the Gospel triumphed; from the moral character and teaching of Christ; and from other grounds of a like kind, we get an accumulation of arguments, certissima signa et omnium intelligentiæ accommodata, "most certain proofs, and suited to the intelligence of all," as the Vatican Council says,[1] which, taken together, make it perfectly certain that Christianity is divine, and are abundantly sufficient to convince a prudent man that he ought to assent undoubtingly to the truths which the Church of Christ propounds. Still, all this evidence is not enough in itself to account for the certainty of divine faith, the very highest of all certainty.

We must, then, make a sharp distinction between the "motives of credibility" on the one hand, and faith on the other. On account of these motives we prudently judge that the truths faith accepts are deserving of belief. If some knowledge of the arguments in favour of Christianity did not prepare us to believe it, our belief would be unreasonable and fanatical; nor could anyone be justly condemned for lacking faith. The arguments are not, however, of such a nature as to constrain assent, and men will form very different opinions of their strength according to their moral dispositions. That Christ, for example, in the Sermon on the Mount, "spake as never man spake" is a strong argument for the divinity of our religion, but it will scarcely come home to a man who cares little for moral excellence. In short, the "motives of credibility" are necessary: a man incurs great moral responsibility by the way in which he deals with them; but they cannot produce the absolute and perfect certainty of faith.

When the mind is convinced that the objects of faith are worthy of belief and that here and now there is an obligation of accepting them, the grace of God fills the soul with a pious inclination to believe ("pia affectio ad credendum"), having for its motive that duty and obligation of believing which has been brought home to it by the motives of credibility, and then, putting aside all doubt and looking away from all human arguments and motives, it assents simply on the authority of God who reveals the truth in question. God cannot deceive and cannot be deceived. He is the eternal essential truth, and hence truths received on His word are more certain than any of those which present themselves to natural reason.

The reader will observe that the Catholic Church is not mentioned in the definition with which we began. The reason is that faith does not rest on the authority of creatures. It is a theological virtue—i.e. one which relates immediately to God, and therefore it is founded ultimately upon His word and on that alone. The Church is the ordinary and the infallible means by which we know what the truths are which God has revealed. The testimony of the Church is the rule by which we can distinguish between true and false doctrine. In other words, we learn from the Church that God has spoken, and then because of His word, not because of the Church's authority, we believe without doubt. It is possible, moreover, for a man who does not believe in the infallibility of the Church to possess true and divine faith. He may have assured himself on good grounds—e.g. by the reading of Scripture—that God has revealed certain truths; he may without fault of his own be ignorant of the Church's authority, and be perfectly willing to accept the whole of divine revelation so far as he knows it. If such a man, moved by the grace of God, receives the revealed truths with which he is acquainted on the divine word, then he has done all that is necessary to constitute an act of faith.

"Without faith it is impossible to please God." Man is intended for a supernatural end; he must know this end, for otherwise he cannot direct his actions so as to reach it, and this knowledge can never be attained by natural reason. Ignorance may excuse a man for living in heresy and schism; nothing can excuse the lack of faith, and God gives every man the means of attaining it. No man can be saved who does not at least believe with divine faith that God exists and that He rewards those who seek Him (Heb. xi. 6). A great many theologians say that under the present dispensation it is absolutely necessary for salvation to know and believe the mysteries of the Trinity and the Incarnation. This is a doubtful point, but it is certain that all who have the opportunity are bound to acquaint themselves with the primary truths of religion contained in the Creed, and to know the commandments of God and the Church, as well as the most essential truths regarding the sacraments and their use. Moreover, all are bound (and can only be excused from doing so by invincible ignorance) to believe all that the Church teaches. Of course a person is not bound to ascertain all the definitions of the Church, but he must believe that the Church cannot err, and that whatever it teaches is infallibly true. Although faith is necessary, it is not sufficient for salvation unless it is perfected by charity. In the latter case it is the "faith working by charity" of which St. Paul speaks (Gal. v. 6) as opposed to that "faith without works which is dead." Still faith without charity is a true faith, for a man immersed in vice may accept the truths of revelation with a supernatural belief. The virtue of faith, however, is destroyed by a single act of disbelief[1] in revealed truth previously accepted on the authority of God.

(Any of the treatises "De Fide" in dogmatic theologians may be consulted, and also Concil. Trident. De Justific. sess. vi., Concil. Vatic. De Fide, cap. iii., and the corresponding canons. The possibility of a habit of faith in infants is explained in the article on BAPTISM, the rule of faith in those on the CHURCH and on the POPE.)

FAITHFUL (fideles) in itself means, persons who have the faith; but even in [1] So that, e.g. if a Catholic ceases to believe in Transubstantiation but continues to believe in the Trinity, his acceptance of the latter is merely a natural assent and does not proceed from divine faith. This is the general, though not the universal, teaching of Catholic theologians.

Acts x. 45 (οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς πιστοί) we find the word used as a technical expression for persons incorporated by baptism and Christian profession into the Church, and this use of the word has been continued ever since. Thus the "Mass of the Faithful" was distinguished from the "Mass of the Catechumens," although catechumens might of course have faith; and in the same sense the Church constantly prays in the Mass and office for the faithful, living and dead.

FALDSTOOL (faldistorium). A seat which can easily be moved, and which is used by bishops and other prelates in the sanctuary when they do not occupy the throne. The faldstool is much more simple than the throne, the latter being covered with a baldacchino and furnished with a back and arms. Moreover, the faldstool, unlike the throne, may be occupied by a prelate who has no ordinary jurisdiction. Thus the Congregation of Rites requires auxiliary bishops and administrators when assisting pontifically at Mass to content themselves with the faldstool. However, a bishop in his own diocese sometimes sits in or kneels at a faldstool—e.g. in giving Confirmation, in making his thanksgiving after Mass, &c.

FALSE DECRETALS. The collection ostensibly made by Isidorus Mercator, in the middle of the ninth century, passes by this name. [See CANON LAW.] The exact date of its first appearance cannot be determined. It could not have been before 829, because it quotes a canon of a Council of Paris held in that year.[1] Before 845, according to Möhler,[2] it was well known and often quoted; he therefore dates its composition between 829 and 845; the place of origin he believes to have been Mayence. Hinschius, on the other hand, thinks that the place of origin was Rheims, and that the work was compiled between 847 and 853. It is quite uncertain who wrote it. It has been variously ascribed to Benedictus Levita of Mayence, to Paschasius Radbert, to Otgar, archbishop of Mayence, and to Agobard, archbishop of Lyons. All that is known on the subject is that the writer chose to call himself Isidorus Mercator ("Peccator" in some MSS.), probably after the great St. Isidore, who had made a similar compilation [CANON LAW, p. 114]; that (if his preface speaks the truth) he had been strongly urged by many ecclesiastics of rank to make such a collection, and that the frequent miscarriages of justice which he had seen, owing to uncertainty as to the law and the jurisdiction, had powerfully impelled him to undertake the work.

The collection, as soon as made, passed into immediate acceptance and use; it met a palpable want, and no one thought of questioning the genuineness of the Papal letters which it contained. It opens with the fifty Apostolic Canons [see that article] received and published by Dionysius Exiguus; then it proceeds to give a quantity of decretal letters written by early Popes, from Clement of Rome, one of the Apostolic Fathers, to Melchiades, at the end of the third century. None of these letters are genuine. A quantity of conciliar decrees, beginning with those of Nicæa, and ending with the second Council of Seville (619) are next inserted; many of these are unauthentic. To the decrees of councils a fresh series of decretal letters of Popes succeeds, beginning with Sylvester (who succeeded Melchiades) and ending with Gregory the Great. In this series the first that is genuine is a letter of Pope Siricius (384–399). The last thing in the compilation is a copy of the canons passed by Gregory II. (†731) at a council held at Rome.

According to a Prorestant writer, this famous collection comprehends "the whole dogmatic system and discipline of the Church, the whole hierarchy, from the highest to the lowest degree, their sanctity and immunities, their persecutions, their disputes, their right of appeal to Rome. They are full and minute on Church property, on its usurpation and spoliation; on ordinations, on the sacraments, on baptism, confirmation, marriage, the Eucharist; on fasts and festivals; the discovery of the cross; the discovery of the reliques of the Apostles; on the chrism, holy water, consecration of churches, blessing of the fruits of the field; on the sacred vessels and habiliments."[1]

Of the unknown author, Möhler writes:—"Pseudo-Isidore seized exactly that in his own age which corresponded to the wishes of all the higher and better order of men. Thence it was that this legislation was so joyfully received. No one suspected anything false, because it contained so much that was weighty and true. If we examine carefully these invented decretals, and try to characterise their composer in accordance with their general import and spirit, we must confess that he was a very learned man, perhaps the most learned man of his time, and at the same time an extremely intelligent and wise man, who knew his age and its wants as few did. Rightly he perceived that he must exalt the power of the centre—that is, of the Pope—because by that way only was deliverance possible. Nay, if we would pass an unconstrained judgment, we may venture even to call him a great man."

[1] This is Möhler's view, but Hefele (art. in Wetzer and Welte) thinks it as likely that the council quoted from the Pseudo-Isidore as the other way. This is a sample of the inextricable difficulties by which the determination of date and authorship is surrounded.

Nevertheless, the work is in great part what we now call a forgery; anachronisms and blunders have been discovered in it, which force this conclusion on the mind of every fair critic. But at the time of its appearance, and for many centuries afterwards, it was in such thorough harmony with the prevalent temper of European society, and with the ecclesiastico-political ideas which were held to indicate the true path of human progress, that those who appealed to it, and even those whose action was thwarted by it, never troubled themselves to question the authenticity of the documents which it contained. Supposing some one in the twelfth century had anticipated the labour of the moderns, and announced the spuriousness of a great part of the decretals; what then? The feeling would have been: what Fabian, Cornelius, Sylvester, &c., are made to say is true and useful; if they did not actually write it, they might have written it; if these are not the genuine letters, then the genuine letters which they did write, and which would have been to much the same effect as these, have been lost; finally, if the Popes of the third century did not command all this, the Popes of the twelfth century are ready to command it, because it is true, wholesome, and highly necessary to be observed. If in the fourteenth century some one had demonstrated the spuriousness of the charters (see the "Chronicle of Ingulfus") by which Croyland Abbey held its lands; what then? The lands had unquestionably been given to the abbey; but the title-deeds had been lost or destroyed during the Danish invasions: and when a litigious race like the Normans, who would not be satisfied except by the production of actual documents, got possession of England, the monks had to manufacture charters, utterly false as to the form, but true as to the substance, or they would have been ousted from their possessions. A passage in the preface of the Pseudo-Isidore shows plainly enough that some similar motive was present to him in making his compilation. "Most good Christians," he says, "keep silence [when wrong is done] for this reason, and put up with the sins of others which they know, because they are often unprovided with documents by which they could prove to the ecclesiastical judges things which they themselves know; since, although certain things may be true, those things only are to be believed by judges which are demonstrated by certain proofs, established by a clear sentence, and published in judicial form and order." To supply "documents" so desirable, and also to provide for the use of the faithful generally a store of authoritative statements on matters affecting Christian life within the Church, seem to have been the principal objects of the writer.

The first note of doubt respecting the genuineness of the work came from Nicholas of Cusa, an eminent theologian of the fifteenth century. The Magdeburg Centuriators [CHURCH HISTORY] took up the matter eagerly, and many Protestant writers following them have shown much zeal in demonstrating the unauthentic character of most of the decretals, imagining that they were in some way sapping the foundations of the Papal power by doing so. The fact really is, that the authority of the Popes derives no confirmation from the False Decretals, but that the False Decretals derived the currency and influence which they once had from their agreement with the idea of the Papal power pre-existing in the minds of men. The life of our own St. Wilfrid, the story of the foundation of the Anglo-Saxon and German churches, the letters of St. Leo the Great, and innumerable other evidences, show that there is absolutely nothing new in the doctrine of the Pseudo-Isidore on the Papal power.

Moreover, as has been shown by Phillips and Hefele, it is certain that the greater number of the spurious documents incorporated by the Pseudo-Isidore in his collection were not manufactured by him, but had been in existence, some for a longer, others for a shorter period of time. Such are the Apostolic Canons, the Donation of Constantine, the Letter of Pope Sylvester, &c. &c.

The names of the principal writers on this question are:—the brothers Ballerini, Dumont, Eichhorn, Gfrörer, Hefele, Hinschius, Knust, Möhler, Noorden, Phillips, Rosshirt, Spittler, Walter, and Wasserschleben.

FAMILIAR. The familiaris of a Pope or bishop is a person belonging to his household, who is supported by him or at his table, and renders him domestic, but not menial, services. It is not necessary that he should live under the same roof with his master, but the law will not treat him as his familiar if he lives habitually out of the diocese, or in a distant city. The nephews and cousins of a bishop living in his palace, in order to be considered his familiars, must render him real service.

For eight centuries previous to the French Revolution, the clerical profession —owing to the largeness of the clerical immunities and the wealth and power possessed by the Church—was the object of desire to many whose motives were mixed, or altogether worldly. An easy way by which such persons could obtain ordination, was by entering the household or family of a bishop. It was commonly and reasonably held that a bishop ordaining members of his own family, knew what he was about, and would not lay hands on unworthy persons; great freedom, therefore, in respect to these ordinations was for a long time allowed. But abuses arose; a class of ecclesiastics without benefices appeared, who hung about Rome and the great episcopal cities, and were importunate petitioners to the holders of preferment. Hence the Council of Trent decreed [1] that no bishop should be able to ordain his familiar, who was not his subditus,[2] unless he had first lived with him three years, and unless the bishop, immediately and actually, confirmed a benefice upon him.

The familiars of the Pope [CURIA ROMANA—Famiglia Pontificia] enjoy many privileges Cardinal priests have the right of conferring on their familiars, if they have lived three years with them, the tonsure and the other minor orders. A Constitution of Innocent XII. ("Speculatores domus Israel") adds to the requirements of the Council of Trent the condition that before ordaining his familiar, if not his subditus, the bishop must make him produce testimonial letters from the bishop of origin or domicile. FAN (flabellum muscarium; whence esmoucher, mouchoir: ῥιπίς, ῥιπίδιον) is mentioned as a liturgical instrument in the Apostolic Constitutions, viii. 12. There the rule directs that between the offertory and communion two deacons stand by the altar and use fans of linen, fine skin, or peacocks' feathers to drive away insects and keep them from touching the sacred vessels. The use of the fan during the consecration is also mentioned in the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom. Indeed, ancient writers speak of the "holy" or "mystical fan" (ἅγιον ῥιπίδιον, μυστικὴ ῥιπίς), and regard it as one of the insignia of the deacon's office. Although the fan is not mentioned in the ancient Roman "Ordines," its liturgical use was undoubtedly known in the West, for we find it noticed in ancient monastic rules—e.g. in that drawn up by St. Benignus of Dijon, and in the Dominican ceremonial. The Western Church does not seem to have reserved its use to deacons. After the fourteenth century it fell into disuse throughout the West. However, magnificent fans of peacocks' feathers are still carried by the attendants of the Pope in solemn processions, and in several Italian churches—according to the writer of the article on this subject in Kraus' "Archäolog. Encyclopadie"—the use of the fan is still retained, not only in processions but also at the altar.

FAST. 1. The Principle of Fasting.—Theologians distinguish the natural from the ecclesiastical fast. The former consists in total abstinence from food and drink, and is required of those who are about to communicate; the latter, which alone concerns us here, imposes limits both on the kind and quantity of our food. What these limits are will be explained in the course of this article, but the definition given is sufficient for our immediate purpose—viz. to justify the Catholic practice from reason and revelation. Experience tells us that there is a perpetual struggle between the spirit and the body, and that mortification of the flesh is a great means of preventing it from inciting us to rebellion against God's law. Again, by denying ourselves the lawful pleasures of sense, we are able to turn with greater freedom and earnestness to the thought of God and virtue, so that spiritual writers speak of fasting as one of the wings of prayer. Lastly, our conscience tells us (and even heathens have felt and acknowledged it) that we ought to suffer for our sins and mortify the flesh which has offended God.

However, we are not left to the mere exercise of reason on this point. Fasting as a means of grace has been approved by God Himself. A day of fasting—viz., the Day of Atonement on the tenth day of the seventh month—was imposed by God on the Israelites. Moses and Elias, those great servants of God, fasted for forty days: so did Christ Himself before beginning His public ministry. He takes for granted ("when ye fast," Matt. vi. 16) that his disciples will fast, and warns them against doing so ostentatiously. The Apostles fasted (Acts xiii. 2, xiv. 22, 2 Cor. xi. 27), and St. Paul expressly speaks of fasting as a means by which Christians are to commend themselves as servants of God.[1] It may, indeed, be objected that, after all, no fasting-days are imposed under precept in the New Testament, and that therefore the Catholic is different from the Apostolic idea of fasting. To this it may be answered that of such Protestants as make this objection scarcely any ever fast at all, and most of them would regard the practice as superstitious, a plain proof of the Church's wisdom in providing for the weakness of human nature by positive legislation. Besides, as St. Thomas points out, secular princes have the right of making regulations more strict and definite than the precepts of the natural law, in order to promote the welfare of their subjects. The natural law requires us to pay just debts: the prince may order them to be paid within a certain time and with certain formalities. The Church surely may take similar means of securing the spiritual well-being of its subjects. The law of nature imposes the duty of fasting: our spiritual rulers determine the time and the way in which this duty is to be performed.

2. The Present Law of the Church.—All baptised persons who have completed their twenty-first year are bound under mortal sin (see Prop. 23 condemned by Alexander VII.) to observe the days of fasting. On these days they are required not to eat more than one full meal, which must not be taken before midday. They may, however, take wine, &c., at discretion, for drink, according to the maxim received among theologians, does not break the fast, unless the drink be such as chocolate and the like, which are really intended to nourish rather than to satisfy thirst or maintain the animal spirits. Of course a person may by drinking wine in large quantities act against the spirit of the law and forfeit the advantages which fasting is intended to secure. Even at the full meal flesh meat is prohibited. Eggs, milk, cheese, &c., are only forbidden during Lent. Besides this single meal, the Church permits a collation of about eight ounces, consisting of fruit, vegetables, bread, &c., or even of fish, provided that the fish are small, or that not more than two or three ounces of larger fish be taken. Custom, moreover, at least in England, allows about two ounces of bread to be taken at breakfast. Persons engaged in hard labour; the poor who have a difficulty in obtaining sufficient food at any time; those who are over sixty years of age; persons in weak health, &c., are excused from the law of fasting.

By a recent indult granted to the English bishops the use of milk, butter, and cheese at collation on fasting days is permitted.

3. History of Fasting.—From the earliest times Catholics have observed fasting days of precept. Tertullian, contrasting the numerous fasts of the Montanists with the less strict observance of Catholics, says of the latter, "They think that in the Gospel those days are marked out for fasting during which the bridegroom was taken away"—i.e. the days of Holy Week, alluding to Luke v. 35. St. Jerome (Ep. 54), making the same comparison between Montanists and Catholics, says, "We fast one Lent according to the tradition of the Apostles." St. Ambrose (Serm. 25) asserts that it is "no light sin" to break the fast of Lent. The Greek Fathers hold similar language; and one of them, St. Epiphanius ("Hær." 75), tells us that Ærius the heresiarch was condemned because he maintained that all fasting on particular days was a matter of devotion, not of obligation.

As to the manner of fasting, it may be said generally that there was less formal precept and therefore greater variety of custom; but that still fasting in the early was much more severe than in the modern

[1] 2 Cor. vi. 5; νηστείαις can only mean voluntary abstinence from food, as Meyer, ad loc., proves. In xi. 27, fasting (ἐν νηστείαις) is clearly distinguished from involuntary want of food (ἐν λιμῷ καὶ δίψει).

Church. Throughout East and West, Catholics abstained on fasting days from wine as well as from flesh meat, the former as well as the latter being only permitted in cases of weak health. The Fathers constantly put abstinence from wine and animal food on the same level. The days of Holy Week were known as days of xerophagy, or dry food (Epiphan. in "Exposit. Fid." n. 22; "Constit. Ap." v. 17), because then the faithful were accustomed to feed on bread and salt, to which some added vegetables. The meal was not taken before sunset (Greg. Nyss. "Orat. in Princip. Jejun."): till that time an absolute fast even from water was observed. Hence the ancient custom in the Latin Church of celebrating Mass during Lent in the evening and encouraging all the faithful to communicate at it. Dinner —i.e. the midday meal—and fasting were regarded in ancient times as incompatible; so much so that in order to comply with the law of the Church which forbade fasting on Sundays, the ancient monks took their single meal on that day at noon. Usually the faithful went to church on week-days in Lent at 3 P.M. for none, followed by Mass and vespers, after which they were at liberty to eat. We find the first traces of relaxation near the close of the eighth century. Theodulf, bishop of Orleans, in a Capitulary of 797, blames people who began to eat at the hour of none (3 P.M.) without waiting for office or Mass. About the same time Charlemagne introduced the custom of having none sung at his Court an hour before the usual time, in order to spare the courtiers, who dined after him at several tables in succession according to their rank. Ratherius, Bishop of Verona, in the middle of the tenth century, speaks of this custom of dining at noon as already established. St. Thomas (2^a 2^{ae}, qu. 147, 7) fully recognises the lawfulness of this usage. He even considers it enough if the meal was taken about the hour of none, and makes allowance for persons in weak health who were unable to fast so long and needed dispensation to eat earlier in the day. The offices of none, Mass and vespers were all concluded in the later part of the middle ages before three o'clock, and Paludanus and other schoolmen were so little aware of the ancient discipline of the Church on this point that they regarded the old prohibition to eat before evening ("ante vesperam") as meaning simply that the fast was not to be broken before the vesper office; thus completely ignoring the fact that the hour of vespers during Lent had been changed. Lastly, the rule of St. Thomas that the fast might be broken about none was interpreted more and more loosely till, in 1500, we find the synodal decrees of Paris approving the modern custom of taking the meal at midday. The Greeks, according to Goar, have adopted the same relaxation.

The word "collation," in its present sense, marks another important change in the manner of fasting. St. Benedict in his rule requires his religious to assemble after supper and before compline and listen to "collations"—i.e. conferences (of Cassian), the Lives of the Fathers, or other edifying books which were then read aloud by one of their number. Now, in an ancient monastic rule known as the "Regula Magistri," we find the religious permitted on the special fasts of the order to partake together of wine and water in very moderate quantity; and in a chapter-general of abbots and monks held at Aix la Chapelle, in 817, the monks were permitted to drink before compline, even on fasts of the Church, if wearied by manual labour, the recitation of the office of the dead in addition to the ordinary office, or the like. This refreshment was taken just before the reading of the "collations;" and in 1308, in a statute of the congregation of Clugny, we meet with the word "collation" used for this refreshment. It was not till a still later date that any solid food was taken on fasting days in the Western Church, except at the single meal. The Greeks, indeed, even in the eleventh century, ate of fruits and vegetables in moderate quantity over and above the single meal, but Cardinal Humbert reproached them with breaking the fast by this very practice. St. Thomas only permits the use of "electuaria" out of the single meal on the ground that they were taken as medicine, not as food. In Gerson's time, a collation of vegetable food was approved by custom. The rule of the Theatines, drawn up under Clement VII., mentions these collations and the spiritual reading which accompanied them. The quantity permissible at collation has been gradually enlarged. St. Charles, in the rules which he made for his servants, only allows them a glass of wine with an ounce and a half of bread to be taken as a collation on the evening of fasting days.

(The present rules of fasting will be found in any modern treatise on Moral Theology. The principle of fasting, and the practice of his own time, are explained by St. Thomas, "Summa," 2ª 2æ, qu. 147. The sketch of the history of fasting given above, and the references, are taken from the "Traité sur les Jeunes," by Thomassin.)

FATHER (TITLE OF) was given in early times to all bishops. The title of spiritual father was also used to designate confessors, and thus an early Benedictine rule provides that none of the religious should become a spiritual father without leave from his abbot. Lastly, the head of a monastery was called "Father," this name being of course a translation of the Oriental word abbot. [See also the beginning of the art. POPE.]

FATHERS OF THE CHURCH. The appellation of Fathers is used in a more general and a more restricted sense. In a general sense it denotes all those Christian writers of the first twelve centuries who are reckoned by general consent among the most eminent witnesses and teachers of the orthodox and Catholic doctrine of the Church. Taken in this sense, it includes some names on which there rests more or less the reproach of heterodox doctrine. Origen, whose works, as we have them, contain grave errors frequently condemned by the highest authority in the Church, is one of these. Nevertheless, his writings are of the highest value for their orthodox contents. Eusebius of Cæsarea is another. Tertullian became an open apostate from the Catholic Church; yet his writings as a Catholic are among the most excellent and precious remains of antiquity. There are some others included among the Fathers in this greater latitude of designation who have not the mark of eminent sanctity.

In its stricter sense the appellation denotes only those ancient writers whose orthodoxy is unimpeachable, whose works are of signal excellence or value, and whose sanctity is eminent and generally recognised. The following list includes the names of the most illustrious Fathers, according to the most exclusive sense of this honourable title:—

First Century—St. Clement of Rome. Second Century—St. Ignatius, St. Justin, St. Irenæus. Third Century—St. Cyprian, St. Dionysius of Alexandria. Fourth Century—St. Athanasius, St. Hilary of Poitiers, St. Cyril of Jerusalem, St. Basil, St. Gregory Nazianzen, St. Gregory of Nyssa, St. Ephrem, St. Ambrose, St. Optatus, St. Epiphanius, St. John Chrysostom. Fifth Century—St. Jerome, St. Augustine, St. Cyril of Alexandria, St. Leo the Great, St. Prosper, St. Vincent of Lerins, St. Peter Chrysologus. Sixth Century—St. Cæsarius of Arles, St. Gregory the Great. Seventh Century—St. Isidore of Seville. Eighth Century—Ven. Bede, St. John Damascene. Eleventh Century—St. Peter Damian, St. Anselm. Twelfth Century—St. Bernard. A complete collection of the works of the Fathers contains many more names than these. Moreover, it is plain that the Fathers of the first six centuries, by the mere fact of their priority in time, are much more valuable witnesses to primitive faith and order, and that their writings are in a stricter sense sources of theological tradition, than the works of those who came later, however illustrious the latter may be. There is also a gradation of rank among the Fathers, some having a much higher authority than others. As private doctors, no one of them has a final and indisputable authority taken singly, except in so far as his teaching is warranted by some extrinsic and higher criterion, or supported by its intrinsic reasons. As witnesses, each one singly, or several concurring together, must receive that credence which is reasonably due in view of all the qualities and circumstances of the testimony given. Their morally unanimous consent concerning matters pertaining to faith has a decisive and irrefragable authority. It has always been held that God raised up in the earlier ages of the Church these highly gifted, learned, and holy men, and endowed them with special and extraordinary graces that they might be the principal teachers of the mysteries and doctrines of the faith. Their writings are the great source of light and truth in theology, after the Holy Scriptures. The authority of their doctrine, in the proper sense of that word, is nevertheless derived from the sanction of the Ecclesia Docens, the only supreme and infallible tribunal.

FEAR OF GOD falls into two great divisions. Servile fear is the fear such as a slave might have for his master, and it looks to the punishments which God inflicts. Filial fear is the fear of sons; it consists in dread of offending God who is worthy of all love, and of being separated from Him by sin.

If servile fear be so utterly servile that it is united with the will to sin if only it were possible so to do without risk of punishment, it is of course evil. But the fear of God's punishments proceeds, according to the Council of Trent, from the Holy Ghost, disposes the sinners to justification, and remains even in the saints while on earth and still liable to fall. "Perfect charity" does, indeed, "cast out fear (1 John iv. 18), but it does this only so far as a man perfected in the love of God has a growing knowledge that his conscience is free from sins which will incur the judgment of God, and has also an increasing confidence in God's mercy. The fear of God's judgment still remains, and the saints more than other men were ready to make the Psalmist's words their own: "Pierce my flesh with thy fear: for I am afraid because of thy judgments" (Ps. cxviii.).

Filial fear increases with the increase of charity, since the more a soul loves God the more it will fear offending Him, so long as there is any danger of doing so. Even this filial fear of offending God is absent in the case of the blessed, because they are not exposed to any such peril. But they are still said to fear God in the sense that they constantly recognise their own nothingness, and revere God's infinite majesty. (See St. Thomas, "Summa," 2^a $2^{æ}$, qu. 19; Estius on 1 John iv.)

FEASTS OF THE CHURCH. Days on which the Church joyfully commemorates particular mysteries of the Christian religion or the glory of her saints. Such days have not been imposed on us, as on the Jews, by the express enactment of God, and in this as in other respects the Christian law is one of liberty. The whole life of a perfect Christian is, as Origen says, a perpetual feast, on which he dies to sin, rises with Christ, and receives the gifts of the Holy Spirit. But the Church has wisely instituted recurring festivals, which impress the great truths of religion on our minds, and bid us remember that "we are the children of the saints."[1]

At first the number of the Church's feasts was small. Easter, the Ascension, Pentecost were celebrated in St. Augustine's time, and, as he believed, by Apostolic tradition. He was familiar with the feasts of Christmas and Epiphany. The feasts of martyrs were at first only local, and those of confessors were of later introduction even as local feasts. We may form some idea of the number of feasts during the first five centuries from a Calendar of the African church published by Mabillon. It is, according to that great critic, the most ancient which we possess, and it agrees in a remarkable degree with a list given by Possidius of St. Augustine's sermons on the festivals. This Calendar notes feasts of African martyrs, and of some confessors. It mentions also the feasts of certain martyrs not Africans—e.g. St. Stephen, St. Lawrence, St. Vincent, SS. Gervasius and Protasius, of St. James the Greater, of "the Holy Apostles," of St. John Baptist, the Holy Innocents, St. Andrew, St. Luke, and the Machabees. It gives no feast of the Blessed Virgin, nor is there a word in St. Augustine's genuine works which would lead us to believe that such feasts were known to him. Thomassin thinks the multiplication of feasts and their more solemn observance must be attributed in great measure to the monastic orders.

(1) Feasts are divided into holidays of obligation ("festa fori"), on which the faithful are bound to hear Mass and rest from servile work, and holidays which the Church observes in the Mass and office without imposing any obligation on the faithful.

(2) Again, feasts are divided, according to their rank, into doubles, semi-doubles, simples, &c. The following seems to be the origin of these names. Lanfranc speaks of double, simple, and semi-double offices. It was the custom, till late in the middle ages, always to recite the office of the feria [see FERIA], in spite of any feast which might occur on it. Hence on greater solemnities, clerics were obliged to recite a double office—one of the feria, another of the feast. These double offices were few in number: even the office for the feasts of the Apostles was not double. On lesser feasts the office was simple—i.e. the feast was merely commemorated—and on a third class of feasts the office of the feria and feast were welded into one, much after the fashion of the modern breviary offices for certain Sundays in the Octave—e.g. of the Ascension. These last offices were called semi-double. As time went on the ferial gave way more and more to the festal offices, and we find Durandus, who died in 1296, using the words "double," "semi-double," "simple," in a

[1] St. Paul reproaches the Galatians (iv. 10) for observing "days" (such as the Sabbath), "months" (such as the Feast of the New Moon), "times" (καιρούς, annual festivals, such as the Passover), "years" (such as the Sabbatical Year and Year of Jubilee, &c.). The reference is clearly to Jewish feasts. The Apostles themselves observed "days," viz. Sundays.

new sense. He applies the word "double," not to the two offices recited on one day, but to the single office of a feast on which the antiphons were doubled—i.e. repeated fully at the beginning and end of a psalm. On semi-doubles, half of the antiphon was repeated before, the whole after the psalm: in other words, it was half doubled. The office for simple feasts differed little from that of the feria. The practice of taking the hymn on simples from the common of saints and reciting the Sunday psalms at lauds only dates from Pius V.

In the modern office-books the doubles are further subdivided into doubles of the first class, doubles of the second class, greater doubles, and ordinary doubles. The object of this division is to determine which of two feasts must give way to the other, should both fall on the same day. The inferior feast is either transferred to some other day or commemorated at certain portions of the office—e.g. Mass, lauds, &c. Further, certain great feasts have octaves—i.e. are celebrated throughout eight days, and on the eighth with special solemnity. Lastly, feasts are moveable or immoveable, according as the time of their celebration is fixed for a particular day of the civil year, or calculated from Easter.

The Pope or General Councils may make feasts of obligation for the whole Church; a bishop may do so for his own diocese, after consulting the clergy and faithful. But a bishop cannot, on his own authority, institute new feasts, alter the breviary or missal, nor can he change the rank of feasts—e.g. by making a semi-double a double—except by Apostolic indult or leave from the Congregation of Rites.

(See Thomassin, "Traité des Festes;" Gavantus with Merati's notes; and Probst, "Brevier und Brevier-gebet." There was a celebrated controversy between Grancolas, who explained the origin of the terms "double," "simple," &c., from the old practice of reciting two offices, and Guyetus, who argued that the term "double" referred to the doubling of the antiphon. An account of the arguments of both is given by Merati on Gavantus, P. II. sec. iii. cap. 2. The view of Probst, which we have followed, does justice to the facts adduced on either side.)

FEBRONIANISM. A name given to certain views on the constitution of the Church and the relations of Church and State, which may be roughly described as an exaggeration of Gallicanism. They were propounded in the middle of last century by an author who assumed the name of Febronius.

His real name was John Nicolas von Hontheim. He was born of a noble family at Treves in 1701, and studied canon law with great diligence at Louvain, under the famous Van Espen. The principles which Hontheim learned from his professor evidently left a lasting impression on his mind, for Van Espen was remarkable for his spirit of opposition to Rome[1] no less than for his undoubted talents and learning. Having taken his Doctor's degree in law, Hontheim returned to his native city and lectured on the "Digest" in the University of Treves from 1732 to 1738. Ten years later, he was consecrated suffragan or auxiliary bishop of Treves with a title in partibus, and under three successive Prince-Archbishops exercised great influence, both on the spiritual administration of the archdiocese and on the temporal government of the electorate. He was justly esteemed for his exemplary life, and, in spite of engrossing occupations, he found time to write and publish two learned works on the history of Treves; nor was it till he had reached old age that he did anything to tarnish his fair name. In 1763 a book appeared under the following title:—"De Statu Ecclesiæ et de legitima Potestate Romani Pontificis, liber singularis ad reuniendos dissidentes in religione Christianos compositus. Bullioni." The real name of the author remained for a considerable time unknown, and at this day the name of Febronius, which occurred to Hontheim as a nom de plume because his niece was called Febronia in religion, is familiar to many who never heard of Hontheim himself. The book, however, soon became notorious. It put into shape opinions which were exceedingly popular at the time—nowhere more so than among German Catholics.

Christ, according to Febronius, had conferred the power of the keys on the whole body of the faithful, although it was to the prelates of the Church that the actual administration of the power was committed. Each bishop, as a successor of the Apostles, received his power straight from God, and had unlimited authority to dispense, judge heresy, and consecrate other bishops. Peter, indeed, and his successors, were endowed by Christ with the primacy, but through this primacy—which, by the way, was not necessarily attached to the Roman see—the Pope was superior to his brethren in the episcopate, only so far as a metropolitan is superior to the other bishops of his province. Moreover, although the Pope was superior to any single bishop, the body of the episcopate was superior to him. He could do nothing against the canons, his power being confined to watching over their execution. An appeal might always be made from the Pope to a general council, since the Pope was not a supreme, and much less an infallible, judge; nor could it be said that a council without the Pope was like a body without its head, since the Pope had to exercise his primacy in the Church, not over it. Without the consent of the Church, he could issue no laws of universal obligation, and it was idle to try and enforce such laws by threatening the disobedient with excommunication. True, partly by the concessions of the bishops themselves, still more by Papal extortion, the power of the Holy See had grown to monstrous dimensions; but it was high time to restore primitive discipline. To effect this, it was the duty of the bishops to refrain from publishing in their dioceses such Papal bulls as were injurious to episcopal authority, while secular princes ought to promote the same end by convoking General Councils, and by availing themselves of the Placet and appel comme d'abus, and by open refusal to submit.

These propositions are manifestly opposed to Catholic doctrine, and they are not even consistent with each other. The book, moreover, was every way unworthy of its author, for it shows no sign of the learning which he actually possessed. What he said, had been said before by Richer and by the Spaniard Tostatus, but Febronius does not seem even to have had recourse to them, and was content to draw from Dupin. Clement XIII. condemned the book on February 27, 1764, although only some of the German bishops—among whom, however, was the Archbishop of Treves—prohibited it in their dioceses. Many refutations appeared, of which the most famous are the "Antifebronio" of the Jesuit Zaccaria (Pisaur. 1767, 4 vols. 8vo., "Antifebronius vindicatus, Cæsen. 1768, 4 vols. 8vo), the "Italus ad Febronium" of the Capuchin Viator a Cocaleo (Luc. 1768, Trident. 1774), and the "De Potestate Ecclesiastica Summorum Pontificum et Conciliorum generalium liber, una cum vindiciis auctoritatis pontificiæ contra opus Just. Febronii," by Peter Ballerini (Veron. 1768, 4to). Febronius defended himself under various new pseudonyms, such as Justinianus Novus, Joannes Clericus, Aulus Jordanes, &c. Further, he was energetic in attempting to have his principles realised, for he had a great part in the composition of a document in which the three ecclesiastical Electors of Germany protested against Papal interference in their dioceses. This document was addressed to the Emperor in 1769. That same year Clement XIII. died, and the troubles which embarrassed his successor, Clement XIV., prevented him from taking any fresh step in the matter.

So things stood till 1778, when Pius VI., feeling the need of more stringent measures, pointed out to the Archbishop of Treves that Febronius must make a formal recantation or else fall under the censures of the Church. With great difficulty Febronius was persuaded to give a general explanation of his meaning, which explanation was sent to Rome and returned as insufficient. At last, the Pope and the archbishop persuaded him to make a specific retractation of erroneous propositions in his book, which by this time had grown to six volumes. Pius VI. announced the good news in the consistory, and communicated it to the Catholic Courts. They, however, and particularly the Courts of Vienna and Madrid, regarded it as anything rather than good news, and the "Gazetta Universale" of Florence charged the Pope and the Prince Archbishop with tyranny, Febronius himself with cowardice and hypocrisy. Thereupon, the archbishop pressed his auxiliary to explain himself further, and accordingly Febronius did before the clergy of Treves assert the reality of his conviction that he had fallen, although unwittingly, into error. Unfortunately, the documents printed by Wyttenbach and Müller in the third volume of their "Gesta Trevirorum" show that Febronius did not really and thoroughly renounce his errors. In 1781 he published a commentary on his retractation ("Justini Febronii Juris-consulti Commentarius in suam Retractationem Pio VI. Pont. Max. Kal. Nov. Ann. 1778 submissam." Francof. 1781, 4to) which contained many propositions which must have been highly offensive to the Pope. Pius VI. handed it for examination to Cardinal Gerdil, who replied to it in his treatise headed, "In Commentarium a Justino Febronio in suam Retractationem editum Animadversiones," and to be found in volume xiii. of his collected works. But Febronianism appealed to prejudices and interests against which learned treatises could avail little. The notorious Church reforms of Joseph II. may be fairly called Febronian, and the Ems Congress in 1786 acted on similar principles. The Archbishops of Cologne, Treves, and Mayence—all of them secular princes as well as ecclesiastical dignitaries—and the Archbishop of Salzburg were offended at the sending of a Papal nuncio to Munich, and the activity of the nuncio Monsignor Pacca at Cologne. Accordingly, they appointed representatives who met at Ems and drew up a "Punctation" in 23 articles, the object of which was to make the archbishops practically independent of Rome. The Pope's power was to be reduced to that which Febronians supposed him to have exercised in the first three centuries. Exemptions of religious orders were to be annulled; no recourse was to be had to Rome for dispensations; the bishops were no longer to take the oath of obedience to the Holy See; Papal bulls were to have no authority till approved and published by the bishops. Owing to the firmness of the Pope and his representative, Pacca, as well as to the loyalty of the inferior bishops to Rome, and their dread of archiepiscopal autocracy, the threatened schism came to nothing, and in 1789 the three episcopal Electors acknowledged the right of the Holy See to give dispensations and send nuncios. Febronius, who was already a very old man, does not appear to have taken any active part in the contest. He died in peace with the Church on September 2, 1790. In a short time the French Revolution changed the face of Europe, and Febronianism, though remnants of it lingered on to our own day, has never since been the occasion of any serious danger in the Church.

FERIA. A name given in the ecclesiastical calendar to all days of the week except Sunday ("Dies dominica") and Saturday ("Sabbatum"). It seems strange that the title of Feria or feast should be given to days which are not feasts, or at least are not considered as such, so far as they are called Feriæ. The explanation given in the breviary (Feast of St. Silvester, lect. vi.), that clerics are to be free from worldly cares and keep a perpetual feast to God, scarcely suffices, and perhaps is not intended, to account for the actual origin of the name. The true explanation is probably this. The Jews were accustomed to name the days of the week from the Sabbath, and thus we find in the Gospels such expressions as "unam sabbati," μίαν τῶν σαββάτων,[1] "the first day from the Sabbath," or, in other words, the first day of the week. The early Christians reckoned the days in Easter week in the same fashion: only as all the days in that week were holy days, they called Easter Monday, not the first day after Easter Sunday, but the second feria or feast-day; and as every Sunday is a lesser Easter, the practice prevailed of calling each Monday "feria secunda," each Tuesday "feria tertia," and so on. Feriæ are divided into greater and less. The latter give place to any feast-day within an octave or vigil, without even being commemorated. The "greater feriæ" are the week-days of Advent and Lent, the Ember Days and Monday (not Tuesday) in Rogation Week. If a simple feast falls on such a feria, the ferial office and Mass are said, the feast being only commemorated,[2] and if a double, semi-double, or day within an octave coincides with the feria, the festal office is, indeed, said, but the feria is commemorated. The privilege granted by Apostolic indult of reciting a votive office on certain days of the week or month cannot be made use of on these greater feriæ.

Some, moreover, of the greater feriæ are privileged, and this is the case with the days of Holy, Easter, and Whitsun weeks, as also with Ash Wednesday. They exclude any feast of however high a rank, and cause it to be transferred to another day. This must be understood of the celebration in choir, for the obligation of resting from servile work and hearing Mass on holidays of obligation usually[3] remains, even if that holiday falls on a greater feria. (Gavantus, with Merati's Notes, P. II. sect. iii. cap. 5.)

FEUDUM ECCLESIASTICUM. By an ecclesiastical fief was meant, strictly speaking, a domain belonging to the Church, which the bishop, abbot, or other possessor, granted as a fief to a prince, baron, knight, or other secular person, in return for protection, escort, and other similar services. The bishop, &c, retained the suzerainty in the name of the Church, and the infeoffed person did homage to him as his vassal. Tithes were also regarded as a feudum ecclesiasticum. By an improper use of the term it was extended to the secular estates granted in fief to the Church. (Ferraris, Feudum.)

[1] In Rabbinical usage, the word "Sabbath" became equivalent to week, and hence in Rabbinical language (adopted in the Gospels) אֶחָד בְּשַׁבָּת is our Sunday.

[2] If a vigil coincides with a greater feria, the office is of the feria alone; the Mass is of the vigil with a commemoration of the feria.

[3] Usually; for if the Annunciation falls on Good Friday or Holy Saturday, all obligation of observance is transferred.

FINAL PERSEVERANCE is defined by Billuart ("De Grat." diss. viii. a. 5) as that great and special gift in virtue of which a man remains in a state of grace till the moment of death. The Council of Trent (Sess. vi. can. 16 and cap. 13) teaches that no one without special revelation can know for certain that he will persevere, and also that we are utterly unable to secure this gift by merits of our own. It comes from the grace of God, "who is able to establish him who stands so that he may continue to stand, and to re-establish him who falls." The teaching of the council is confirmed by reason and Scripture. To merit a gift from God, it is necessary that God should promise to bestow the gift in question, as a reward for good works. No such promise has been made. On the contrary, Scripture reminds the just that they must work out their salvation "with fear and trembling," and warns him who stands "to take heed lest he fall."

It is possible, however, to obtain this gift by prayer and good works, which appeal, not to the justice, but to the liberality and kindness of God; and some theologians speak of final perseverance as obtained in such cases by merit "de congruo." In this sense St. Augustine ("De Dono Persever." cap. 6) says we can merit final perseverance by prayer ("suppliciter emereri").

FINDING OF CROSS. [See CROSS.]

FIRST-FRUITS. By the law of Moses the first-fruits of man, of animals, and of "whatsoever thou hast sown in the field,"[1] were owed to the Lord. A command was given to Aaron, as representing the priestly caste—"For the first-born of man thou shalt take a price, and every beast that is unclean thou shalt cause to be redeemed."[2] In another place[3] the Levites are said to be taken by the Lord in commutation of this price ("I have taken them instead of the first-born that open every womb in Israel"), but it was still required that a first-born son should be presented to the Lord in the Temple, and redeemed by the payment of five shekels.[2] The firstlings of clean beasts—cows, sheep, and goats—were not to be redeemed, but offered in sacrifice; and of the meat, the consecrated breast and right shoulder were assigned to the sons of Aaron. Of this meat only the males in the priestly families were to partake:[3] but the first fruits of the produce of the land were given "to thee, and to thy sons, and to thy daughters, by a perpetual law." The Levites themselves, though, being without land, they could not offer "first-fruits of the barn-floor and the wine-press,"[4] yet were instructed to offer the first-fruits of the tithes paid to them by the children of Israel to the Lord—that is, "the tenth part of the tenth."

A Hebrew tradition mentioned in the body of the canon law assigns some part of the crop, not less than a sixtieth, and not more than a fortieth, as the proportion which ought to be given as first-fruits. In substance, the obligation to offer first-fruits, which is equivalent to an intention of sustaining the Church and its ministers with our temporal goods, is still valid under the new law; but in form it is not binding, except in cases where they are demanded under an ancient custom. (Ferraris, Primitiæ.)

FISTULA (also called siphon, calamus, pupillaris). A pipe through which the faithful used to receive the blood of Christ from the chalice. This manner of communicating is mentioned in the most ancient Roman Ordines (the oldest is attributed by Mabillon to the time of Gregory the Great), and a curious relic of this custom remains to this day. At Papal Masses, the deacon brings the Precious Blood to the Pope, who takes it through a fistula.

FLAGELLANTS. So called from the scourges (flagella) which they carried in their processions, and with which they lashed their bare arms and shoulders. They first appeared in the thirteenth century, an age when Christian architecture reached a height of glory and perfection never since equalled, and extraordinary sanctity revealed marvels of grace and divine power before unsuspected, but in which, also, the reign of law being but imperfectly established, the world was often startled from its propriety by the apparition of monsters of cruelty and lust, like Eccelin da Romano and his brother, whose touch was contamination and their very existence a curse. No human arm seemed able to reach far enough, or strike hard enough, to punish a twentieth part of the crimes that were committed. God appeared to be the one refuge left. Numbers of persons—men, women and children—collected together; they veiled their faces and uncovered their shoulders; in each town that they entered, forming a melancholy procession, they sought by tears, groans, and voluntary penance—singing penitential songs the while—to appease the divine wrath; the sound of the lash was continual, and blood flowed abundantly. The first association of Flagellants appeared at Perugia in 1260. The sympathy and agitation which their proceedings at first excited would almost surpass belief; everywhere they were joined by crowds of fervent neophytes. The rule of the association was that every person should remain a member of it during thirty-three days, in honour of the thirty-three years of the life of our Lord. A contemporary [1] writer says that, whatever might be alleged against them, "nevertheless by this means many who were at enmity were reconciled, and many good things were done." The secular governments, after a time, observing that the Holy See and the bishops in general did not encourage the movement, began to prohibit the Flagellant processions. After the black death (1348) the Flagellants again appeared. They now gave way to many extravagances; their leader spoke of a mysterious letter which had fallen from heaven and been found at Jerusalem, in which Jesus Christ promised to be gracious to all penitents in the processions of Flagellants, "because their blood was mingled with His blood." Clement VI. repressed them; but they appeared again, and for the last time, about the date of the Council of Constance, among the canons of which is one condemning their excesses.

FLECTAMUS GENUA ("Let us bend our knees"). Words used by the deacon before the collects in the office of Good Friday and in certain Masses. The subdeacon immediately afterwards says "Levate" ("rise," literally "raise them up,") and the ministers at the altar do so, having knelt on one knee for a second. In ancient times each summons came from the deacon; the people knelt, and a longer space was allowed for silent prayer. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss." ii. 5.)

FLORENCE, COUNCIL OF.[1] Several remarkable attempts to heal the schism of the East and West were made during the fourteenth century. In 1339, Andronicus III. Palæologus sent the Abbot Barlaam to negotiate with one of the Avignon Popes, Benedict XII.; but the Pope would not listen to Barlaam's proposal—viz. that the churches should be united, while the dogmatic differences remained as they were. New attempts at reconciliation were made by John V. Palæologus, who was hard pressed by the Turks. The emperor himself became a Catholic in 1369, but his example was not followed by the clergy or the people. At last John VI. Palæologus was reduced to straits which made him see the impossibility of saving the Byzantine empire without help from the Western Christians. The Turks had taken Adrianople, and his throne was already tottering beneath him. In his extremity he was willing to negotiate for peace with the Catholic Church. Nicolas of Cusa went to Constantinople and smoothed the way for reconciliation. No doubt, there was also a real desire for unity and doctrinal agreement among many of the Greeks, apart from the political motives which induced them to come to terms with the Latin Church. One of the Greek ecclesiastics expressly said at a council held for preliminary consultation at Constantinople that a union on merely political grounds would not last. At the end of November 1437, 700 Greeks sailed from the Bosporus. The emperor, the Patriarch Joseph of Constantinople, deputies from the other Patriarchs, entrusted by them with complete power to act as their representatives, and Bessarion, the famous archbishop of Nice, were among their number. On February 8, 1438, they landed at Venice. Early in March they reached Ferrara, to which the Council of Basle had been transferred, and were received with great solemnity by the Pope, Eugenius IV. On April 9th the council was opened, and the discussion on the addition of the word "Filioque" to the Creed began. It lasted for fifteen sessions, after which, partly because the plague had broken out at Ferrara, partly because the Florentines wished to have the council in their city and offered to supply the Pope with money, which he sorely needed for the maintenance of the Greeks, the council was transferred thither. At Florence the council continued to sit from 1439 to 1442.

First of all, the great dogmatic question on the procession of the Holy Ghost was decided. The Greeks accepted the Latin terminology—viz. that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son, when its real meaning was explained to them. The Latins fully admitted and the council defined that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son as from one principle and by a single spiration. The Latins, moreover, fully allowed the orthodoxy of the Greek terminology —viz. that the third Person proceeds from the Father through the Son; and this expression also was approved by the Council. Other points of difference were next discussed. It was defined that the body of Christ is truly consecrated either in leavened or unleavened bread, Latins and Greeks being required to follow in this matter the custom of their respective churches; further, that such souls as have departed in God's grace, but without having done penance enough for their sins, are detained in Purgatory, and, while there, are assisted by the sacrifices, prayers, and good works of Christians on earth; that, on the other hand, souls perfectly purified or, like infants just baptised, needing no purification, go straight to heaven and see God face to face, whereas the souls of those who die in mortal sin descend at once to hell. The discussions on the primacy of the Roman bishop were much more long and keen. John of Torquemada (Turrecremata), John of Ragusio, and Ambrose Traversari were the great advocates of the Papal prerogatives. At last, however, the council defined that "the Holy Apostolic See and Roman Pontiff hold the primacy over all the world; that the Roman Pontiff is the successor of Peter, prince of the Apostles; that he is the true vicar of Christ, the head of the whole Church, the father and teacher of all Christians; and that to him in the person of blessed Peter full power has been committed by our Lord Jesus Christ of feeding, ruling, and governing the universal Church; as also (quemadmodum etiam, καθ' ὃν τρόπον)[1] is contained in the acts of œcumenical councils and in the holy canons." On July 5, 1439, all the members, except Mark of Ephesus and the bishop of Stauropolis, signed the Decree of Union containing the above definitions. On the evening of the same day the Greeks again appeared before the Pope, and Bessarion declared their belief that the transubstantiation of the bread and wine in the Mass is effected by the words of consecration, thus abandoning the opinion which ascribed the change to the ἐπικλήσεις or invocation of the Holy Ghost. The Decree of Union was solemnly published next day (Sunday) in the Cathedral of Florence, being read aloud by Cardinal Julian in Latin, and by Bessarion in Greek. On August 26, 1439, the Greek emperor left Florence.

The union effected was of short duration. Joseph, Patriarch of Constantinople, had died during the council; his successor, Metrophanes, who was well disposed to the union, died shortly after it, in 1443. Mark of Ephesus and other enemies of unity were active in their intrigues, and it was not till 1452 that Cardinal Isidore, the fugitive metropolitan of Kiew and legate of Pope Nicolas V., succeeded in having the Florentine decrees acknowledged and promulgated in the church of St. Sophia. But on May 29, 1453, the Turks took Constantinople, and the Sultan Muhammed II. appointed the anti-Roman Gennadius to the Patriarchate. In 1472 the decrees of Florence were formally repudiated by a schismatical council at Constantinople.

Other Orientals besides the Greek schismatics were reunited with the Church during the course of the council. In 1439 the Armenians, in 1440 a part of the Jacobites or Monophysite Christians, were received into Catholic communion, and Eugenius IV. issued special instructions for them which are still extant. After Eugenius had returned to Rome, in 1443, the council was still continued and sessions held in the Lateran church. At the second session of the council after it had been transferred to Rome, in 1445, Timothy, the Chaldæan or Nestorian Metropolitan of Tarsus living in Cyprus, with his clergy and people, made their submission to the Pope, and about the same time the Maronites in that island became Catholics.

For a time certain Gallican divines denied the claims of Florence to rank as a General Council, because they held that the Pope exceeded his power in transferring the council from Basle to Ferrara. Even at Trent the French refused to admit the Florentine definition on the Papal authority. But the learned Gallican Natalis Alexander points out that the Pope has the right to modify and dispense from the canons of councils, if public necessity or the good of the Church requires him to do so. He argues further that the "sounder part" of the Fathers of Basle consented to the removal of the assembly from Basle to Ferrara. It is scarcely necessary to say that such doubts have long since ceased to be possible among Catholics.

The Acts of the Council have perished, but we possess (1) a minute history in the form of Acts, written in Greek, and evidently by a Greek member of the council. Hefele, Frommann, and other scholars attribute the history to Dorotheus of Mitylene. It will be found in the collections of Mansi or Hardouin, with a Latin translation by the Cretan Caryoptilus. (2) A history agreeing in all the most important points with the one just mentioned was published, in 1638, by Justiniani, Custos of the Vatican Library. This history is drawn up, partly from notes made by the Papal advocate Andreas de Sta Cruce, who was present at the council, partly from other documents in the Vatican archives and in other Roman libraries. Hardouin has printed Justiniani's history in his collection. (3) A history by Syropulus, a Greek priest and dignitary of Constantinople. Syropulus was present at the council and signed the Decree of Union, but he was from the first a secret, and soon became an open and most bitter, enemy of the council. A very inaccurate Latin translation from a Paris MS. was published by the Anglican Robert Creyghton, at the Hague, in 1660. The best modern history of the Council is by Hefele (vol. vii.).

FORTITUDE. [See CARDINAL VIRTUES.]

FORTY HOURS. [See EXPOSITION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT.]

FORUM ECCLESIASTICUM. The tribunals of the Church are of two kinds, internal and external. The internal forum is the tribunal established in the sacrament of penance, where the coercive power is the Holy Ghost acting on the conscience, the penitent is his own accuser, and the confessor, guided by Moral Theology, remits or retains sin, exacts satisfaction, and directs restitution, according to the circumstances of each case. [PENANCE.]

Under the name of forum externum is included every exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction external to the tribunal of penance. The judicial office in the external forum belongs to bishops in their respective dioceses, metropolitans in the cases assigned to them by the canons, and supremely and universally to the Holy See. But a previous question arises—viz. Is the exercise of an external coercive jurisdiction a right inherent in the constitution of the Church? Is it not rather an encroachment on the rights of the civil power? It will be found on a close examination that this is part of a larger question—viz. Whether the Church instituted by Jesus Christ really possesses a native and supreme authority, parallel—not subordinate—to the supreme authority of the State? If the Church is and ought to be thus independent, then the right of making laws for the government of her children not liable to the revision of the civil power cannot be denied to her; and if she has the right of legislation, she must also possess that of coercive jurisdiction, since in human society it is useless to pass laws if one has not the power of enforcing them. But if Christ never meant His Church to be an independent society, these rights could not be claimed for her. Among Protestants it is generally held that the Church possesses no power originally and absolutely independent of that of the State. The view of Puffendorf, or some modification of it, is still generally accepted, according to which the Christian Church is a kind of college or society within the State—in which all the members, qua Christians, are equal, and can meet together as in other colleges to elect officers, transact business, adopt rules and by-laws, and so on—but which has no power of passing laws, administering justice, condemning, or punishing.

Catholic teaching, grounded on Scripture and tradition, rejects so degrading a view of the Church which God Incarnate founded upon earth, and endowed with supernatural power and grace. To Peter and the other Apostles Christ gave the power of binding and loosing. He commanded them to go and teach all nations; He promised to be with them all days even to the consummation of the world; He said that while the things of Cæsar were to be rendered to Cæsar, the things of God were to be given to God; finally he declared, "He that heareth you heareth me, and he that despiseth you despiseth me."[1] He promised to build his Church on Peter, and that against this Church, which St. Paul calls "the pillar and the ground of truth,"[2] the gates of Hell should not prevail. There is not the slightest hint anywhere that Christ intended that these powers should be exercised in subjection to the civil power. We find abundant evidence that the Apostles and the early Church freely exercised the powers thus committed to them, not in preaching, converting, and working miracles only, but also in the three specific modes with which we are concerned — viz. in making laws, in judging, and in punishing. At a synod publicly held in Jerusalem to decide whether the Gentile Christians were to be obliged to receive circumcision, a decision was arrived at which was to all intents and purposes a law—which was promulgated under the formula "It hath seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us"[3]—and which St. Paul enjoined his converts to obey, as being "precepts of the apostles and ancients." The powers of judging and punishing were exercised in the cases of Ananias and Sapphira, Elymas the sorcerer, and notably in that of the incestuous Corinthian.[4] Following the example of the Apostles, the bishops in the first and every succeeding age of the Church have been accustomed to meet in synod and enact canons—that is, ecclesiastical laws concerning every religious interest and duty of man; and they never considered it incumbent on them to submit these laws for the approval of the civil power. The emperors themselves often endorsed the doctrine of ecclesiastical liberty. Arcadius and Honorius, in one of their Constitutions,[5] say, "Whenever the cause is one of religion, it belongs to the bishops to judge;" and the Theodosian Code contains an explicit direction in the same sense.[6] In the early ages of the Church the judicial office was largely exercised by episcopal synods, in which important cases of heresy, immorality, &c., were tried and decided, and the punishments of excommunication, deposition, suspension, degradation, or imprisonment were inflicted. In course of time ordinary cases came to be heard in the individual bishop's court, whilst causæ majores — i.e. those of bishops—were reserved to the Holy See. At the same time a settled mode of procedure with regular officials became established in the episcopal courts. By the twelfth century this change had been generally effected, and still continues substantially in force, though, in some cases, the regular officials and procedure are necessarily dispensed with to a greater or less degree, according to the position of the Church in different countries.

It will be admitted that the right of legislation draws with it the judicial power; if the Church possesses one, she possesses also the other. But it has been contended that the sanctions of her judicial decisions ought to be of a spiritual nature only, and as such should involve no suffering to the criminal except either within the self-accusing conscience, or in another world. The Church may have courts, it is said, but she may not enforce the decisions of these courts by temporal penalties; if these are required, she must ask the civil power to apply them. Marsilius Ficinus maintained that "the Pope, or the whole Church taken collectively, cannot punish any man, however wicked he may be, with a coercive punishment, unless the Emperor give them authority to do so."[1] But this was condemned as erroneous by John XXII., and a similar opinion promulgated by the too-famous synod of Pistoia was censured by Pius VII. in the bull "Auctorem fidei." To admit such a doctrine would be tantamount to condemning the heroic bishops of the early Church, who feared not to depose an Arius or a Dioscorus against the opposition of the civil power. For certainly deposition is a "coercive punishment," and in numerous instances, if the leave of the State had been waited for before inflicting it, it would never have been inflicted at all. Even while all along asserting her independence, we know what the Church has had to suffer at the hands of heretical and despotic princes; what, then, would have become of Christianity if she had admitted that she had no right of punishing except by their hands? What happened some years ago in the Anglican community may help us to answer the question. Dr. Colenso, the Anglican bishop of Natal in South Africa, published books in which he was said to have denied the inspiration of Scripture. A synod of his brother bishops met at Capetown and deposed him. But the Anglican Church is grounded on an Erastian principle: its supreme head on earth is the temporal sovereign; hence the deposed bishop found it an easy matter to enlist the secular courts on his side, and to continue to occupy the see of Natal! Miserable as are the present times, such a scandal could scarcely now happen within the Catholic Church.

The punishments inflicted in the forum externum are of various kinds: besides those already enumerated (excommunication, deposition, &c.), they include, or have included, stripes, fines, and relegation to a monastery. It is the general opinion of canonists that they should be such as not to involve the shedding of blood—citra sanguinis effusionem; and this because the Church can never, like human justice, merge the consideration of the possible reformation of the offender in that of what is required for the safety of society, and to deter others from doing the like. The Holy Office, in the day of its most unsparing severities, did not itself inflict the death-penalty on those whom it sentenced, but delivered them over to the secular arm. Practically it amounted to much the same thing; but the reason of this was that secular governments in those days sincerely believed that the heretic not only sinned against God, but was also a dangerous offender against human society. It may be rejoined that the ecclesiastical authorities not only shared in this opinion of the rulers, but by their writings and exhortations partly caused it. This cannot be denied; but it may probably be held that they did so in their civil capacity, as members of a community, rather than in their ecclesiastical capacity, as churchmen. With regard to stripes, the change in manners scarcely permits of its being included at the present day among ecclesiastical punishments. With regard to fines, the canonists prescribe that they should be imposed with great caution, and so that no suspicion can arise that the judges or officials derive any benefit from them.

Lay encroachment and usurpation have laboured to destroy the network of ecclesiastical jurisdiction which formerly overspread Europe. In the day of their power the canonists, speaking generally, comprehended well the limits of the two jurisdictions, and never encroached systematically on the temporal domain; the lawyers, on the contrary, taking advantage of the decline of faith, and the confusion caused by the heresies of northern Europe, have everywhere encroached on the ecclesiastical domain, and laboured to substitute their various systems of local law for the jurisprudence founded on divine revelation, the tradition of the Church, and general reason. They say, indeed, that their jurisprudence is guided by the principles of universal morality, and ask what more is needed? Even if this were true to the fullest extent, it would not follow that the civil courts should assume jurisdiction in spiritual causes. Morality — justice — must be the norm of every endurable jurisdiction set up amongst men; but it will not take us far enough: for man is not only capax morum, but also capax religionis. Jurisprudence requires not only a rule, but an end. This end, for the Roman jurists, was found in the arbitrary pleasure of the prince (quod principi placuit, &c.); for modern jurists it is found in the arbitrary pleasure of a majority. In either case the general good of the community is the real end, which is supposed at one period to be best attained through despotism, at another through universal suffrage. This, which is the highest end of man conceived as living in time, is treated by the unbelieving governments of the day as if it were his sole end. His religious destiny is absolutely ignored, and the jurisprudence which rests on the assumption that he has such a destiny is trampled upon and suppressed. To lawyers and officials of this stamp it does not appear unjust to disperse religious congregations and confiscate their property, because they do not consider the temporal welfare of society to be promoted by their existence, and they will not allow the reality of any higher end. In the middle ages the lawyers admitted that the jurisprudence of the Church was informed by a loftier aim than their own, and the two systems were administered side by side with—on the whole—extraordinary success and advantage. (Ferraris, Forum Ecclesiasticum.)

FOUNDATION. [See BENEFICE, ENDOWMENT, ESTABLISHMENT.]

FRANCE, CHURCH OF. In the articles CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY and CONCORDAT, the transition during the French Revolution, from the ancient ecclesiastical order in France to the present state of things was briefly described. Some account of the organisation and working of the modern church of France will be attempted in the present article.

Since the commencement of the Second Empire in 1852, the dioceses of Metz and Strasburg have been lost to France; on the other hand, the Savoyard dioceses of Annecy, St. Jean de Maurienne, and Tarentaise, with the archdiocese of Chambéry, have been annexed to it, and Algiers, which was then subject to the Archbishop of Aix, has been erected into an archiepiscopal see, with the suffragan sees of Constantine and Oran. There are now in France and her dependencies eighteen archbishoprics,[1] and seventy-two bishoprics. The number of the parochial clergy amounts to upwards of forty thousand. They are divided into Curés and Desservants, and the distinction between the two classes is important. The Concordat between Napoleon and Pius VII., made no mention of Desservants; it merely stipulated that the priests serving the cures should receive certain emoluments. In this, nothing but bare justice, or rather a small instalment of justice, was asked from the State; for the "traitement" or annual grant was to replace the far larger income from tithes and other Church property, which had been confiscated during the Revolution. But if every parish priest should receive a decent stipend, the government considered that it would not have made a good bargain. It was accordingly resolved to recognise as priests for the purposes of the above-mentioned article, speaking generally, only the curés of the chief places in the several cantons[2] in France. These curés cantonaux, were about 3,500 in number; they were, and still are, divided into two classes, the stipend for the first class being 1,500*f.*, that for the second 1,200 francs per annum.

[2] A canton is a division of an arrondissement, containing usually from ten to twenty communes.

Under each curé cantonal are usually several vicaires. The priests serving all the other churches within the canton, are called Desservants. They are first mentioned in the Organic Articles [CONCORDAT], where it is said that they shall be under the surveillance of the curés—i.e. the curés cantonaux. They were so for a time, but their real canonical position gradually prevailed, and a desservant is now immediately under his bishop, and is commonly called, and is, "M. le Curé" in his own parish, as much as the dignitary in the chef lieu de canton, to whom alone the law allows the title. Their position, however, is so far different that, while the curé proper can only be appointed, and perhaps removed, by the bishop, with the approval of the government, the desservant is appointed by the bishop alone, and can be removed by him, on his own sole authority.

The religious orders and congregations which adorn the modern French church are very numerous: it is estimated that their numbers amount to 140,000, of whom about 20,000 are men and the rest women.

The total amount of the annual grant from public funds for the support of the French clergy somewhat exceeds 2,000,000*l.* sterling. The ecclesiastical buildings are in the hands of Conseils de Fabrique [FABRIC]. The annual salary of a desservant is 900 francs, or 36*l.* The commune is bound to provide him with a residence rent free; if it is too poor to do this, the State will sometimes give assistance; but in most cases private subscriptions have to be resorted to. Every diocese has a great or upper seminary for the education of priests, and there are also about a hundred and fifty little seminaries, which give an education corresponding to that given in the State lycées, but under ecclesiastical management, to boys destined either for clerical or for secular life. Of the orders and congregations, some—e.g. the Lazarists, the Sulpicians, the Sisters of Charity, &c.—are recognised by the State, and may possess property and also acquire it by bequest, but under close and constant inquisition on the part of the Department of Public Worship. The unrecognised congregations also have of late years acquired a great amount of property; it is said that, taking the recognised and unrecognised congregations together, the value of their property exceeds a thousand million francs. With regard to political privileges, the French law recognises no distinction between cleric and layman; hence bishops and priests are capable of being elected to the Chambers. Chapters of canons are attached to the cathedrals, but the canonries are regarded chiefly in the light of a dignified provision for aged or distinguished clergymen; the canons have no share in the government of the diocese. The old Church tribunals, abolished at the Revolution, have not been revived; the bishops act ex informata conscientia, and there is no appeal for the inferior clergy except to Rome. Of the close, vexatious, and almost ridiculous character of the surveillance which the lay power exercises over the Church, some idea may be formed from the fact that the Department of Worship undertakes the furnishing of a bishop's palace, and requires a yearly inventory, that it may know what to expend in repairs and new purchases! The laws for the expulsion of religious and the compulsory military service of clerics show how far the anti-Catholic spirit prevails. [Wetzer and Welte.]

FRANCISCANS. This order takes its name from its founder, St. Francis of Assisi, who died in 1226. The Life of St. Francis has been so frequently written that we shall confine ourselves to the mention of those incidents in it which are connected with the rise and growth of the order. The saint had entirely broken with the world in 1206, when, being then in his twenty-fifth year, he had stripped himself of the clothes which he wore belonging to his father, and embraced a life of strict poverty. He lived for several years in a cottage near Assisi, in the practice of almost continual prayer accompanied by severe bodily discipline. In 1209 Bernard of Quintavalle, a rich merchant of Assisi, and Peter of Catana, a canon in the cathedral of the same city, who had long witnessed and admired the heroic virtue of the saint, openly joined themselves to him; this is considered the date of the foundation of the order. Another disciple soon appeared in Giles of Assisi, who was afterwards beatified. The rule which the saint at first prescribed to his followers is not now extant: it consisted, says Alban Butler (October 4), "of the gospel counsels of perfection, to which he added some things necessary for uniformity in their manner of life. He exhorts his brethren to manual labour, but will have them content to receive for it things necessary for life, not money." In the later editions of the rule the prohibition against the handling or use of money, even by the intervention of a third person, was maintained.[1] "He bids them not to be ashamed to beg alms, remembering the poverty of Christ; and he forbids them to preach in any place without the bishop's licence." In a larger (extant) version of the rule he laid down twenty-seven precepts, all of which several Pontiffs have declared to be binding on the friars of the order under pain of mortal sin. They prescribe the particular means by which the vow of poverty is to be carried out, regulate the dress to be worn, order that the friars shall go barefoot, specify the fasts to be observed, and enjoin a blind unlimited obedience to superiors for the love of God. The habit which he gave them was a grey gown of coarse cloth with a pointed hood or capuche attached to it, one under-tunic and drawers, and a cord round the waist. This costume closely resembled that worn by poor shepherds in that part of Italy. After several other disciples had joined him, the cottage at Assisi was found too small to hold them, and St. Francis was in doubt whether it was not the will of God—who had already announced to him in visions that the destined work for him and his company was to preach and labour for the conversion of souls, and bring sinners to penance—that he should establish the order elsewhere. But about this time the Benedictines of the neighbouring monastery of Soubazo gave him a small plot of ground near Assisi called Portiuncula, on which stood an abandoned church dedicated in honour of Our Lady of the Angels. Francis would not accept the land as an absolute gift, but by the tenure of rendering yearly to the Benedictines a basket of little fish, called lasche, caught in the stream that flowed hard by. From this humble site, which thus became the cradle of the order, thousands of monasteries were to be planted, missioners were to go forth to all parts of the world to preach, toil, and in many cases suffer martyrdom for the gospel of Jesus Christ, and a vast multitude of doctors and holy prelates were to issue, by whom the purity of the faith should be sustained, and its principles methodised and applied. In 1210 St. Francis went to Rome to obtain the confirmation of his rule. The Sovereign Pontiff at that time was Innocent III. At the first interview he rejected the saint's petition. Francis humbly withdrew; but the same night the Pope dreamt that he saw a palm spring up from the ground between his feet and wax gradually till it became a great tree; at the same time an impression was borne in upon his mind that by this palm tree was designated the poor petitioner whom he had repelled the day before. The Pope ordered that search should be made for him; Francis was found, and, being brought before the Pope and the Cardinals, expounded in simple but glowing language the plan and aims of his institute. The Pope was much moved, but some of the Cardinals thought that the poverty required surpassed the strength of man. Francis betook himself to prayer, and at the next interview Innocent granted him a verbal approbation of his rule. The Pope declared that he had seen in a dream the Lateran basilica tottering to its fall, but saved by a poor despised man, who set his back against the wall and propped it up. "Truly," said he, "here is that man who, by his work and teaching will sustain the Church of Christ." The above particulars are taken from the Life of the saint by St. Bonaventure, who heard them from the Pope's nephew. Some years later, St. Francis drew up the rule in a more compendious form, and in this shape it was solemnly ratified by Honorius III. in 1223.

It is difficult to realise in this nineteenth century the extraordinary attraction which the example and preaching of St. Francis exercised on his contemporaries. Long before the final confirmation by Honorius III., the Friars Minor (such was the name which the founder in his humility chose for them) had made their way into the principal countries of Europe, preaching penance and founding convents. St. Francis himself visited Spain in 1214, was well received by Alfonso IX., the grandfather of St. Louis of France, and founded houses of his order at Burgos and other places. In 1216 he sent Pacifico, who had been a trouvère and was called the "king of verse," to France, Bernard of Quintavalle to Spain, and John of Penna to Germany, besides many others whom he despatched to various parts of Italy. The noble instructions, full of divine light and evangelical fire, with which he dismissed them —instructions on the whole so faithfully observed by his followers—go far to explain the wonderful success which has attended them in every age in doing their Master's work. Amongst other things he said, "Let your behaviour in the world be such that everyone who sees or hears you may praise the Heavenly Father. Preach peace to all; but have it in your hearts still more than on your lips. Give no occasion of anger or scandal to any, but by your gentleness lead all men to goodness, peace, and union. We are called to heal the wounded, and recall the erring. For there are many who appear to you limbs of the devil, who will be one day disciples of Jesus Christ.[1]

The missions above mentioned all prospered greatly, except that to Germany, which failed, chiefly because the friars did not know the language. England welcomed the messengers, Angelo of Pisa and eight others, whom the saint sent to our shores in 1219: landing at Dover in 1220, they formed their first convent at Canterbury, and another soon afterwards at Northampton. The romantic story of two friars finding their way to Oxford, and beginning the great friary there (in St. Ebbe's parish) may be read in the Monasticon.[2] In London, at Coventry, and other places, there were famous Franciscan convents; the list will be given further on. So rapidly did the order increase that at the first general chapter, that called of Mats, held at the Portiuncula in 1219, upwards of five thousand friars were present.

St. Francis, after receiving the sacred Stigmata [q. v.], died in 1226. The next Minister-General of the entire order was Elias of Cortona, an ambitious, restless man, of a tyrannical spirit. He relaxed the rule of poverty, admitting rents and foundations; he also mitigated the fasts, &c., and oppressed those who desired to keep up the original strictness of the rule. A long controversy arose, which ended in the division of the order into two great branches, Conventuals and Observantines —the former living in large convents and following a mitigated rule; the latter living more in the manner of hermits, in low, mean dwellings, and according to the original rigour of the institute. The Recollects, or Grey Friars, were a reformation first commenced by John of Guadaloupe in Spain in 1500. The Observantines received in France the name of Cordeliers. In 1380 the number of Franciscan monasteries was estimated at fifteen hundred, containing ninety thousand friars. In the next hundred and fifty years they must have increased very much, for Hélyot states that in his time—that is, long after the destruction of the houses of the order in England and other northern countries, where they were once numerous—there were, of the first and third orders, seven thousand convents, with 120,000 friars; and of the second order [see POOR CLARES], above nine hundred convents, with 28,000 nuns. The superior of a Franciscan monastery is not called an abbot, but a guardian, Custos. The whole of the first order, comprising both observances, was in the time of Hélyot, divided into two families, the Cismontane and the Ultramontane; each family contained several provinces, each province was subdivided into vicariates, and these into custodies, each of which consisted of a small group of convents.

Volumes might be written on the labours, sufferings, and triumphs of the Franciscan missioners; no order in the Church has surpassed them in zeal for the propagation of the gospel. St. Francis himself visited the Holy Land, presented himself before the Sultan of Egypt (1220) and endeavoured to convert him; and sent five friars to Morocco, who were all martyred. Franciscans preached in Tartary about the middle of the thirteenth century, and in China and Armenia before the end of it. By a bull of Clement VI. (1342) the guardianship of the Holy Places at Jerusalem was committed to the order, and they still retain it. Franciscan missions were established in Bosnia in 1340, in Bulgaria about 1366, and in Georgia in 1370. We find them taking a large share in the conversion of the natives of the Canary Isles in and after 1423; they got into Abyssinia in 1480, and established a mission on the Congo (which for a long time bore great fruit) about 1490. The order was instrumental in the discovery of America. Fr. John Perez de Marchena, guardian of a convent near Seville, himself a learned cosmographer, entered warmly into the designs of Columbus, and used his influence with Isabella the Catholic, whose confessor he had been, to persuade her to fit out the memorable expedition of 1492. In the following year Fr. John himself went to America, and opened the first Christian church in the New World, at a small settlement in the island of Hayti. Not to speak of the Franciscan missions in India, Brazil, and Peru—in all which countries other orders effected yet more—it was Observantine friars who were welcomed to Mexico by Cortes in 1523, and who, under their holy leader, Martin de Valenza, planted Christianity firmly in that empire, whence they went forth to preach the gospel in New Mexico (1580), in Texas (1600), and, lastly, in California (1769).[1]

The order of St. Francis has given five Popes, more than fifty cardinals, and an immense number of patriarchs and bishops to the Church. The great statesman Cardinal Ximenes was a Franciscan. Among the schoolmen, St. Bonaventure, the Seraphic Doctor; Duns Scotus, the Subtle Doctor; Alexander of Hales, the Irrefragable Doctor; and William of Ockham (the last three being natives of the British Isles), were members of this order. Its history is recorded in the elaborate "Annals" of Fr. Luke Wadding, an Irish Franciscan of the seventeenth century.

At the dissolution there were sixty-four Franciscan houses in England; the names are given below.[2] The English province was restored by Fr. Jennings, who founded a convent at Douay about 1617; of the friars who went from it on the English mission, four (Frs. Bell, Heath, Bullaker, and Woodcock) were put to death for their religion by the Long Parliament between 1642 and 1646. Excluding Capuchins [see that article], there appear to be at the present time (1891) eight houses of Minorite friars in England—at Stratford, Forest Gate, Bishopston, Clevedon, Ascot, Saltash, Ewell, and West Gorton—and one in Scotland, at Glasgow. In Ireland there are fifteen houses of the first and twelve of the third order.[1] [For Franciscan nuns see POOR CLARES.]

FRANKFORT, COUNCIL OF. At this, the first national council of Germany, convened by Charlemagne in 794, three hundred bishops and abbots[2] were present. Under the guidance of the English Alcuin, the council confirmed the condemnation of the Adoptionist heresy of Elipandus and Felix, pronounced at Ratisbon two years before [ADOPTIONISM], and also rejected the decrees of the Second General Council of Nicæa which the Fathers of Frankfort knew only in a grossly erroneous translation. FRATERNAL CORRECTION. An admonition which in certain circumstances we are bound to give our neighbour in order to withdraw him from sin. The duty of so admonishing is founded on the natural law, which obliges us to help our neighbour in the necessities of his soul, and also on the command of Christ (Matt. xviii. 15), "If thy brother shall offend thee, go and reprove him between thee and him alone."

In order to be under such an obligation, we must be certain that the sin has been committed; we must have reason to think that it has not been repented of, and some reasonable hope that the correction will do good. We must also have grounds for supposing that no one else who is equally fit with ourselves to give the correction is likely to do so. The admonition must of course be given with great prudence and charity. Bishops, parish-priests, parents, &c., are more strictly bound than others to the duty of fraternal correction. Many causes, such as inconvenience and loss, or even bashfulness, may often excuse private persons from administering it. (St. Liguori, iii. 3, 2.)

FRATICELLI (lit. "little friars"). An heretical sect which issued from the Franciscan order in the thirteenth century, attracted many adherents and caused great confusion, chiefly in Italy and Sicily, and disappeared towards the end of the fifteenth century. The Franciscans were divided, soon after the death of their founder, into two great parties, one of which—represented by Elias, the second general—was favourable to some relaxation of the rule in regard to poverty, while the other vehemently opposed the least abatement of the original rigour. The contention became so warm that the Popes were obliged to interfere, and reserved to themselves the right of interpreting the Franciscan rule. Gregory IX., Innocent IV., Alexander IV., and Nicholas III. successively undertook this task, and settled the rule in such a modified form as to allow the convents to possess the usufruct of landed estates, the property of which was vested in the Holy See. This did not satisfy the rigorists, some of whom were so carried away by a false zeal as to forget the earnest and repeated precept of their founder, that his friars should be obedient to the Holy See, and fanatically to declare that the Pope and the Church were in error. Among their leaders were Peter John Oliva, Raymond, Peter of Macerata, Henry of Ceva, &c. Apostate Franciscans formed at all times the chief strength of the sect, but they were glad to accept the co-operation of laymen, and even of women. They wandered about Italy, Sicily, Greece, and countries further east, proclaiming that the Popes had ceased to be the Vicars of Christ, and that the Church, corrupted by riches, had failed. They pretended to consecrate popes and bishops from among themselves. In their dress, and all about them that met the eye, they affected extreme poverty and simplicity; but a contemporary writer (Pelagius, the penitentiary of Pope John XXII.) reports that this external austerity was the cloak of abominable vices. The bull of John XXII. against them (1318) attributes to them various errors, some of which were revived by Wyclif sixty years later, and condemned by Gregory XI. and the Council of Constance. For instance, the bull of John XXII. gives as one of their tenets that "those who are regularly ordained lose their power by their sins;" and the council condemned as a Wyclifite error the proposition that "The power of a temporal lord, of a prelate, or of a bishop, is null while he is in mortal sin."[1] Martin V. (1418) published a bull and took other active measures against the sect, employing for this purpose the great preacher St. John Capistran, whose efforts appear to have been crowned with signal success.

FREEDOM OF WILL, says St. Thomas ("Sum." i. qu. 83, a. 2), consists essentially in the power of choice. We are said to be endowed with free will because we are able to accept one object, rejecting another; which acceptance we call "choice." A few words will explain the doctrine of the scholastic philosophers on this point, and serve as the best introduction to the decisions of the Church.

The will is an appetite which follows upon intellectual cognition, which tends, in other words, to the good apprehended and proposed by the mind. It is therefore proper to intellectual beings, and wholly distinct from the animal appetites, which tend to good apprehended by the senses. Now, if the object apprehended by the intellect be purely and simply good, and seen only as such, the will tends to it of necessity, and there can in such a case be no question of choice or freedom. No man can will to be unhappy or can help willing the objects which he only thinks of as necessary means of happiness. But a vast number of objects apprehended by the intellect are neither perfectly nor in all respects bad or good. A virtuous act, for example, may involve self-restraint and suffering; the mind, influenced by the will, may fix its attention chiefly on this element of evil, and the will in its turn may reject the good act because of the physical suffering or evil which accompanies it. So again, stealing may relieve a man from great discomfort, and here, again, the lesser good may be chosen, accompanied though it is by a moral evil. To the metaphysical arguments other very obvious ones may be added from psychological experience, e.g. the sense of sin if we choose wrongly, and the general feeling of all societies, in which criminals have been punished precisely on the ground that they were free and therefore responsible agents.

The Reformers generally denied that man, after the fall, possessed free will; or, if they admitted it in words, they explained the freedom of the will to mean, not the power of choice, the power which the will has to determine its own acts, but a mere freedom from external restraint (libertas a coactione). The same error was revived, though more cautiously asserted, by Baius and the Jansenists. On the other hand, it was defined under anathema by the Tridentine Council (Sess. vi. can. 5), that free will remains really and truly in man after the fall: and the true sense of this definition was frequently enforced and insisted on by subsequent Popes.

FREEMASONRY. The system of the Freemasons, a secret society, which professes, by means of a symbolical language and certain ceremonies of initiation and promotion, to lay down a code of morality founded on the brotherhood of humanity only. Some writers apply the term Freemasonry not only to the Freemasons proper, but also to all secret organisations which seek to undermine Christianity and the political and social institutions that have Christianity for their basis.

The origin of Freemasonry is disputed. The Freemasons themselves, in the language of their rituals, assume the sect to have begun its existence at the building of Solomon's Temple, but serious Masonic writers, as well as all writers of repute, declare this to be merely a conventional fiction. Nor is any more value to be attached to the attempts that are occasionally made to find a link between the pagan mysteries and Freemasonry. Some writers trace Freemasonry to the heresies of Eastern origin that prevailed during the early and middle ages in certain parts of Europe, such as those of the Gnostics, Manicheans, and Albigenses, some of whose mischievous tenets are, no doubt, apparent in the sect. The suppressed order of the Knights Templars, too, has been taken to have been the source of the sect; and this theory may have some countenance in the facts that a number of the Knights in Scotland illicitly maintained their organisation after the suppression, and that it was from Scotland that Freemasonry was brought into France at the beginning of the last century.

But it seems more in consonance with many known historical facts to trace the sect to the mediæval guild of stonemasons, who were popularly called by the very name of Free Masons. During the middle ages the various trades were formed, with the approbation of the Church, into guilds or close protective societies. In general no one was permitted to follow a trade for wages or profit, as apprentice, journeyman, or master, until he had been made free of the guild representing that trade. Each guild had its patron saint, and several guilds, it is certain, had each its peculiar ritual, using its own tools and technical language in a symbolical way in the ceremonies of initiation and promotion—that is to say, in entering an apprentice, and at the end of his time declaring him a worthy fellow-journeyman or craftsman, &c. The guild of Free Masons was singular in this: that it was a migratory one, its members travelling under their masters in organised bodies through all parts of Europe, wherever their services were required in building. When first referred to they are found grouped about the monasteries, especially about those of the Benedictines. The earliest form of initiation used by the guild is said to have been suggested by the ritual for the reception of a Benedictine novice.

The south of France, where a large Jewish and Saracenic element remained, was a hotbed of heresies, and that region was also a favourite one with the guild of Masons. It is asserted, too, that as far back as the twelfth century the lodges of the guild enjoyed the special protection of the Knights Templars. It is easy in this way to understand how the symbolical allusions to Solomon and his Temple might have passed from the Knights into the Masonic formulary. In this way, too, might be explained how, after the suppression of the order of the Temple, some of the recalcitrant Knights, maintaining their influence over the Free Masons, would be able to pervert what hitherto had been a harmless ceremony into an elaborate ritual that should impart some of the errors of the Templars to the initiated. A document was long ago published which purports to be a charter granted to a lodge of Free Masons in England in the time of Henry VII., and it bears the marks in its religious indifference of a suspicious likeness between Freemasonry then and now. In Germany the guild was numerous, and was formally recognised by a diploma granted in 1489 by the Emperor Maximilian. But this sanction was finally revoked by the Imperial Diet in 1707.

So far, however, the Free Masons were really working stonemasons; but the so-called Cologne Charter—the genuineness of which seems certain—drawn up in 1535 at a meeting of Free Masons gathered at Cologne to celebrate the opening of the cathedral edifice, is signed by Melanchthon, Coligny, and other similar ill-omened names. Nothing certain is known of the Free Masons—now evidently become a sect—during the seventeenth century, except that in 1646 Elias Ashmole, an Englishman, founded the order of Rose Croix, Rosicrucians, or Hermetic Freemasons—a society which mingled in a fantastic manner the jargon of alchemy and other occult sciences with pantheism. This order soon became affiliated to some of the Masonic lodges in Germany, where from the time of the Reformation there was a constant founding of societies, secret or open, which undertook to formulate a philosophy or a religion of their own.

As we know it now, however, Freemasonry first appeared in 1725, when Lord Derwentwater, a supporter of the expelled Stuart dynasty, introduced the order into France, professing to have his authority from a lodge at Kilwinning, Scotland. This formed the basis of that variety of Freemasonry called the Scotch Rite. Rival organisations soon sprang up. Charters were obtained from a lodge at York, which was said to have been of very ancient foundation. In 1754 Martinez Pasquales, a Portuguese Jew, began in some of the French lodges the new degree of "cohens," or priests, which was afterwards developed into a system by the notorious Saint-Martin, and is usually referred to as French Illuminism. But it remained for Adam Weishaupt, Professor of Canon Law at the University of Ingolstadt, in Bavaria, to give a definite shape to the anti-Christian tendencies of Freemasonry. In 1776, two years after the expulsion of the Jesuits from the university, he brought together a number of his pupils and friends, and organised the order of the Illuminati, which he established on the already existing degrees of Freemasonry. The avowed object of the Illuminati was to bring back mankind—beginning with the Illuminated—to their primitive liberty by destroying religion, for which this newest philosophical invention was to be substituted, and by re-shaping ideas of property, society, marriage, &c. One of the Illuminati, a Sicilian, Joseph Balsamo, otherwise Cagliostro, organised what he called Cabalistic Freemasonry, under the name of the Rite of Misraim. He it was who in 1783 predicted, as the approaching work of the Freemasons, the overthrow of the French monarchy. Indeed, Fremasonry was very active in the French Revolution, and assisted in bringing about many of the calamities which accompanied the great upturning of society.

Freemasonry in the meantime had split up into numerous sects, or "rites," all working to the common effect of destroying a belief in the divine revelation of Christianity. In 1781 a great assembly of all the Masonic rites was held at Wilhelmsbad, in Hanover, under the presidency of the Duke of Brunswick, which refused to recognise Weishaupt's system, but at the same time permitted the most mischievous tenets of Illuminism to be engrafted on the higher degrees of Freemasonry, especially of the so-called Scotch Rite. About this time the Scotch Rite was established at Charleston, S. C., by some officers of the French auxiliary army. The York Rite had been introduced into the United States by English colonists.

Freemasonry in continental Europe has been the hatching-ground of most of the revolutionary societies, many of which were affiliated to the higher Masonic degrees. In France the sect was officially recognised by the government of Napoleon III., but advanced Freemasons bore this unwillingly, as it involved restraint. An avowed belief in God was required for initiation, but this requirement, through the efforts of M. Macé, of the University, was finally abolished in the convention of Freemasons held at Paris, September 14, 1877.

A recent French writer maintains that Freemasonry is—unknown to most of the craft—managed by five or six Jews, who bend its influence in every possible way to the furtherance of the anti-Christian movement that passes under the name of Liberalism. Throughout continental Europe, in the Spanish-American States, and in Brazil, Freemasonry has of late years again become very active. The war against the Catholic Church in Germany had no more bitter supporter than Freemasonry. If the Culturkampf was not directed from the lodges, at least nearly all its leaders were Freemasons. During "the Commune" of Paris, in 1871, Masonic lodges took part as a body in the insurrection, marching out to the fight with their red banners. In France and Belgium the lodges have officially commanded their members to assist the Ligue de l'Enseignement—a league intended to bring about the complete secularisation of the primary public schools.

In the English-speaking countries, however, Freemasonry has hitherto protested its respect for government and established society, and it has not had any immediate action on politics, its members being usually found as numerous in one political party as another. But it has never failed indirectly to use its influence for the advancement of its members over others. English-speaking Freemasons have usually been accustomed to regard the pantheism of their rituals as an amusing mummery rather than as a reality. These Freemasons usually disown for their order any aims but those of a convivial and mutual-benefit society, but no one can fail to see that indifferentism in religion at least is one of the necessary results of English-speaking Freemasonry at its best. But the constant influx into the English-speaking countries of Jews and Continental Freemasons must necessarily impregnate the order with all the poison of the Continental sect.

Freemasonry is essentially opposed to the belief in the personality of God, whose name in the Masonic rituals veils the doctrine of blind force only governing the universe. It is also essentially subversive of legitimate authority, for by professing to furnish man with an all-sufficient guide and help to conduct, it makes him independent of the Church, and by its everywhere ridiculing rank and authority it tends, in spite of its occasional protests of loyalty, to bring all governments into contempt.

The sect has been repeatedly condemned by learned and respectable men of all countries, Protestant and Catholic. Six bulls have been directed against it by name—viz. "In eminenti," Clement XII.,

1738: "Providas," Benedict XIV., 1751; "Ecclesiam Jesu Christi," Pius VII., 1821; "Qui graviora," Leo XII., 1826; "Quanta cura," Pius IX., 1864; "Humanum genus," Leo XIII., 1884.

FRIAR. The word is a corruption of the French frère, the distinguishing title of the members of the mendicant orders. The Franciscans and Dominicans, approved by the Holy See in 1210 and 1216 respectively, were the first friars; to these Innocent IV. in 1245 added the Carmelites, and Alexander IV. the Augustinian hermits (1256). Hence Chaucer, writing about 1390, speaks of "alle the ordres foure."[1] The Servites received in the fifteenth century the same privileges as the four mendicant orders from Martin V. and Innocent VIII.

FRONTAL (antipendium, pallium). An embroidered cloth which often covers the front side of the altar. The colour, according to the rubrics of the missal, should vary with the feast or season. In early times the altar was open in front, so that there was no need of such a covering, and even now Gavantus says it may be dispensed with if the altar is of costly material or fine workmanship. (Gavant. P. I. tit. xx.)

FUNERAL (exequiæ). The following are the chief points in the funeral rite as prescribed in the Roman Ritual. The corpse is borne in procession with lights to the church. The parish-priest assists in surplice and black stole; the clerks carry the holy water and cross; the coffin is first sprinkled with holy water and the psalm "De Profundis" recited; then the corpse is carried to the church while the "Miserere" is said. The coffin is then placed in the middle of the building, with the feet to the altar if the dead person was a layman, the head if he was a priest. Candles are lighted round the coffin, and the office and Mass of the dead, followed by the absolution, accompanied by aspersion and incensation over the corpse, are said. Then another procession, and the corpse is carried to the tomb. At the grave the "Benedictus" is sung, with the antiphon, "I am the resurrection and the life," and a prayer for the soul of the departed. The body is sprinkled for the last time with holy water, just before the prayer. The funeral of infants is very different. The psalms said are of praise and thanksgiving, nor is there, of course, any prayer for the repose of the soul. The vestments used by the officiating clergy are white, a crown of flowers is placed on the coffin, and the church bells are not rung, or else rung with a joyful tone. The Ritual speaks of these rites as handed down by "most ancient custom;" and with good right. The custom of bearing the dead body to the grave with psalms, and the Mass for the soul of the departed, can be traced back to very early times; indeed, the funeral procession is the oldest of all, being mentioned by Fathers such as Gregory Nazianzen, Jerome and Chrysostom, who wrote in the age immediately following the heathen persecution of the Church. The last of these Fathers (Hom. iv. in Hebr.) notes the custom of carrying lighted torches at these processions, and as early at least as the sixth century (see Greg. Turon. "Vit. Patr." c. 14) the cross was carried. The practice, on the other hand, of tolling the bell at funerals does not date beyond the eighth or ninth age. (See Smith and Cheetham, Article, Burials.)

In the Greek rite, as given by Goar, the clergy keep vigil and sing psalms by the corpse. The kiss of peace is given to the corpse or at least to the coffin, and at the actual interment the priest sprinkles the coffin with earth and then with oil from the lamp, or else ashes from the censer

GALILEO. The object of the present article is, not to write a Life of Galileo, but to give an account, as clear as our limits will permit, of the two condemnations of the doctrine of the immobility of the sun and the rotation of the earth, pronounced by the Congregations of the Holy Office (Roman Inquisition) and the Index, with special reference to the teaching and writing of Galileo in 1616 and 1633. After the most material facts have been narrated without comment, it will be necessary to examine three separate points:—1. What was the precise nature of the condemnation pronounced? 2. What was the character the considerations which appeared to the Pope and the cardinals to justify them in pronouncing it? 3. Was Galileo, as some writers have maintained, really put to the torture?

In 1613 the great astronomer, who had long inclined to the heliocentric[1] system of Copernicus, published a letter addressed to his friend the Padre Castelli, in which he says that it is not the object of God in the Holy Scriptures to teach us science and philosophy, and that the received Ptolemaic system could no more be reconciled to the text of Scripture than the Copernican. Some time afterwards, in 1615, he wrote a much longer and more important letter to the Grand Duchess Christina of Tuscany, in which he is said[2] to have endeavoured to accommodate to the Copernican theory the various passages in Scripture which seem to be inconsistent with it. This letter was not published till 1636, but its tenor appears to have become known to many persons. Galileo visited Rome towards the end of 1615, and was shortly summoned before the Congregation of the Holy Office. The original minutes, showing exactly what occurred, have been published by M. de l'Épinois.[3] On February 25, 1616, Cardinal Millin reported to the Congregation that the Pope (Paul V.) had ordered that Cardinal Bellarmine should call Galileo before him, and should "warn him to abandon the said opinion [of the immobility of the sun, &c.], and if he refused to obey, the Father Commissary . . . . was to lay a command upon him to abstain altogether from teaching or defending a doctrine and opinion of this kind, or from dealing with it [in any way]." If he was refractory, he was to be imprisoned—"carceretur." The minutes of the following day show how all this was done, and an injunction, as above, laid upon Galileo: "in which command the said Galileo acquiesced, and promised to obey it." The prohibition of the Pope was identical in intention[1] with that contained in a decree of the Congregation of the Index dated a week later, March 5, 1616. This decree first condemns five theologico-political works, and then goes on to say that it has come to the knowledge of the Sacred Congregation "that the well-known doctrine—of Pythagorean origin and wholly repugnant to the sacred Scriptures—concerning the mobility of the earth and the immobility of the sun," formerly taught by Copernicus and Diego of Astorga, "was now being spread abroad and embraced by many; . . . . therefore, lest such an opinion should insinuate itself any more, to the destruction of Catholic truth, it gave sentence" that the books of Copernicus and Diego "should be suspended [from circulation] till they were corrected," that the work of a certain Foscarini upholding the same opinion should be altogether prohibited and condemned, "and that all other books teaching the same thing were to be similarly prohibited."

That this decree was sanctioned and confirmed by the Pope it is impossible to doubt. The writer of the article Galileo in the "Encyclopædia Britannica" maintains that its responsibility rests with a disciplinary congregation in no sense representing the Church, and that it was never confirmed by the Pope. This view is untenable in view of the fact that in any decree of one of the Sacred Congregations confirmed and ordered to be published by the Pope, it is the Pope himself who speaks—not the cardinals merely—if not always in his capacity of Universal Doctor, yet always in that of Supreme Pastor or ruler. That the decree was not confirmed by Paul V. there is not, so far as we know, the smallest shred of evidence for maintaining; and the onus probandi rests on those who make an assertion so improbable.

Galileo was thus estopped by a decision in which he had acquiesced, and which he had promised not to infringe, from publishing anything more on the Copernican theory. Some years passed; Urban VIII. ascended the Papal chair in 1623; he was an enlightened man, of considerable learning, and, as Cardinal Barberini, had had much friendly intercourse with Galileo.

[1] The terms "heliocentric" and "geocentric," as denoting the systems which assume the sun or the earth respectively to be the fixed centre round which the planets revolve, are borrowed from two articles in the Dublin Review (believed to be by Dr. Ward), of which we have made free use in the present paper: one is headed "Copernicanism and Pope Paul V." (April 1871); the other, "Galileo and the Pontifical Congregations" (July 1871).

[3] Les Pièces du Procès de Galilée, Rome, Paris, 1877.

[1] This is certain; for Bellarmine, in the certificate which he gave to Galileo in 1616—of which we shall again have occasion to speak—says that "the declaration made by the Pope, and published by the Sacred Congregation of the Index [italics ours], was notified to him," &c.

The philosopher visited Rome in 1624, and was received with great warmth and kindness by the Pope. Soon after this he began to return to the forbidden subject; in an essay on sun-spots he assumed the fact of the sun's immobility. In his famous Dialogo on the "System of the World," published at Florence in February 1632, he spoke out still more plainly. The dialogue is carried on between three persons, Salviati, Sagredo, and Simplicio; the last being a well-meaning ignoramus, who supports the Ptolemaic side by arguments manifestly futile. At the conclusion of the work the question is in words left open; but the whole effect of the treatise is said to be that of a powerful and vehement defence of the Copernican theory. The book reached Rome at the end of February 1632, and caused great excitement. The Pope was very angry; he said that Galileo had been ill advised; that great mischief might be done to religion in this way, greater than was ever done before.[1] Riccardi, the Master of the Apostolic Palace, whose licence Galileo had obtained for the printing of the book by representations which do not not seem quite straightforward, complained that arguments which Urban himself had used to Galileo against the Copernican theory were in the Dialogo placed in the mouth of Simplicio, a ridiculous personage. The authority of Aristotle was in that age inconceivably great, and Aristotle had believed the earth to be immovable. The Peripatetics —so his followers were called—flocked round the Pope, urged against Galileo the breach of his promise, and the insulting neglect of the prohibition of 1616, and pressed for the condemnation both of the book and its author. Urban, still desirous of keeping the case out of the Inquisition, appointed a commission of theologians to examine and report on the book. Their report was submitted in September 1632; it was highly unfavourable to Galileo. The Pope then wrote to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, in whose service Galileo was at the time, saying that the case must go before the Inquisition, and that the accused must come to Rome and stand his trial. After a considerable delay, which produced a stern letter from Urban (December 30, 1632) to the effect that if Galileo could travel at all he was to be sent up to Rome in chains, the philosopher departed from Florence and arrived in Rome about the middle of February 1633, taking up his abode at the Tuscan embassy. The trial came on in April; for ten days after its commencement Galileo was committed to the house of the fiscal of the Holy Office; but on his complaining that from his feeble state of health he could ill bear the confinement, he was allowed to return to the Tuscan embassy.

The minutes of the Holy Office show that Galileo was examined on April 12 and 30, May 10, and June 21. The report of the commissioners, one of whom was Melchior Inchofer, told heavily against him. Melchior said that the author of the Dialogo did not put the case in favour of the immobility of the sun "hypothetice," but "theorematice," and that his having written in Italian, so that "vulgares etiam homines" might read it, made the matter worse. The disobedience to the command issued by the Holy Office in 1616 was also much dwelt upon; to which Galileo could only reply by putting in the certificate which he had obtained at the time from Bellarmine,[1] and pleading that as the latter had not in this expressly referred to the injunction not to write any more on the question, he had forgotten all about it. It is probable that this was not believed, and that some intention other than one purely scientific was ascribed to him, as accounting for his open disregard of the prohibition of 1616. We read in the minutes for June 16, 1633, that the Pope ordered that Galileo should be questioned "concerning his intention, a threat even of torture being used to him; and that if he persisted in his statement (et si sustinuerit), his abjuration having been first taken, he was to be condemned," &c.

On June 21 he was examined according to this instruction. Being asked whether he had not held the opinion [of the immobility of the sun] since the decree of 1616, he said, "I do not hold and have not held this opinion of Copernicus since it was intimated to me by authority (con precetto) that I must abandon it; for the rest, I am here in your hands: you must do what you please." He was then warned to speak the truth, otherwise the torture would be applied. He answered, "I am here to make my submission, and I have not held this opinion since the decision was given, as I have said." He was then allowed to withdraw. The sentence was pronounced the next day in the convent of the Minerva. A full narrative of what passed may be read in a letter addressed by the Cardinal di S. Onofrio on July 2, 1633, to the Inquisition of Venice.[1] The sentence opened with the words, "Whereas thou, Galileo," &c., and after reciting the proceedings of 1615 and 1616, stated that the Holy Office appointed theologians on that occasion as qualificators, who reported to this effect:—

[1] L'Epinois, La Question de Galilée, p. 114.

[1] The certificate ends thus—after stating that Galileo had made no abjuration, nor been put to penance—"but only the declaration made by the Pope and published by the Sacred Congregation of the Index was solemnly notified to him, in which it is contained that the doctrine attributed to Copernicus that the earth moves round the sun, and that the sun remains in the centre of the world without moving from east to west, is contrary to the Sacred Scriptures, and therefore cannot be defended or held. In testimony whereof," &c.

1. That the sun is the centre of the world and immovable is a proposition absurd and false in philosophy, and formally heretical, as being expressly contrary to Holy Scripture.

2. That the earth is not the centre of the world, nor immovable, but that it moves even with a diurnal motion, is in like manner a proposition absurd and false in philosophy, and, considered in theology, at least erroneous in faith.

The accused is reminded that, after Bellarmine had advised and admonished him, the then commissary of the Inquisition told him that he could not defend or teach that doctrine any more, either orally or in writing. In publishing the Dialogo he had manifestly disobeyed the precept, and in consequence of the publication, the tribunal understood, the said opinion was spreading more and more. He had acted disingenuously in saying nothing about the precept when he applied for the licence to print. Mistrusting him, the tribunal had thought it right to proceed to the rigorous examen ("rigoroso esame") in which he had answered as a Catholic should ("rispondesti cattolicamente"). "We therefore," proceeds the tribunal, "say, pronounce, declare, &c., that you, Galileo, have made yourself vehemently suspect of heresy to this Holy Office—i.e. of having believed and held a doctrine false and contrary to the sacred and divine Scriptures." He had therefore incurred all the usual penalties; nevertheless the tribunal would absolve him if he abjured and detested the said errors. But, as a warning to others, they ordered: 1, that his Dialogo should be prohibited; 2, that he should be "formally" imprisoned[1] during the pleasure of the Holy Office; 3, that he should say once a week for three years to come, the seven penitential psalms. Galileo then abjured the condemned opinion,[2] and swore never to promote it in future, and to denounce to the Holy Office any whom he might find maintaining it.

Harsh as this sentence sounds, the fact is that Galileo was treated with little that can be called severity for the remainder of his life. He resided at first at Siena, afterwards in his own villa at Arcetri, near Florence. He was so far under restraint that he was not allowed to go into the city, nor to remove elsewhere without permission; but within his own house and grounds he seems to have been left entirely free. Milton visited him at Arcetri in 1638 or 1639. "There [i.e. in Italy] I found and visited the famous Galileo, grown old, a prisoner to the Inquisition."[3] Perhaps Milton did not mean to mislead, but the common inference drawn from his words has been, that he found Galileo immured in the dungeons of the Inquisition,[4] instead of living as a private gentleman in his own country house. The philosopher died at an advanced age at Arcetri in 1642.

Such, in brief outline, were the facts of this celebrated condemnation. Before considering the motives actuating those who pronounced it, let us examine what the sentence itself amounted to. Did the Roman Pontiff, at any stage of these proceedings, pronounce ex cathedra that the theory of Copernicus was wrong, and that the earth was the fixed centre of the world? The writer in the "Dublin Review" already referred to appears to us to make it quite plain that the Roman Pontiff did nothing of the kind. Whether the decrees of Pontifical congregations on matters of doctrine, in which there is a clause expressly asserting the Papal sanction, are or are not to be regarded as ex cathedra and infallible judgments, is a point, according to the reviewer, on which theologians are not entirely agreed; but no one, he adds, has ever doubted that decrees not containing this clause are not to be regarded as decisions ex cathedra. Now, the decree of the Congregation of the Index of March 5, 1616, does not contain the clause; it cannot, therefore, be regarded as defining ex cathedra.

I. What, then, does the decree decide or do? It decides that the theory of Copernicus is "false" and "entirely contrary to Scripture," and that the books which teach it are to be prohibited. To this must be added the language used by the Holy Office in the preamble of their sentence, as given in a previous paragraph. It is abundantly clear that both Pontifical congregations held that the opinion about the earth's motion now universally received was false and contrary to Scripture, and that no Catholic could hold it without falling into heresy. The reviewer maintains that it was natural and inevitable that they should so regard it, seeing that the obvious sense of Scripture is unquestionably opposed to the Copernican theory, and only "some overwhelming scientific probability" (p. 159) could render it legitimate to override the obvious in favour of an unobvious sense. Later researches have supplied this overwhelming probability, and consequently all Catholics now "admit that the Holy Ghost for wise purposes . . . permitted the sacred writers to express themselves in language which was literally true as understood by them, but was figurative in the highest degree as intended by Him" (ib.).

The reviewer moreover contends that, although all Catholics were bound to assent to the decrees, they were not thereby obliged to hold the geocentric theory as an article of divine faith—i.e. with an assent excluding all doubt. To maintain the contradictory of this proposition would be absurd, since the heliocentric theory was allowed to be proposed hypothetically, but the Church would never for a moment allow even the hypothetical maintenance[1] of an opinion contrary to an article of faith. For instance, what impossibility is greater than that, since 1854, the Church should allow any Catholic theologian to maintain, as a hypothesis, that the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception is untrue? But that the heliocentric theory might be hypothetically propounded after the decree of 1616 is indisputable. For, first, Galileo deposed before the Holy Office in 1633[1] that in 1616 Cardinal Bellarmine spoke approvingly, both as to him and Copernicus, of their holding the opinion of the movement of the earth "ex suppositione and not absolutely." Secondly, the same Bellarmine declared in 1620, "that if a scientific proof of Copernicanism were discovered, Scripture should then be Copernically interpreted;"[2] and the theologian Amort, writing in 1734, expressed himself to the same effect.[3] Thirdly, the report of Melchior Inchofer speaks of "the reasons by which Galileo assertively, absolutely, and not hypothetically . . . maintains the motion of the earth;" whence it may be inferred that to maintain it hypothetically would not have been censurable.[4]

II. The meaning and effect of the decrees being what we have described, the question arises, Was there any urgent, and at the same time justifiable, motive for issuing them at all? After all, it may be said, the opinion condemned by the decrees has come to be universally believed; was it not therefore a mistake, to say the least, to attempt thus to suppress it? Has not the logic of events proved that course to be wrong? Such questions as these will be differently answered according to the varying estimates which people may form of the value of a stable religious conviction. The Pope and the cardinals believed in 1616 that if everyone might freely teach, at universities or by printed books, that the earth revolved round the sun, a great weakening of religious faith would ensue, owing to the apparent inconsistency of such teaching with a number of well-known passages in the Bible. They might remember that Giordano Bruno, an ardent Copernican, had also taught pantheism with equal ardour. The standing danger on the side of Protestantism was, they might think, sufficiently formidable, without the addition to it—while it could still be staved off—of a danger on the side of physical science. At the present day the youth of Italy listen to infidel lectures and read bad books without restriction; one single book of this kind, Renan's Vie de Jésus, is said to have caused loss of faith to innumerable readers in Spain and Italy. With loss of faith there comes too often, as we all know, a shipwreck in morals. Are the young Italians of to-day whom no one thinks of shielding from the knowledge of attacks on Christianity, morally purer and intellectually stronger than their partially protected predecessors of the seventeenth century? We are not in a position to answer the question; but those who believe that the case is not so, but much otherwise, may well approve the solicitude of the rulers of the Church at the former period—when the repression of bad books was still possible—to protect the Christian faith of the rising generation of Italians. Few Catholics would hesitate to say, even now, that it would have been to the unspeakable advantage of European society and individual souls, if the bad book by Renan just adverted to had been summarily suppressed at its birth, and the writer imprisoned, at least "formally." Far be it from us so to disparage the honoured name of Galileo as to suggest for a moment that the two cases are parallel. Galileo was a Christian all along, and could no more have written the sentimental impieties of the Vie de Jésus than could Urban VIII. himself. Still there can be no doubt that the Pope and cardinals—besides thinking his personal behaviour censurable, because he had broken a distinct promise and disregarded a solemn warning—believed that the interests of religion required that Copernicanism should be no otherwise taught than as a scientific hypothesis. The decrees, it is true, say nothing as to a hypothetical propounding: to them the Copernican theory is simply false. But this is the usual style of all disciplinary tribunals. The words of Bellarmine before quoted leave no doubt as to the Church's mind, and an important step towards their realisation was taken when in 1757—the Newtonian philosophy which involves the centrality of the sun having been favourably received at Rome—Benedict XIV. suspended the decree of the Congregation of the Index above described.[1]

[1] There need be no question as to the sincerity of the Pope and cardinals in repudiating Copernicanism. So far as was then known, the appearances of nature might be equally well explained on either theory, and Scripture in its obvious meaning agreed with one and not with the other. Neither Bacon, nor Tycho Brahe, nor Descartes, accepted the Copernican theory.

III. One more question remains—whether Galileo was or was not tortured in the course of his examination. It is extremely painful to read of torture being even threatened to a man so warmly loved by a host of friends, and to whom science was under such profound obligations. However, one may feel reasonably confident that it was no more than a threat. M. l'Epinois (La Question de Galilée, p. 104) enters fully into the question, and shows (1) that no one in the seventeenth century ever said or thought, so far as appears, that Galileo had been actually tortured; (2) that a special "interlocutory sentence" of the judge must have been given before the application of the torture, and that of such sentence there is no trace; (3) that even if such sentence had been given, Galileo might have legally appealed against it on the ground of age and ill-health, and that his appeal must have been allowed. For these and several other reasons which we have not space to analyse, L'Epinois considers that it is scarcely possible to doubt that the torture, though threatened, was not actually administered.

GALLICAN LITURGIES. [See LITURGIES.]

GALLICANISM. The tendency to enlarge the prerogatives of a national church—in the particular case, of the church of France—and to restrict proportionately the authority of the Holy See. It was this tendency which was exemplified alike in the Harlays and Le Telliers in France, and the Gardiners, Heaths, and Bonners of our own country. The habit of thinking of Rome as a power to be kept in check rather than loved and obeyed, produces a desire to restrict its authority in all directions, in regard to doctrine no less than discipline. Hence a secondary phase of Gallicanism was—the tendency to exalt the authority of a general council, and to depress correspondingly that of the Pope.

Gallicanism in the first sense is the natural growth of a state of things in which despotic kings and corrupt metropolitans play into each other's hands, in order to dispose of Church property, patronage and influence as they please. For three hundred years after the death of Charlemagne, such kings and such metropolitans were but too common, both in France and Germany. The wealth of the metropolitan sees being very great, princes used often to contrive that their brothers or their illegitimate sons should be appointed to them; often, too, they would sell the nomination for a large sum; and in that turbulent age the simoniacal intruder was generally able for many years, perhaps for a lifetime, to set the canons at nought and retain the benefice. The bishops, less exposed to corrupting influences than the metropolitans, maintained discipline as well as they could; but episcopal decisions were often referred by appeal to metropolitans, and were reviewed—when these had been appointed in the manner above described—in no equitable or conscientious spirit. A metropolitan decided a cause, perhaps for money, against a bishop; what was the bishop to do? Appeal to Rome, of course, whence he might hope to obtain a final and overriding sentence, quashing the unjust judgment of the metropolitan. Against such appeals the latter, and his prince also, would naturally protest. Why should not the bishop be content with a decision given in the highest ecclesiastical court in the country, and approved by the civil power? Why should he go to Rome? Here we have Gallicanism at its fountain head. The opposite view—that which makes Rome the mother and mistress of all churches, and persists in regarding her as qualified to review all causes and redress all wrongs in matters ecclesiastical—though sometimes called Ultramontane, has been adopted by all the saints, and all clear-sighted Catholics, in every age of the Church. It comes out forcibly [FALSE DECRETALS] in the pseudo-Isidorian compilation, a work of the ninth century, and it dictated the celebrated Concordat of Worms (1122), where the right of the Pope to intervene in the appointment of all bishops was distinctly recognised.

For many generations those ecclesiastics in France who desired to uphold the royal power, and strengthen the prerogatives of the national church, were content to appeal to the old canonical practice (usus canonum, observantia juris antiqui) against what they regarded as Roman encroachments. Gradually—as a consequence, partly of the contest between Boniface VIII. and Philip le Bel, partly of the declarations made in the Councils of Constance and Basle—two principles began to be enunciated by the national party: one, that the King of France was absolutely independent of the Pope in all temporal matters; the other, that the Papal power was not absolute, must be exercised within the limits of the canons, and was inferior to that of a general council. By the Pragmatic Sanction of 1438, passed at Bourges, the Gallican church, in union with the king, adopted the decrees of the Council of Basle abolishing Papal reservations and expectatives, and restricting appeals to Rome to the causæ majores. Many Popes protested against the Pragmatic Sanction; but it was maintained till the date of the concordat (1516) between Leo X. and Francis I., and although it was then abolished, several of its provisions continued to be in force. On the whole, there was in the sixteenth century a large body of customs and privileges, more or less ancient, which the courtly portion of the clergy delighted to speak of as the "Gallican liberties." A crisis came in the seventeenth century. Through the arbitrary extension by Louis XIV. of the royal right called Regalia [see that article], a collision occurred between the Crown and two bishops, those of Aleth and Pamiers. The bishops excommunicated the Crown nominees: the metropolitans of Toulouse and Narbonne, on being appealed to, cancelled the sentences of the bishops; these last then appealed to Rome, and Innocent XI. annulled the decisions of the metropolitans. In these circumstances an assembly of the French clergy was convened. Bossuet, just elected to the see of Meaux, was requested to preach the opening sermon; he delivered the celebrated discourse "On the Unity of the Church;" concerning which there is nothing more remarkable than that the man who defended so eloquently the rights of the chair of Peter should a few days afterwards sign the Gallican Articles.

These articles, four in number, were drawn up in March 1682, and are to the following effect:—

The first denied that Peter and his successors had received any power from God extending to civil and temporal affairs, declared that kings were subject to no ecclesiastical power in temporals, and denied the deposing power of the Pope. [DEPOSING POWER.]

The second ratifies the third and fourth sessions of the Council of Constance [see that article] concerning the authority of the council relatively to that of the Pope, and denies that these sessions refer only to the time of the schism.

The third asserts the force and validity of the laws, customs, and constitutions of the realm and of the Gallican church.

The fourth is as follows: "The Pope has the principal share in questions of faith; his decrees regard all the churches and each church in particular; nevertheless his judgment is not irreformable, unless the consent of the Church be added."[1]

The question of the Regalia fell into the background, after the publication of the Articles of 1682; besides, the bishops would not oppose the Court, and the Pope could not successfully vindicate the rights of the French church without some help from its leaders. It will be observed that the two tendencies of Gallicanism—that which would limit the action of Rome in discipline, and that which would place its authority below that of a general council in doctrine—were both broadly affirmed in these articles. The Spanish, Flemish, and Italian clergy repudiated them; Alexander VIII. (1690) pronounced them null and void; Clement IX. (1716), and afterwards Pius VI. renewed the condemnation. Louis XIV. withdrew in 1692 the edict by which he had approved the four articles; but he did so, not on the ground that they were condemned by the Holy See, and unsafe for Christians to hold, but because the particular conjunction of affairs which gave rise to them had passed away.

Far from ushering in a period of greater freedom for the French church, the declaration of 1682 was merely another link in the chain which politicians and lawyers had long been forging, for the enslavement of the Church to the laity. Fénelon wrote: "In practice the King of France is more the head of the Church than the Pope. Liberty towards the Pope: servitude towards the king. The king's power over the Church has fallen into the hands of the civil tribunals. Laymen lord it over the bishops. Secular judges go so far as to examine even those Papal bulls which relate only to matters of faith." Jansenism, in so far as it fostered insubordination towards the Holy See, co-operated with Gallicanism. When the Revolution came, and the doctrinaires of the Convention produced the Civil Constitution of the Clergy (see that article), they were only pushing the worst side of Gallicanism to its logical outcome. But the great majority of the French clergy saw and recoiled from the snare, and from the day that they did so Gallicanism was doomed. In our own day, there has, indeed, been a party among the French clergy which has been less Ultramontane than the rest; hence the "inopportunist" opposition at the Vatican Council. But the definition of the Infallibility of the Pope has made the doctrinal basis of Gallicanism formal heresy; and the breach made by the revolution in the ecclesiastical traditions of France, the suppression of the old tribunals, and the generally deepened apprehension in Catholic society of the rights and divinely founded authority of the Papacy, combine to render it unlikely that even the Gallican temper, in relation to the supreme ecclesiastical authority on the one hand and the civil power on the other, will ever reappear on any large scale in the Church.

[1] It is scarcely necessary to remark, that to adhere to this last proposition of the fourth article, since the promulgation of the constitution Romanum Pontificem at the Vatican Council, would amount to formal heresy.

GANGRA, COUNCIL OF. We possess the twenty-one canons of this council, which was held at Gangra, the capital of Paphlagonia, but its precise date is unknown. The chief intention of the canons is that of condemning the false asceticism of Eustathius of Sebaste, or rather of his followers [see EUSTATHIANS]. Eustathius no longer held the see of Sebaste in 380, and some have thought that he was deposed by this Council of Gangra; if that were so, its date would probably be 379 or 380—not earlier, because St. Basil, who died in 379, makes no mention of it. It anathematises those who out of spiritual pride and a false conception of purity blamed marriage, and despised those who were married; at the same time it guards itself from being supposed not to honour and admire virginity and continence when embraced with humility and charity. (Fleury, "Hist. du Christ." Book xvii.; Smith and Wace, "Christian Biography," art. Eustathius.)

GAUDETE SUNDAY. The third Sunday of Advent, so called from the first word of the Introit, Gaudete, "rejoice." On this day cardinals are required to wear pale-rose dresses.

GENERAL (of an Order). From the foundation of the orders of friars it became usual for religious orders and congregations of men to be under the rule of a general superior, usually elected in general chapter for three years, or some other fixed term. In the Society of Jesus the general is elected for life. The Benedictine order, as such, is not governed by a general; but a precedency of rank is accorded to the abbot of Monte Cassino, who is styled "Abbas abbatum." Most, if not all, of the congregations that have sprung from the Benedictine order, or grown up within it (e.g. the orders of Cluny and Citeaux, and the congregation of St. Maur), have established generalates. In such cases, the general has been usually the abbot of the mother house, as at Cluny; hence the title "Abbas generalis."

The prelates of regular orders enjoy special powers and privileges. A general has ordinary spiritual jurisdiction over his subjects in utroque foro. Generals and provincials have the same power of absolution in reserved cases, in relation to their subjects, which bishops have in relation to their diocesans. Generals can reserve to themselves eleven cases (specified in the decree of Clement VIII., 1593), but not more, without the consent of the chapter general. Although neither abbots nor superiors of orders were summoned to the first six general councils, yet from the date of the seventh onwards, exemptions from episcopal control having been freely granted to religious orders by the Holy See, the custom was gradually established that, not only abbots with quasi-episcopal jurisdiction, but also the generals of orders, "should be present at a general synod as judges, and subscribe its decrees, having a decisive vote, and the right of defining."[1] Seven generals of religious orders subscribed the decrees of Trent.

These powers and privileges of regular prelates are shared in part by the Superiors General of regular and secular clerks, such as the Theatines, Barnabites, Redemptorists, Passionists, &c. Several modern congregations of women have also general superiors, but their canonical position is of course quite different.

Generals are forbidden by the law to enter without necessity the convents of nuns subject to them; their visitations of such convents are, as a rule, to be made not oftener than once a year. Nor can they hear the confessions of such nuns without the approbation of the bishop. Nor can they, on pain of excommunication, grant any office or dignity, or remit any punishment, to one of their subjects at the instance of any person outside the order, whatever the rank of that person may be.

(Ferraris, Regularis Prælatus, Relig. Regulares; Tamburinus, "De Jure Abbatum," Rome, 1629.)

GENERAL CONFESSION. A confession of sins committed by the penitent since baptism, so far as they can be remembered. Such a confession is of course necessary in the case of those who have made no previous confession, or whose previous confessions have been invalid—e.g. because they wilfully concealed a mortal sin or were wanting in true and supernatural sorrow. It is advisable if the validity of the past confessions is very doubtful. But sometimes persons repeat in a general confession sins for which they have already received absolution, although there is no reason to consider this absolution invalid. Moral theologians and ascetical writers admit the utility of this practice in certain cases. Thus a person may reasonably desire to make such a confession in order to obtain direction when he proposes to enter on a new state of life; or, again, to acquire deeper humility and a better knowledge of himself. Hence it is common to make a general confession before first communion, ordination, religious profession, &c. But the practice of frequently making general confessions leads to great loss of time, occasions scruples, and is strongly discouraged by spiritual authors and prudent confessors.

GENUFLEXION (the bending of the knee) is a natural sign of adoration or reverence. It is frequently used in the ritual of the Church. Thus the faithful genuflect in passing before the tabernacle where the Blessed Sacrament is reserved; the priest repeatedly genuflects at Mass in adoration of the Eucharist, also at the mention of the Incarnation in the Creed, &c. Genuflexion is also made as a sign of profound respect before a bishop on certain occasions. A double genuflexion—i.e. one on both knees—is made on entering or leaving a church where the Blessed Sacrament is exposed.

The early Christians prayed standing on Sundays, and from Easter till Pentecost, and only bent the knee in sign of penance; hence a class of penitents were known as Genuflectentes. A relic of this penitential use of genuflection survives, according to Gavantus (P. I. tit. 16), in the practice enjoined by the rubric of genuflecting at the verse "Adjuva nos," in the Tract of Masses during Lent.

GHOST. Among the ancient Greeks, Romans, and Germans, the belief in apparitions of departed spirits was widely spread. In the Old Testament there are many allusions to necromancers, who professed to summon up the spirits of the dead; and possibly in 1 Reg. xxviii. 7 we have the account of a real apparition. Some of the Fathers (e.g. Justin and Origen) suppose that Samuel's ghost really did appear to Saul when he consulted the witch of Endor; others (e.g. Tertullian and Jerome) regard the supposed appearance of Samuel's spirit as a diabolical imposture. Many apparitions of saints after death are recorded in the history of the Church.

The theological principles on the matter are stated by St. Thomas, "Summ." Supp. qu. 69, a. 3. According to the natural course of things, no soul can leave heaven or hell, even for a time, or quit purgatory till its purification is completed. But God may permit departed souls to appear on earth for many wise reasons—e.g. that the saints may help men; that the sight of lost souls may warn them; that the spirits in purgatory may obtain prayers. St. Thomas even thinks that God has communicated to the saints a permanent power of appearing on earth when they please.

GILBERTINES. [See SEMPRINGHAM, ORDER OF.]

GILDS, GUILDS (A.S. gildan, to pay). The history of the word is obscure; in the Anglo-Saxon poems ascribed to Cædmon—Genesis and Daniel—gild or gyld is used in the sense of "sacrifice," and also of "idol." Among the Teutons of the north its original meaning is said to have been "sacrificial feast."[1] Yet so early as the time of Ina it is used in one of the three allied senses attached to it by Christian civilisation—namely, that of a society of contributing members associated for mutual help and assurance. By the laws of Ina, no were, or compensation for blood, was due to the guildsmen (gegyldan) of a stranger whom some one might have slain in the honest belief that he was a robber.[2] At a later period we meet with these Frith-gilds under the names of Frith-borg and Frank-pledge, when their relation to the existing system of public justice, and responsibility for the good conduct of their members, is the single point in their association considered. The passages in the Laws of Ina which mention gegyldan, if carefully weighed, seem to point to a general system of association, for the exacting and payment of were-gilds due from or in respect of any of the members, which was probably common to all Teutonic communities, and dated back to the times of paganism. The conjuratores of the Salic and Ripuarian laws may be regarded as the Frankish equivalent to the gegyldan of Ina.[1] On this ancient foundation were grafted the religious rites and kindly customs, gradually developed in a hundred beautiful ways, of the mediæval gilds, which in no country of Europe flourished so much as in England.

The geldoniæ or confratriæ of the Carolingian times [CONFRATERNITY] were gilds to all intents and purposes, but the imperial legislation discountenanced them, and their precise rules and constitution are little known. The first extant charter of a gild is that by which, in the reign of Canute, Orcy gives the guild-hall (gegyld-healle) at Abbotsbury in Dorset, "for God's love and St. Peter's," to the gyldscipe of the place.[2] Every guildsman (gegylda) was to pay annually, three days before St. Peter's Mass, one penny, or a pennyworth of wax. On the eve of the feast every two guildsmen were to bring one large loaf, well sifted and raised, for the common almsgiving. Five weeks before the same festival each member had to bring a measure of clean wheat, and within three days afterwards a load of wood. On the death of any member, each of his fellows was to pay "one penny at the corpse for the soul." These were the "Mass-pence," of which we hear so much in later times. Other rules provided for an annual feast, for almsgiving, the nursing of sick members, the decent burial of the dead, &c. The ends of the gild appear here to be purely religious and social; yet in the somewhat later charter of a Cambridge gild, the old principle of mutual assurance against crime and its penalties receives marked illustration. Gradually this feature disappears, and the gild assumes the aspect of "a voluntary association of those living near together, who joined for a common purpose, paying contributions, worshipping together, feasting together periodically, helping one another in sickness and poverty, and frequently united for the pursuit of a special object,"[1] usually a religious one. These objects the gilds continued to promote down to the Reformation, when they were destroyed and plundered.[2]

The Frith Gilds, as we have seen, came first; out of them grew what some have called the Religious, some the Social gilds. In Norfolk alone there were 909 gilds of this class. Out of these proceeded in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the Trade Gilds, divided into Gild-merchants and Craft-gilds.

Every gild had its distinct livery; hence the name of the "Livery Companies" of London. Five of the Canterbury pilgrims, the Haberdasher, Carpenter, Weaver, &c., are described as—> clothed in oo [one] lyveré

> Of a solempne and gret fraternite, or religious gild. The Craft Gilds of a city would often combine together, and each undertake to represent one scene in a great religious drama or miracle-play. Hence came the "Chester Plays," written by Dan Randal of Chester Abbey, and exhibited by twenty-four trades or craft-gilds of the city.[3] (See the interesting volume "English Gilds," containing the original ordinances of more than a hundred of them, and edited by Mr. Toulmin Smith for the Early English Text Society [1870], with a preface by Dr. Luis Brentano.)

GIRDLE (cingulum, balteum, ζώνη). A cord with which the priest or other cleric binds his alb. It is the symbol of continence and self-restraint, as is said by Innocent III., and implied in the prayer which the priest about to celebrate Mass is directed to use while he ties the girdle round his waist. The Congregation of Rites (January 22, 1701) lays it down that the girdle should be of linen rather than of silk, though it may also be (S.R.C., December 23, 1862) of wool. Usually it is white, but the use of coloured girdles, varying with the colour of the vestments, is permitted (S.R.C., January 8, 1709).

As to the origin of the girdle, its use was common among Greeks and Romans in their daily life, and thence took its place, as a matter of course, among the liturgical vestments; but it is not till the beginning of the middle ages that we meet with liturgical girdles richly adorned. Anastasius, in the ninth century, mentions murænulæ—i.e. jewelled girdles in the shape of lampreys or eels. We also read of girdles variegated with gold, and of others (zonæ literatæ) with letters or words woven in. The Greek girdle is shorter and broader than ours, and often richly adorned. (See Benedict XIV. "De Miss.;" Le Brun; Hefele, "Beiträge.")

GLEBE (gleba). Land permanently devoted to the sustentation of the incumbent of a particular parish. The word gleba is used for a farm or estate in the Theodosian code. In the body of the canon law it means the land which, along with a house, constituted the ecclesiastical mansus of right appertaining to a benefice. Mediæval charters present many instances of this use of the word; thus Simon Islip, archbishop of Canterbury, in a charter dated about 1360, says, "Item habebit vicarius duas acras terræ arabilis de dote sibi de gleba ipsius ecclesiæ juxta ipsam ecclesiam jacentes" (The vicar shall have as his endowment two acres of arable land adjoining the church, out of the glebe of the church itself).[1] The fee-simple of a glebe was in abeyance; the freehold was in the incumbent. A glebe could not be alienated without the bishop's permission. The canon law recognises only four justifying causes for such alienation—(1) necessity, as when the church is overburdened with debt; (2) an opening for an advantageous exchange; (3) to redeem captives or feed the poor in time of famine; (4) incommodity—e.g. when the land is so far off that its produce cannot be gathered without great expense. glossema (γλώσσημα). However, as early at least as Quintilian, we find the difficult word called "glossema," and the interpretation of it "gloss," and the latter use continued during the middle ages, and has passed into the languages of modern Europe. A Glossarium was distinguished from an ordinary lexicon by the fact that it contained only the difficult words of the language. Hesychius, an Alexandrian grammarian of the fourth century, published such a Glossarium, though he calls it a lexicon in the preface. The glosses which illustrate the language of Scripture were collected by Ernesti from the works of Hesychius, Suidas (an author otherwise unknown, of the tenth century), Phavorinus (an Italian Benedictine, died 1537, a pupil of the Greek Lascaris), as well as from the "Etymologicum Magnum" (a work compiled by an unknown author of the eleventh century), and published at Leipsic in 1785–6 under the title "Glossæ Sacræ Hesychii," &c.

There are two celebrated Glosses on the Vulgate. The former is the "Glossa Ordinaria," by Walafrid Strabo, a German, born in 807. He had some knowledge of Greek and made use of many patristic authors, especially of Origen, Augustine, Jerome, Ambrose, Gregory the Great, Isidore of Seville, Bede, Alcuin, Rabanus Maurus, &c. His object is to give the literal meaning, though he adds sometimes the mystical, and here and there the moral, sense. This Gloss is quoted as a high authority by St. Thomas and other schoolmen, and it was known as "the Tongue of Holy Scripture." Indeed, from the ninth to the seventeenth century it was the favourite commentary on the Bible. The "Postilla" of Nicolas of Lyra (died 1340) and the "Additiones" of Paulus Burgensis were merely appended to it.

The second Gloss, the "Interlinearis," by Anselm, Scholasticus and dean of Laon (died 1117), derived its name from being written over the words in the Vulgate text. Anselm had some acquaintance with Hebrew, as well as with Greek, and his Gloss also had a great reputation. Very often the "Glossa ordinaria" was inserted in the margin, at the top and at the sides; the Gloss of Anselm was placed between the lines of the Vulgate; while from the fourteenth century onwards the "Postilla" of Nicolas of Lyra and the "Additiones" of Paulus Burgensis were placed at the foot of each page. A fine edition of the Vulgate, "cum glossis, interlineari et ordinaria, Nic. Lyrani postillis et moralitatibus, Burgensis additionibus et Thuringi replicis," was printed at Venice in 1588. The Douay theologians published an improved edition in 1617. The last and best is that edited by the Benedictine Leander a Sto. Martino, Antwerp, 1634. Each of these three editions is in six folio volumes.

GLOSSATOR (a barbarous word formed from the Greek γλῶσσα, tongue). The writer of a "Gloss" or explicative commentary on the text of some authoritative document, legal or theological. The early gloss-writers only pretended to clear up difficulties connected with the words used, not those of the subject-matter.

On the writers of glosses on the Vulgate see Glossa Ordinaria. In the twelfth century a school of interpreters of the Roman or civil law [Civil Law] arose at Bologna. The first of these, Irnerius, was a native of that city; besides lecturing on jurisprudence, about 1120 he enriched the law books which he used with a gloss, or short running interpretation. Many other jurists took up the same business of glossing the Roman law, an occupation thoroughly practical and useful in an age when politics and trade and every sort of civic activity flourished among the free Italian commonwealths. In the next century the celebrated Accursius, or Accorso, who, though a native of Florence, taught in the university of Bologna, selecting from among the glossers those whose works he thought most suitable for his purpose, compiled his great "Corpus Juris Glossatum," in which, with great acuteness and extraordinary acquaintance with the whole body of Justinian law, he labours to solve difficulties and reconcile apparent inconsistencies. Accursius died in 1260. "His great compilation," says Hallam, "made an epoch in the annals of jurisprudence. It put an end in great measure to the oral explanations of lecturers, which had prevailed before. It restrained at the same time the ingenuity of interpretation. The glossers became the sole authorities, so that it grew into a maxim—No one can go wrong who follows a gloss; and some said a gloss was worth a hundred texts." Yet the writings of Accursius and his forerunners are full of ridiculous philological and historical blunders (such as deriving "Tiber" from "Tiberius;" supposing that Justinian lived before Christ,

&c.), which, though they have little to do with their value as jurists, appear to have been the cause why, after the revival of learning, they were so much discredited. In the fourteenth century, Bartolus and Paul of Castro rose to eminence as leaders among the "scholastic jurists;" they were thinkers of great power, who invented innumerable distinctions, and imagined and solved every sort of case which the law-text suggested. After the publication of the "Decretum" of Gratian, gloss-writers began to deal with the canon law as they had with the civil, the great object always being to make it consistent with itself, and workable in the courts. The glosser Paucopaléa gave his name to the well-known gloss or commentary called Palea. The Decretals were glossed, among others, by Sinibaldi Fieschi, afterwards Innocent IV. Andrea did the same service for the Sext, and Zabarella for the Clementines. Of all these early jurists and their writings, a connected account was given by Pancirolo († 1599) in his "De Claris Juris Interpretibus." (Hallam, "Lit. of Europe," Part I., ch. i.; Rosshirt, in Wetzer and Welte.)

GLOVES (CHIROTHECÆ). A bishop's gloves are blessed and put on his hands at his consecration by the consecrator. Episcopal gloves are mentioned by Hugo of St. Victor, Honorius of Autun ("Gemma Animæ," i. 215), and Innocent III., but not by the older writers, Amalarius, Rabanus Maurus, or even Pseudo-Alcuin, so that they must have been introduced about the eleventh century (Hefele, "Beiträge," ii. p. 222). There is, according to Mr. Maskell ("Mon. Rit." ii. p. 286), no allusion to the solemn investing of the bishop with gloves in the most ancient Ordinals, or in the Sarum Pontifical, or in Winchester, Bangor, and Exeter MSS., and he concludes that the rite was of late introduction in the English Church.

GNOSTICISM (γνῶσις) is a name given to the doctrine held by a large number of sects which flourished towards the close of the first and during the whole of the second century after Christ. These bodies differed from each other in many important respects, but the words "Gnostic" and "Gnosticism" indicate the common characteristic which united them in a certain sense to each other, and mark the common principle of their opposition to the Catholic Church. In itself, of course, γνῶσις, or Gnosticism, means no more than "knowledge;" but even in the Epistles of St. Paul (1 Cor. xii. 8, xiv. 6) it begins to acquire a technical significance, and implies a peculiar insight into the depths of Christian doctrine. St. Clement of Rome (1 Ep. 36 and 40), the author of the Epistle ascribed to St. Barnabas (c. 2), and St. Justin Martyr ("Dial. c. Tryph." c. 112), use γνῶσις to describe the gift of understanding the Old Testament typology; and of these the Epistle of Barnabas expressly distinguishes between faith and "knowledge." It is the object of the letter to assist Christians in adding to "faith perfect knowledge (γνῶσιν)." Clement of Alexandria gives the word γνῶσις, or knowledge, and its derivative γνωστικὸς, or Gnostic, a still more special and technical meaning. The greatest of his extant works is meant to show that a Christian may do more than believe and keep the Commandments. Beyond the "ordinary faith," he says, we may reach by instruction and the perfect observance of God's law a knowledge [1] which is "the perfection of man as man." [2] The "Gnostic" is his ideal Christian. He is free from the disturbance of passion,[3] contemplates divine things,[4] knows truth with a peculiar accuracy,[5] and can "demonstrate" the things received by faith.[6] He can penetrate the hidden meanings of Scripture,[7] and use all sciences as a means of raising his mind to God. He uses learning as a means of confuting error, and conveying to others exact notions of the truth.[8] He is the champion of "true and orthodox knowledge," [9] to which faith is as needful as air to natural life,[10] and which is never separate from the practice of Christian virtue.[11]

So far, it is plain, the esteem for superior knowledge is consistent with a loyal adherence to Christianity; it was the fruit of reason exercising itself on the things of faith, and it grew, as a matter of course, with the growth and progress of the Church. But this holds good only of the knowledge which starts with an acceptance of revealed truth. The spirit of speculative inquiry may strike into another path. Reason may set itself above faith; it may criticise and alter the contents of revelation, till it comes to look on faith as a gift for the simple, with which a man of cultivated mind may dispense. This was the line which heathen philosophers had taken with the popular mythology: they were far from denying that it contained some measure of truth; nay, they thought it necessary for the multitude, who were unable to receive truth in its pure and philosophic form. Now, the allegorical method of interpretation which was associated to some extent with this superior knowledge among Christians was very apt to be perverted till it led to a false and heretical assumption of knowledge. It was by this very method that the philosophers had refined the gross notions of popular heathenism. Philo, at the beginning of the Christian era, had chosen the same expedient for adapting Judaism to Greek philosophy. Even in the "Epistle of Barnabas" we may discover the germs of this dangerous tendency, for the author, not content with giving a typical sense to the ceremonial precepts of the old law, denies that they ever bound in their literal meaning at all.[1]

Only one step was wanting to turn this "higher knowledge" into the formal principle of heresy. Let the allegorical interpretation be applied to the New Testament, and let its literal sense be put aside as false or worthless, and then, under the plea of higher knowledge, Christianity might be changed at will. A man had but to suppose himself possessed of this higher gift, and then, on the plea of allegorising, he might explain away every fact and doctrine in the traditional belief. Nor need he even trouble himself about explaining it away. He might, in the confidence of his insight into higher truth, distinguish between elements of truth and falsehood in the received doctrine; he might mutilate the text of the Gospels; he might mix tenets borrowed from the heathen philosophy or religions with Christianity: he might end by treating the moral law as he had treated Christian doctrine, and invent a new code of ethics. All this he might do, and all this the Gnostics actually did. In fact, when the way was once opened, the motives for pressing into it were strong enough. The age of the Gnostics was eager for novelties in religion, and addicted to fantastic superstitions. It was the fashion of the time to mingle philosophy, mythology, and magic. There was the more inducement to amend Christianity by the introduction of foreign elements, because, while it showed a life and power to which neither philosophy nor heathenism could pretend, its teaching on creation out of nothing, on the resurrection of the body, on salvation through the sufferings and death of Christ the Son of God, ran counter to every prejudice of the heathen world. There was not a sect among all the countless sects of Gnosticism which did not deny each one of these doctrines. Above all, the central idea of Gnosticism made it welcome to many who were half-converted from heathenism. It was a knowledge superior to and independent of faith. Faith was for the multitude, knowledge for the few. The aristocratic instinct which was the very soul of Greek and Roman culture revolted at the authority of a Church which imposed the same belief on all, and exacted the same submission from the philosopher and the barbarian slave. In a system of compromise, like Gnosticism, it escaped from this ignominy.

Such, then, was the nature of Gnosticism. It was a false knowledge which threw off the trammels of faith and ecclesiastical authority. It subjected everything, as St. Irenæus[1] declares, to the caprice of the individual, and made any fixed rule of faith impossible. It "abandoned the faith which the Church proclaimed, and cavilled at the simplicity of the holy presbyters."[2] It destroyed, as Clement puts it, the efficacy of baptism[3]—that is, it set at naught faith, the gift conferred in that sacrament. The Gnostic professed to impart a knowledge "greater and deeper"[4] than the ordinary doctrine of Christians, a knowledge which forgot the limits of reason and scorned to believe what it could not understand.[5] This knowledge, to those who were capable of it, was the means of redemption; indeed, in most of the Gnostic systems it was the one and sufficient passport to perfect bliss.[6] It is, however, important to observe that Gnosticism was not a philosophy. True, it was as unfettered and unstable as any philosophy could be, and it addressed itself to the same kind of questions. But it kept the semblance of Christianity, for in nearly all the Gnostic systems Christ occupied a central place, and, as a rule, Gnosticism answered the speculative questions which it raised, not in the abstract language of metaphysics, but by the invention of an elaborate mythology. Without its Christian elements, it could not have entered into such close conflict with the Church; without its mythological garb, it would have missed the popularity which made it dangerous.

It was in the East that Gnosticism began, and in its rudimentary form it appears very early in the history of the Church. The Fathers in the latter half of the second century speak of Simon Magus as the first Gnostic. Both Simon and his successor, Menander, were Samaritans;[1] while Saturninus, the disciple of the latter, taught at Antioch in the time of Hadrian (117–138).[2] All three taught that the world was made by inferior powers more or less in antagonism with the supreme God. Either the highest God, or else some æon (a name the Gnostics gave the spiritual beings who play so large a part in their systems), appeared on the earth in the person of Christ and redeemed man by the "knowledge" He gave from the dominion of matter and of the angels who ruled the world. Menander, however, made important contributions to the development of Gnosticism. He was at least more emphatic than his predecessors in denying that Christ took a real body or degraded Himself by contact with the impurity of matter. Further, he maintained that the angels had made two kinds of men, our Saviour having come that He might overcome the evil men and the demons who helped them, and might save the good.[3]

There were two other forms which Gnosticism assumed while still on Asiatic soil. Whereas Simon Magus attributed the Hebrew prophecies to the inspiration of the same lower powers which had made the world, and Saturninus held that the Saviour descended to destroy the god of the Jews; yet Cerinthus, a contemporary of St. John the Evangelist, and the Gnostics who are denounced in the Ignatian Epistles, united a leaning to Judaism with their Gnostic speculations. With strange inconsistency they advocated Jewish rites and denied the fundamental doctrine of Judaism—viz. the unity of God.[1] Besides those Judaising Gnostics, we find a cluster of Oriental sects, known as Ophites, or worshippers of the serpent. They betray their Eastern origin by the use they make of Chaldee names, and it is generally supposed that they represent one of the oldest varieties of Gnosticism. To them belonged the Naasseni (from the Hebrew word for serpent), the first of those "who dared to celebrate with hymns the serpent which was the cause of transgression," and boasted that they "knew the depth" of truth;[2] the Peratæ, who professed to impart the secret by which the initiated could "pass through the corruption" of matter.[3] If we inquire what was meant by this mysterious knowledge, we find Judaism, Christianity, and heathenism mixed together in the wildest confusion. They held that an æon descended on Jesus and made Him the prophet of the truth. But they also appealed to Moses, Hercules, Homer, Orpheus, Linus, to astrology, and to heathen mysteries.[4] Probably Baur is right in regarding the Ophitic doctrine as a mere phase of Oriental heathenism, which ranks as a heresy only because it adopted some Christian terms.[5]

In Origen's time scarcely thirty of Simon's sect were left,[6] and we hear little from early writers about Menander, Cerinthus, or Saturninus. But in Alexandria, the Gnostic tendencies gathered life and strength. Their Gnosticism learned to clothe the ideas of Greek philosophy in a religious garb; there it formed its elaborate æon systems—partly Christian, partly Platonic, partly mythological. Basilides was the first of the great Alexandrian Gnostics. He had been a companion of Saturninus in Syria,[1] but it was in Alexandria that he began his public life, and the Basilidians were largely indebted to the schools of Greek philosophy in that city. By comparing the original teaching of Basilides, as given by Irenæus, with the later development of his doctrine as reported in the "Philosophumena," we can note the increasing influence which the physical theories of the Stoics exercised on the Basilidians.[2] The Alexandrian Valentinus made a fusion of Christianity with Platonism, much as the Neo-Platonists united the latter with heathenism. Valentinus went to Rome about 141 and stayed there till 157. He had numerous disciples, who formed two great divisions of Valentinianism, known as the Eastern and Western. Many of his followers could boast of fame and influence: one of them, indeed, Heracleon, will be remembered while history lasts, for he wrote the first commentary on St. John's Gospel. Evidently St. Irenæus considered Valentinianism the most formidable heresy of the day.

The Valentinians set out from the Platonic principle that the ideal or heavenly world—the 'Pleroma,' as they called it—alone possesses reality. God dwelt for countless ages alone with His thought (Ennœa), then after long silence produced two æons, who became the parents of others. Just as Plato pictures the supreme God as dwelling in eternity with the ideas or archetypes of things ever present to Him, so the Valentinians peopled their celestial world with a long series of æons, which are the Platonic "ideas" translated into the language of mythology. The æons are arranged on the Pythagorean and Platonic principles that certain numbers have a mystic efficacy. Some of the names given to them were suggested by the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity or by the divine attributes; others, such as "man," "the church," &c., point to the theory, also Platonic, that things below are shadows cast from a higher world.

So much for the nature of God and the æon world. But how did the material world with its attendant evils come to be? It could not, of course, on Valentinian principles, be attributed to the supreme God. They supposed that the æons were less perfect the further they were removed in the long line of generation from the Father of all. The lowest of them was overcome by desire to comprehend God, and by this fruitless desire gave birth to another æon, Achamoth (חָכְמוֹת—i.e. wisdom), who wandered outside the æon world in helpless misery. Higher æons freed her from her sufferings, and these sufferings thickened into matter, and out of this pre-existent matter men and things were moulded by the demiurge, the "God of this world." This demiurge (here, again, we have both a notion and a name borrowed from Plato) was the God of the Jewish religion, a being imperfect, ignorant, and, indeed, incapable of spiritual ideas. Of men some were earthly (χοικοὶ), made from the worse kind of matter, and necessitated to evil. Others were "animal" (ψυχικοὶ), capable of receiving the ordinary Jewish or Christian religion. They were endowed with free will, and would obtain a partial happiness hereafter if they led virtuous lives. But there was a third class, of "spiritual" men, in whom there were certain germs which had fallen from the æon world. They were destined, whatever their actions might be, to enter the higher world, but meantime they were enslaved by the demiurge and by matter. An æon, called Christ, clothed Himself in a body which looked like ours, and communicated to these æons the "knowledge" of their higher destiny, teaching them to slight the god of this world and his law. The Valentinians held that it was not deeds, but the possession of a spiritual nature, which led to the higher world, and they made little account of Christ's death. Some of them held that only the body which He had formed for Himself could suffer; others, that Christ had descended on a man, Jesus, and abandoned Him at the crucifixion.[1]

Another Gnostic, as great as Valentinus, came to Rome a little later and made great changes in Gnosticism. He surrendered the fantastic æon-systems,[1] but, on the other hand, he represented the demiurge god of this world as actually cruel and wicked.[2] He showed the bitterest hostility to the Old Testament, and in the New admitted only ten Epistles of Paul and the single Gospel of Luke, mutilating even these books and interpolating passages according to the requirements of his theory.[3] Marcion gave greater prominence than the Valentinians to moral ideas and to the death of Christ,[4] and apparently did not make salvation depend on an original difference in the natures of men.

In the preceding sketch an attempt has been made to note the principal features of Gnosticism; and though the division adopted—viz. into the Oriental Gnostics, the philosophical Gnostics of Alexandria and the Marcionite Gnostics with their more practical and Christian religion, which presents many points of contact with modern Protestantism[5]—is not altogether satisfactory, it is perhaps as simple as any other which has been proposed. Some of the Gnostics were led by their belief in the impurity of matter to asceticism, others to unbridled licence; but we cannot classify the Gnostics on this principle, for we find the two opposite tendencies appearing in the same sect. At least we know that while Basilides respected the moral law, the Basilidians set it at nought.[6]

After Marcion the development of Gnosticism came to an end, though the heresy held its ground more or less for centuries, and like tendencies reappear in the Manichees and in the Manichean heretics of the middle ages. But Gnosticism has left an enduring mark on the history of the Church. It was in opposition to this heresy that Irenæus wrote the earliest treatise which we possess on Catholic dogma. It was the conflict with this heresy from which the need arose of formulating with greater precision and stating with greater fulness the Catholic doctrines on the Incarnation, on the sacraments, and above all on the authority of the teaching Church. The Arian heresy itself did not produce a greater crisis in the Church's history, or contribute more to the development of Catholic doctrine.

This account of Gnosticism has been made with some care from the sources, of which Irenæus and the "Philosophumena" are the chief. But great use has also been made of Massuet's dissertations "De Gnosticorum Rebus;" Neander in the last edition of his "Church History;" Möhler's essays collected by Döllinger, 1839; Baur, "Christliche Gnosis," 1835, and "Kirchengeschichte der drei ersten Jahrhunderte," 3rd ed., 1863; Lipsius, "Gnosticismus," 1860.

GOANESE SCHISM. [See Missions to the Heathen.]

GOD. In the Apostles' and in the Nicene Creed we begin by professing our belief in one God, creator of heaven and earth, and the Fourth Lateran Council explains more fully what we know by reason and revelation of His nature and attributes. The Vatican Council, although to a great extent it merely reiterates the Lateran definition, adds at least two important truths concerning God's relation to us and ours to Him. For, after stating that there is one true and living God, creator and Lord of heaven and earth, almighty, eternal, immense, incomprehensible, infinite in intellect and will and in every perfection; concerning whom, seeing that He is one, singular, altogether simple and unchangeable spiritual substance, we must assert that He is in reality and essence distinct from the world, most blessed in Himself and from Himself, and infinitely exalted above all that is or can be thought of besides Himself, the council adds that God "by His most free counsel," constrained by no necessity of any kind, created the world, and then, in the next chapter, that we can, by the natural light of reason, and from the consideration of created things, attain a "sure" knowledge of God, who is the beginning and end of all. It is the object of this article to explain the Vatican definition, and to show its perfect consistency with reason and with the previous teaching of theologians. It is obvious that we cannot attempt, in the space at our command, anything like a full and philosophical treatment of the subject, or even try to explain many of the difficulties which are often urged. The utmost which we hope to do consists in indicating the general line which Catholic philosophers and theologians have taken in proving the existence of God, and treating of His attributes.

We begin with a definition sufficient to explain the sense we give to the word "God," and which would be accepted probably both by theists and atheists, at least in civilised countries. By "God" we understand the one absolutely and infinitely perfect spirit who is the creator of all; and, taking this definition for granted, we proceed to state the following propositions.

I. It is certain from mere reason, apart from revelation, that God exists; and this may be proved, according to the council, from a consideration of created things. "His invisible things," St. Paul says (Rom. i. 20), "from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made. His eternal power also and divinity: so that they" (i.e. the heathen, who did not believe in the true God) "are inexcusable." Everyone knows the popular form in which the argument is put, and has been put from the time of the Fathers of the Church. There are, it is said, plain marks in the mechanism of created things which show that they are the work of an intelligent being. The laws, for example, which govern the physical world must come from an intelligence of some kind, for they display a high degree of wisdom united to immense power. Plainly this intelligence does not reside in the things themselves. The world, therefore, was created and is supported and governed by an intelligent being whom we call God. Nor does there seem to be any valid answer to this argument. True, there are many things in the world which are not, so far as we can see, arranged to wise ends, and others which even seem to contradict the supposition that they come from a wise and benevolent Creator. All this may be admitted, but it cannot do away with the fact that we do on every side discern unmistakable traces of intelligent design. When these traces abound, it is not only humility but common sense which prompts us to acknowledge a wise Creator, and to believe that all is created for a good end, though in many cases our ignorance prevents us from discerning it. A man who does not understand the mechanism of an engine is still within his rights when he concludes that it is due to an intelligence possessed of understanding which he himself lacks, and would most certainly transgress the plainest rules of common sense if he attributed all the parts of the machinery which he could not understand to mere chance, or, again, to a want of knowledge or power on the part of the constructor. Accordingly, we may fairly conclude that the argument from design will always keep its place among the proofs of God's existence. It has the great advantage of being easily grasped, and no valid objection can be urged against it.

While, however, St. Thomas gives this argument, he places it last among the five which he adduces at the beginning of the "Summa," and though it is the most popular it does not seem the most cogent. His other arguments are more metaphysical and subtle, but they have the advantage of leading the mind more directly and more conclusively to the belief in an absolutely perfect Being. His first argument is from motion, and it assumes no more than the patent fact that movement exists. Whence does it come? Not simply from the things themselves, for nothing can in the same respect be at once the cause and the subject of motion. Motion implies passivity: in other words, the thing moved must be under the influence of something distinct from itself which causes the movement or change. Life offers no instance to the contrary, for though, no doubt, we say, and rightly, that living things have the cause of motion in themselves, this only means that one part in living organisms communicates movements to other parts. The heart sends the blood through the frame, but the heart itself receives the first impulse from the parent to whom life is due. Nor are even intellectual beings the independent cause of their own movements. The will is influenced by the thoughts, the mind cannot think unless objects are proposed or have been originally proposed to it from without. Hence, even if we assume an infinite series of created things, still, so long as they all are subject to motion and change, this motion and change calls for explanation, and we are forced to the belief (a sublime one, truly) of a first mover, Himself immovable, of a Being who is at once the perfection of activity and life and the perfection of rest, the cause of movement and change, while He Himself changes not.

The second proof is taken from the activity, as the former from the passivity, of things. Certain causes in the world produce certain effects, and we find these causes existing in a regular series or order. Causes are themselves the effects of other causes; the parent is the cause of his child's being, and he himself owes his being to his own parents. Here again, if we prolong the series to infinity, we cannot escape from the conclusion that there is a God. Even in such a series, there is no cause which is not itself the effect of another cause—which does not require a cause outside of itself as the origin of its being. No explanation can be devised except that of a first cause, who is Himself uncaused.

The third argument is drawn from the contingency of things. Existence does not belong to the essence of things; they are not in their own nature determined to be, for most of them fade and die: of all of them it may be said, once they did not exist. Besides, then, the series of contingent entities (and here again we may, without prejudice to the argument, multiply the series to infinity) there is a necessary and absolute being.

We cannot do justice in the space at our command to the fourth argument of St. Thomas, taken "ex gradibus bonitatis"—i.e. from the degrees of perfection in things. It is perhaps the most subtle and difficult of all, and the commentators are not agreed about its meaning. The following account, however, may be given as the substance of the reasoning. We find by observation that creatures are more or less wise, noble, good, and the like. These qualities do not belong to their essence, for if so, there could be no question of more or less. Socrates and Plato were both men: humanity constituted their nature, and in the strict sense neither could be more truly and perfectly a man than the other, since the definition of man may be predicated of each. The very fact, then, that one man or angel is more wise, noble, powerful than another proves that wisdom, nobility, power, do not belong to the human or angelic natures as such or in themselves. As they are not wise, &c., in themselves, or in virtue of their mere existence, their perfection must come to them from without, and we end with the idea of a Being absolutely and perfectly wise, holy, strong, &c., because wisdom, holiness and strength are in Him more than mere attributes—are, in short, identical with His nature. Thus St. John says, not merely that God is charitable or loving, but that He is charity. Such a statement is untrue of any being except God.

St. Thomas's fifth argument, viz. from design, has been already stated.

The reader will find another from conscience—i.e. from the fact attested by experience, that man has by nature a sense of right and wrong altogether distinct from the knowledge that certain actions are hurtful to others, hurtful to or unworthy of himself, drawn out with surpassing genius by Cardinal Newman, in his "Grammar of Assent." This argument has the advantage of leading us more directly than any of those given from St. Thomas to a true conception of God's character as a just, holy, and merciful God.

Such are the chief arguments by which Catholic theologians prove God's existence. But are any arguments necessary? Have we not an intuitive perception of God's existence? Or again, can we not be sure of His existence the moment we understand the meaning which the word "God" is intended to convey? The great majority of theologians answer this question in the negative. St. Thomas holds that the mode of cognition corresponds to the nature of him who knows. Our soul, he says, informs a material body. By nature, therefore, it can only know directly things which are themselves, partly at least, material. It recognises the existence of purely spiritual beings only by a process of inference. But instead of explaining and developing this Thomist (or rather Aristotelian principle), we will take the simpler course of pointing out the flaw in the reasoning of those who have advocated the theory that the knowledge of God's existence is self-evident. St. Anselm, who has been followed in modern times by Descartes, began with the assumption that all men, theists and atheists alike, understand the name of God to denote the most perfect being that can be conceived, and so far we may allow that he was right. When, however, he goes on to argue that the idea of the utmost perfection implies existence, he confuses, as St. Thomas justly objects, between the real and the imaginary. The mere fact that we can form a notion of a being the most perfect that can be conceived cannot prove that such a being has existence except in our imagination. Nor have the attempts of ontologists in our own day to show that the belief in God is intuitive been more successful. We begin, they say, with the notion of being, and this notion of existence, without which we can understand nothing, is nothing else than the divinity. The obvious answer is, that although we do begin with the vague and abstract notion of existence, the existence which we predicate of the things around is wholly distinct from the self-existent and all-perfect spirit whom we call God. In 1861 the Roman Inquisition decided that ontologism as it has just been expounded could not be "safely taught" ("tuto tradi").

II. The Nature of God.—All human conceptions of God's nature are of course imperfect; still, since reason enables us to ascertain God's existence, it also enables us to know something of His nature.[1] We learn what God is partly by removing from the idea we form of Him all imperfections which belong to creatures, partly by attributing to Him, in a more excellent form, all the perfection we find in them. The schoolmen set out with the notion of God as "pure actuality," which notion is immediately derived from the proof given for the divine existence. Creatures have potentiality, or the power of becoming what they are not, in different modes and degrees. There was a time when they were not, and merely had the capacity of existence: once existing, they are capable of further perfections, which determine their nature; and again, they are subject to the possibility of falling away from the perfection of their nature, or of ceasing to exist altogether. All these capacities are expressed by the Aristotelian word "potentia," which is opposed to "actus," or actuality. Now, because capacity can be reduced to act only by something which is already in act, God as the first cause, as the mover of all, Himself immovable and changeless, as the necessary and self-existent being, must be pure actuality. He is infinite in all perfection, for otherwise He would be subject to the capacity of change and improvement. His essence, as we have already seen, is one with His existence. His attributes also, such as goodness, justice, and the like, are identical with His nature. Goodness, justice, &c., perfect an intellectual or rational creature, but nothing can perfect the infinite and perfect nature of God. His justice is really one with His mercy and love; and although we rightly distinguish the one from the other, this is only because He, notwithstanding the absolute simplicity of His nature, produces in His government of the world a variety of effects equivalent to those which would be produced by distinct attributes in creatures. All the pure perfections of creatures are found in Him, and though certain qualities of creatures, such as bodily form, are wanting in God, who is a pure spirit, this is because these qualities involve imperfection, because, e.g., a corporeal being cannot, from the nature of the case, be infinite or perfectly simple. Lastly, all these perfections belong to the one true God. If there were more gods than one, there must be something to constitute the individuality, to distinguish the one deity from the other. Either, then, the distinguishing attribute must be a defect, or else a perfection proper to the one deity and absent in the other. Each alternative is inconsistent with infinite perfection.

III. An important conclusion results from the principle that God by natural reason can be known as the author of the world. Men may be excused on the plea of invincible ignorance, if they in good faith reject certain truths of faith. But all men who have come to the use of reason are bound to know, love, and obey God.

(An admirable exposition of St. Thomas's arguments for the existence of God will be found in the last part of Kleutgen's "Theologie der Vorzeit.")

GOLDEN ROSE. An ornament blessed by the Pope every year on Lætare Sunday (fourth Sunday in Lent), and sent occasionally to Catholic sovereigns, male or female, to noted churches and sanctuaries, to great generals, and to illustrious Catholic cities or republics. Originally, it was a single flower of wrought gold, coloured red; afterwards the golden petals were decked with rubies and other gems; finally, the form adopted was that of a thorny branch, with several flowers and leaves, and one principal flower at the top, all of pure gold. The practice appears to have arisen in the thirteenth century, but by what Pope it was instituted in its present form is uncertain. That Popes used to send presents in very early times to princes who had deserved well of the Church, is well known: Gregory the Great was accustomed to send with this intention golden keys containing filings of St. Peter's chains, and Boniface V. sent to Edwin, king of Northumbria, in 626, a camisia, or shirt with a gold ornament, and to Ethelberga his queen, a gilded ivory comb and a silver mirror.[1] Urban V. sent a golden rose in 1366 to Joanna of Naples. Among the recipients of the rose have been Gonsalvo di Cordova, Napoleon III., and Isabella II. of Spain. Morone records a large number of instances in which this favour has been conferred: a few of the most noteworthy are the following. Henry VIII. received the rose from three Popes, the last time from Clement VII. in 1524. It was sent to his daughter, Queen Mary, by Julius III., in 1555. The republic of Lucca was thus honoured by Pius IV., in 1564; the Lateran Basilica by Pius V. three years later; and the sanctuary of Loretto, by Gregory XIII., in 1584. The Queen of France, Maria Theresa, received it from Clement IX., in 1668; and the Queen of Poland, Mary Casimir, from Innocent XI., in 1684, in recognition of the recent deliverance of Vienna by her valiant husband, John Sobieski. Benedict XIII. (1726) granted the Golden Rose to the cathedral of Capua; and in 1833, it was sent by Gregory XVI. to the Basilica of St. Mark's, Venice. (Morone, "Dizionario Ecclesiastico.")

GOSPEL (LITURGICAL USE OF). The practice of reading the gospels in the Christian assemblies is mentioned by Justin Martyr, and prescribed in all the liturgies. The First Council of Orange, in 441, and that of Valentia in Spain, order the Gospel to be read after the Epistle and before the offertory, in order that the catechumens might listen to the words of Christ and hear them explained by the bishop. We give here, first of all, the ceremonies with which the Gospel is sung at High Mass according to the Latin rite, adding illustrations from history and the other liturgies.

[1] Bed. Hist. Eccl. ii. 10, 11.

We conclude with an account of the way the Gospel is read at Low Mass.

I. The Gospel at High Mass.—The deacon places the book of the Gospels on the altar, kneels and prays that God may purify his lips, as He purified those of Isaias, takes the book of the Gospels, asks the priest's blessing, and then goes to a place in the sanctuary on the right hand[1] of the altar, where the Gospel is to be sung. The deacon is accompanied by acolytes bearing lights; he announces the title of the Gospel, the choir singing "Glory to Thee, O Lord;" he makes the sign of the cross on the book, then on his forehead, lips, and breast; he incenses the book, the incense having been previously blessed, and sings the Gospel, which the priest has previously read in a low voice on the right side of the altar. Finally, he incenses the priest, to whom the book is presented open, and who kisses it saying, "By the words of the Gospel may our sins be blotted out."

The singing of the Gospel was not always reserved to the deacon, as has been shown in the article under that word, and, according to Benedict XIV., the lector still recites the Gospel in the Greek Mass. In ancient times the book of the Gospels was carried in procession to the altar at the beginning of Mass, a custom noted in the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom, and observed for a long time in the West. This procession fell into disuse when Missals containing all that is said or sung at Mass replaced the old Gospel-book, sacramentaries, lectionaries, and antiphonaries, which contained different parts of the Mass, each in a separate form. All the ancient liturgies recognise the use of incense at the Gospel. It signifies the "good odour of Christ." The lights at the Gospel were familiar to St. Jerome, and St. Isidore, who says they were carried in sign of joy, and to signify that Christ is the light of souls. In the old churches, which were usually turned to the east, the south side was occupied by the men, and down to the middle of the ninth century the deacon turned towards them when he reached the "ambo" or place where the Gospel was sung. On the other hand, Remi of Auxerre, who wrote about 882, assumes that the Gospel is read towards the north, the region of darkness, in order to signify the power Christ's words have to annul evil influences. Le Brun thinks that this mystical reason was commonly adopted: that then a similar evil signification was attributed to the left side of the priest (i.e. his left when he faces the altar), and that hence it became usual to move the Missal which the priest uses to his left, before he reads the Gospel. In the older Ordines, the Missal is not changed to the left till the offertory,[1] when convenience obviously requires the moving of the book. The people stand at the singing or reading of the Gospel, to indicate their alacrity in obeying Christ's words; and for a like reason members of military orders stand with drawn swords. In the earliest of the Roman Ordines, all the clergy kiss the book of the Gospels, and Jonas, bishop of Orleans in the ninth century, speaks of this rite as an ancient one even in his day. It appears from Remi of Auxerre that the people made the sign of the cross at the end as well as at the beginning of the Gospel.

II. At Low Masses the book is moved to the Gospel side at the end of the Gradual, the priest says the prayer "Munda," &c. in the middle of the altar, and begs a blessing from God, saying "Jube, Domine, benedicere," "Pray, Lord, a blessing," whereas the deacon uses the form, "Jube, domne," &c., "Pray, Sir, a blessing." He then signs the book, &c., as has been described above, the server saying, "Gloria tibi, Domine." At the end the server says, "Praise be to thee, O Christ," and the priest kisses the book, with the prayer "By the words of the Gospel," &c. The old custom was to say "Amen" at the end of the Gospel, as is still done in the Mozarabic Mass. Alexander of Hales tells us that some in his time said "Amen," others "Deo gratias," but his words imply that "Laus tibi, Christe" had already become the prevalent form. GRACE. I. Definition and Divisions of Grace.—All that we receive from God—our existence, our natural powers, the good things of this life—are God's free gift and may therefore be rightly called graces or favours received from Him. But God has been pleased to call man to a supernatural end—i.e. to a destiny out of all proportion to the exigencies of his nature, and which cannot be attained by the use of his natural powers. Man has been created that he may see God face to face in His glory, and God, who calls him to eternal life, also furnishes the means by which it may be secured. Hence the Scriptural writers and the theologians of the Church distinguish grace from nature; and grace in this stricter and narrower sense may be defined as a supernatural gift freely bestowed by God on rational or intellectual creatures in order that they may attain eternal life. We say that it is freely given, apart, at least in the first instance, from all merit or claim of ours; otherwise, as the Apostle argues, it would not deserve the name of grace. We call it supernatural in order to distinguish it from gifts which come to us in the natural order, although the definition is not meant to exclude those special providences which dispose even natural events for the furtherance of our salvation. We speak of it as bestowed on intellectual and rational creatures, for angels and men are the only creatures capable of knowing and loving God, and consequently the only recipients of grace. All grace since the Fall has been given to man on account of Christ's merits. Whether the grace of the angels or of Adam in his innocence was due to the same cause, is a question freely discussed in the theological schools.

Grace thus understood is divided into external and internal grace. The former term includes such external gifts as the preaching of the Gospel, the examples of Christ and the Saints, occasions of good actions, the removal of exterior temptations—in a word, all the effects of supernatural providence by which the cause of our salvation is promoted. Internal grace directly affects the understanding and the will, either inhering in the soul as a permanent quality, or merely moving and aiding the soul at the time to acts of supernatural virtue. Internal graces may be conferred for two great ends. They may be given in order that the recipient may promote the spiritual good of others among whom he labours, and in this case the schoolmen speak of graces as "gratis datæ," and infer from 1 Cor. xii. 8 that they are nine in number—viz. the word of wisdom, the grace of healing, &c. Or, on the other hand, graces may be given with the direct object of bringing the subject of the grace nearer to God, and such graces are called "gratum facientes"—graces, which make man pleasing to his Creator. We have already explained that internal graces may be actual (i.e. passing movements of the soul by God), or habitual (i.e. permanent qualities residing in the soul or its faculties). Habitual grace may inhere in the substance of the soul, which it sanctifies and renews by the very fact of its presence there. It is then called sanctifying grace, and is, says the Council of Trent (Sess. vi. can. 11), shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, who is given to us. This sanctifying grace makes us the friends of God and partakers of the divine nature (2 Pet. i. 4), it creates within us new hearts and spirits (Ezech. xxxvi. 26), and its existence in the soul is incompatible with mortal sin (1 John iii. 9). The infused virtues are another form of habitual grace. They inhere in the faculties of the soul; they do not directly sanctify, but they complete and perfect sanctification and make the soul capable of supernatural acts. Actual grace also is subdivided into grace of operation (gratia operans), and of co-operation—the former exciting the mind to action, the latter working with it and assisting it in operation already begun—into prevenient and subsequent, into sufficient and efficacious grace, &c. This last subdivision will be explained in the account which we have to give of the doctrinal systems of grace maintained in the Church.

II. Catholic Doctrine on Grace.—The Church teaches, in opposition to the Pelagians, not only that the grace of Christ is absolutely necessary for justification before God, but also that without the prevenient inspiration of the Holy Ghost and His assistance a man "can neither believe, hope, love, or repent, as it is necessary he should do, in order that the grace of justification may be conferred upon him" (Concil. Trid. Sess. vi. De Justif. can. 3). In no case can a man merit the first grace by natural good works. "No man," says our Blessed Saviour, "can come to Me except the Father who hath sent Me draw him" (John vi. 44); and the Apostle, "It is God who worketh in us to will and to do" (Philipp. ii. 13). The very wish to believe or to rise from sin comes, according to the definition of the Council of Orange (can. 3, 4, 5), from the grace of God. Moreover, although we can by our own strength do good actions in the natural order, and although our nature is not wholly depraved and corrupt, even after the Fall and before it is healed by the grace of Christ, still so great is the weakness left by original sin, and by the disorder consequent on the very fact that a man destitute of grace is necessarily turned away from his last end—viz. God apprehended by supernatural means—that we need grace in order to resist grievous temptations against natural virtue, nor can we fulfil the whole natural law of God without its help. Hence Scripture constantly attributes triumph over temptation to the grace of God, who with temptation makes a way of escape that we may be able to bear it (1 Cor. x. 13).[1] Finally, even a person who is in a state of grace and friendship with God needs a new impulse of actual grace before he can think a good thought or perform a good deed;[2] while a special grace, which cannot be merited, is required in order that he may persevere to the end. "In the case of those who are regenerate and holy there is always need to implore God's help that they may come to a good end or persist in a good work" (Concil. Araus. ii. can. 10). In short, the world of grace is like the world of nature, which is not only created but also sustained at each instant by the hand of God.

As the Pelagians and Semipelagians erred in the estimate they formed of man's natural powers, so the Calvinists fell into another and much more pernicious error by denying the freedom of the will altogether and making grace irresistible; and the Jansenist doctrine on these points is substantially identical with that of the Calvinists. The Council of Trent (Sess. vi. De Justif.) condemns under anathema those who maintain that the will of man is merely passive under the action of grace, and has not the power of resisting it. It also defines that a state of grace is not, as the Calvinists supposed, the mere external favour of God, but that it is a gift inherent in the soul, in virtue of which the sinner is not only accounted just, but really becomes so, and that the gift of sanctifying grace is forfeited by any single mortal sin. We discuss these points more fully under the articles Calvinism, Final Perseverance, Jus-

[1] On this part of the subject, see the Second Council of Orange, anno 529, confirmed by Pope Boniface II.

[2] I.e., of course, a thought or deed profitable to eternal salvation.

TIFICATION, MERIT, only remarking here that the very essence, not only of Christianity, but of natural religion, is at issue in the dispute between Catholics and Calvinists. That God will accept no man as just except he really be so; that nothing else, neither ritual nor sacrifice, nor imputed merit can be taken as a substitute for personal holiness—that is the central truth of all religion; it is the very truth which the prophets of God maintained against the priests of Baal or Moloch. We are of course well aware that there are many excellent Christians who profess Calvinism, and do not dream of holding the consequences which may fairly be deduced from their tenets. But this should not blind us to the fact that the Calvinistic theories on imputation, irresistible grace, the impossibility of falling from a state of grace, &c. are in themselves not only irreligious but immoral.

III. Theological Systems on Grace.—All Catholics, as we have seen, believe in the necessity of grace for all supernatural acts, and therefore also, since God desires the salvation of all, they hold that He offers to all grace, really and abundantly sufficient for their salvation. They further maintain that the will always remains free to reject grace or to correspond with it. But when we inquire into the nature of the distinction between efficacious and sufficient grace, Catholic theologians give different answers. We begin with a general definition which may suffice for the understanding of the question in dispute. A sufficient grace is one which merely enables the soul to perform a supernatural act; an efficacious grace is one which does really effect the purposes for which it is given. Thus Judas received sufficient, Peter efficacious, grace for conversion: in other words, grace was given capable of converting Judas, but to Peter grace which actually did convert him. The question is, whence does the efficacity of grace proceed?

The Dominican theologians defend what is usually called the Thomist system of grace, because those who hold it allege that it is in substance to be found in the writings of St. Thomas Aquinas.[1] This theory may be stated in the following propositions:—

(1) Second causes act only so far as they are determined to act by the first cause—i.e. God. Hence it is not enough to say that the power to work out our salvation comes from God. He also moves to the good action itself, and the existence of two kinds of grace must be admitted—viz. sufficient, which merely enables the recipient to act; and efficient, which is always followed by, and, indeed, produces the action ("dat non solum posse sed agere").

(2) God sincerely wishes all men to be saved, and offers to all the means of salvation. But He wishes some to be saved absolutely, and considering all the circumstances; others, only on certain conditions which are not realised. To the latter He gives sufficient, to the former efficacious, grace.

(3) In either case grace is given without any claim or merit on man's part.

(4) There is an intrinsic difference between sufficient and efficacious grace—i.e. between the graces in themselves—so that it is always true to say that a man consented to grace given because it was efficacious: never true that the grace was efficacious because the man consented.

(5) Man always remains free and capable of merit under efficacious grace: free and responsible for his demerit with merely sufficient grace. For God as the first cause in no way interferes with the agency of second causes, but, on the contrary, moves each second cause according to its nature, so that beings with free will do not cease to be free because efficaciously moved by God. Sufficient grace gives full power to act, so that a man is perfectly responsible if he does not exert the power; while efficacious grace leaves perfect power of resistance. The reader will perceive the extreme difficulty, or, as the adversaries of Thomism would say, the impossibility of reconciling this last with the foregoing propositions; but the fact that the Thomists do honestly hold this last proposition places a wide gulf between Thomism on the one hand, and Calvinism and Jansenism on the other.

The first three of the Thomist propositions are admitted[1] by that large number of Jesuit theologians known as Congruists, but they make the efficacity of grace depend, not on anything in the grace itself, but on the fact that it is given under circumstances which, as God foresees, are suitable to the dispositions of the recipient. He foreknows what all creatures would do in all possible circumstances—in what combination of circumstances they would accept or reject grace. If He decrees their predestination absolutely He gives them grace in circumstances under which they will certainly correspond to it; otherwise He confers grace which is in itself perfectly sufficient, but which they will certainly reject. Congruism has the advantage of admitting the full force of scriptural texts which attribute the whole difference between sinner and saint to the grace of God, while at the same time there is no difficulty in reconciling it with belief in the freedom of the will.

[1] An allegation, however, by no means admitted by their antagonists.

[1] So at least Billuart puts the case in his treatise De Gratia, but probably the Jesuit theologians would demur to the form at least of the first proposition.

The Molinists (so called from Louis Molina, a celebrated Jesuit) hold that the efficacy of grace depends simply on the will which freely accepts it. The difference is not in the graces in themselves, nor even in the circumstances under which they are given. A powerful grace given at the most favourable juncture may be rejected, and so remain merely sufficient; a much less powerful grace may be given with much less favourable circumstances, and the consent of the will may make it efficacious. God predestines those who, as He foresees, will correspond to that grace which He offers to all.

The Augustinians advocate a third system. Like the Thomists, they admit an intrinsic difference between efficacious and sufficient grace, but they maintain this position on purely theological, not on philosophical grounds: on the weakness of man's will since the Fall, not on the general principle that all second causes must be moved to action by the first cause. Hence they propound a Molinist theory for the period before, a Thomist theory for that after, the Fall.

A singular theory, adopted, however, by St. Liguori in his treatise on prayer, was devised by Tournely, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and author of a "Dogmatic Theology" justly held in high esteem. Tournely supposed that God gave men first of all sufficient grace, in the Molinist sense, for certain initial works, especially prayer, which grace, if rightly used, was followed by grace efficacious in the Thomist sense. The obvious objection is that prayer, if it fulfils the conditions necessary for obtaining the requests made, is one of the most excellent and difficult of all good works, so that either there is no need at all of grace efficacious in its own nature, or else such grace would be imperatively demanded for prayer.

The controversy on grace and predestination between the Dominicans and Jesuits began in Spain about the year 1580. Bannez, a Dominican professor at Salamanca, maintained the intrinsic efficacity of grace as explained above. Setting out from the notion of God as the first cause and the first mover, he represented efficacious grace as determining the free consent of the will by "physical premotion," and this premotion which was infallibly followed by the consent of the will came, as he alleged, from God's absolute decree that the person so moved by grace should correspond to it. The Jesuit college at the same university met this doctrine of intrinsic efficacity of grace and physical premotion on the part of God with vigorous opposition. As early as 1581, a Jesuit, Prudentius de Monte-Mayor, defended in public disputation a doctrine which had already been propounded by another member of his order, Fonseca, in 1566—viz. that God knew, apart from any decree except the general one of concurring with free agents in this determination, where and when the will would correspond to or reject grace, and that efficacious grace was simply that which, as God foresaw, would be accepted. This doctrine was eagerly defended in the Society of Jesus. Suarez maintained it at Coimbra, Vasquez at Alcalà, Gregory of Valentia at Ingolstadt, Lessius in the Netherlands, Toletus at Rome. But it was Molina, professor at Evora, in Portugal, and a disciple of Fonseca, who carried out the principles of his master to their utmost consequences. His famous book, "Liberi Arbitrii cum gratiæ donis, divina præscientia, providentia, prædestinatione et reprobatione concordia," was published at Lisbon in 1588. It made an epoch in theology, and roused the keenest controversy amongst Catholics for more than a century. The controversy turned on predestination as well as grace, for Molinists[1] held (1) that sufficient grace became efficacious simply by the free consent of the will which corresponded to it; (2) that God predestined those who He foresaw would consent to grace, so that predestination was an effect of God's prevision that His creatures would consent, not vice versâ.[1]

[1] We say Molinists in deference to usage, though the name is really inaccurate. Lessius held proposition (2). Molina, on the contrary, "doctrinam gratiæ congruæ una cum prædestinatione ante prævisa merita et bonorum operum praedefinitionem adumbravit." Schneemann, Controversiarum de divinæ gratiæ liberique arbitrii concordia initia et progressus, p. 237.

In 1594 Clement VIII. intimated that he reserved the decision of the controversy to himself, and in November 1597 the famous Congregations de Auxiliis—i.e. concerning the helps or assistance of grace—were instituted for the examination of the question. The congregation consisted of eight consultors (of these eight two were absent, and were replaced by three new members), of whom all except two condemned Molina's book after considering it for little more than two months. They repeated this adverse sentence after a second consultation. Molina begged to be heard in his own defence, and accordingly the Pope ordered that colloquies should be held, in which the generals of both orders and the great Cardinal Bellarmin took part. The limits of the question were seriously narrowed in these colloquies, for the Jesuits refused to commit themselves to the opinions of Molina and Lessius on predestination, and the dispute was confined to the efficacity of grace. In 1600 Cardinal Madrucci, who presided at the conferences, died, and the conferences themselves ended without definite result. Once more Molina's book was submitted to a congregation on which two Jesuits and two Dominicans sat, and twenty propositions contained in it were censured by a majority of the members. From 1602 to 1606 congregations were held in the Vatican before Clement VIII. and Paul V. The Dominicans were represented by Didacus Alvarez and Thomas of Lemos, the Jesuits during the first nine sessions by the learned and pious Gregory of Valentia, and later by Arrubal, Bastida, and De Salas. The Spanish Court pressed for the condemnation of the Jesuits, who had offended Spanish prejudices and selfishness by espousing the cause of Henri IV. in France. It has been alleged that Clement VIII., shortly before his death in 1605, had prepared a bull condemning Molina, but this supposed fact has never been proved. In any case the bull was not promulgated, and the congregations, which met sixty-eight times under Clement, held twelve more sessions under Paul V. On August 28, 1607, the latter Pope convoked the College of Cardinals (excluding, however, those who had been consultors or secretaries of the congregation), and handed an encyclical to the generals of the Dominicans and Jesuits, which they in turn were to communicate to the provincials. The theologians of each party were allowed to hold and teach their respective opinions, provided they did not stigmatise their opponents with theological censures Urban VIII. and Clement XII. declared themselves in the same sense.

In 1613 Aquaviva, general of the Jesuits, required the members of his order to teach the doctrine on grace known as Congruism, and defended by Bellarmin, Suarez, and others as distinct from the doctrine of Molina, Lessius, Becanus, &c., known as Molinism (but see Schneemann, p. 302 seq.). It is scarcely necessary to add that the Molinist and Congruist theories are held by many theologians who are not Jesuits, just as the so-called Thomist doctrine is accepted by many besides the Dominicans.

All the large courses of dogmatic theology published during the seventeenth and earlier part of the eighteenth century enter fully into the controversies on grace. Santamour and other writers inclined to Jansenism published acts of the Congregations de Auxiliis, attributing them to Pegna, Coronell, and De Lemos, along with a constitution said to have been drawn up, but never promulgated, by Paul V., in condemnation of Molinism. The Pope is said to have abstained from promulgating this constitution because the Jesuits at the time were suffering for their obedience to the interdict issued by Paul V. against Venice. But in 1654 Innocent X. declared that no faith was to be given to these documents. In spite of this, the Dominican Hyacinth Serry compiled a history of the controversy, drawn in great measure from the spurious Acts and full of bitter attacks on the Jesuits. It was published at Louvain early in the last century. In reply, the Jesuit Livinus Meyer, under the pseudonym of Theodore Eleutherius, wrote his 'Historia Controversiarum de div. gratiæ auxilio sub S. P. Sixto V., Clemente VIII., et Paulo V." (Antwerp, 1705). A Bavarian Carmelite, Alexander a Sto. Johanne, in his continuation of Fleury, repeated the charges of Serry, and was answered in the Latin treatise of the ex-Jesuit Mangold, "Reflexions on Fr. Alexander's Continuation of Fleury." See also Mannhart, "De ingenua indole gratiæ efficacis," in Zaccaria's "Thesaurus," tom. v., and Schneemann's treatise quoted above.

[1] On the Congruist and Thomist theories, God, apart from all prevision of merit or demerit, determines who are to be saved, and then gives to the elect efficacious grace by which they freely merit their salvation.

GRACE AT MEALS. In this expression "grace" represents the Latin gratiæ, thanks (see Matt. xv. 36; Mark viii. 6; John vi. 11); but it also covers the notion of benedictio, blessing (Matt. xiv. 19; Mark vi. 41; Luke ix. 16); hence the Italian equivalent to "saying grace," is "benedire la tavola." In the passages above cited, and also in other places, our Lord sets us the example of praying for the blessing of God on the daily bread which He gives us, and giving Him thanks for what He thus provides, both before and after partaking of it. Christians have from the first complied with this teaching. "Whether you eat or drink," says St. Paul (1 Cor. x. 31), "or whatsoever else you do, do all to the glory of God"; and this precept is further developed in Col. iii. 17: "Whatsoever you do in word or in work, all things do ye in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, giving thanks to God and the Father by Him." Compare also 1 Thess. v. 18, and 1 Tim. iv. 3. Many of the Fathers—e.g. Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, St. Cyprian, St. John Chrysostom, and St. Basil—enjoin the punctual performance of this duty. St. Basil says,[1] "Let prayers be said before taking food, in meet acknowledgment of the gifts of God, both of those which He is now giving, and of those which He has put in store for the future. Let prayers be said after food, containing a return of thanks for the things given, and request for those promised." A variety of specimens of early graces are given in the Gelasian Sacramentary, which dates from the end of the fifth century. In the Apostolical Constitutions as given in Bunsen's "Hippolytus" (§ 21), meals in the church are spoken of, of which the bishop is always to be ready to partake along with the faithful, and at which he is to distribute a portion of the bread among those present, "for a blessing," before they begin to eat. This custom still prevails in the East, and a relic of it survives in the eulogies or pain bénit of certain French churches. The Constitutions also say, "Everything which they shall eat they shall give thanks to God for."[1] (Smith and Cheetham, art. by Scudamore.)

[1] Ep. ii. ad. Greg. Naz. (quoted in Mr. Scudamore's art. Dict. of Christ. Antiq.)

GRADUAL. An antiphon sung after the Epistle, and so called either because it used to be sung on the altar steps, or because it was sung while the deacon ascended the steps of the ambo to sing the Gospel. It is also called "responsory," because it answers to the Epistle, or because sung antiphonally. The "Liber Pontificalis," in the Life of Celestine I., attributes its origin to that Pope; others refer its introduction to Gregory the Great. It is omitted in Lent. (From Benedict XIV. "De Missa.")

GRADUAL PSALMS. A title given to Psalms cxx.–cxxxiv. in the Hebrew—cxix.–cxxxiii. in the Vulgate numeration.[2] All these Psalms have much in common. All except Ps. cxxxii. are short; the same tone of joyful trust in God's protection runs through them all; and although some of them (viz. Ps. cxxii., cxxiv., cxxxi., cxxxiii.) are ascribed to David, cxxvii. to Solomon, it is pretty plain that they all belong to the early period of the return from the exile.

The Latin "canticum graduum" is a translation of the Hebrew שִׁיר הַמַּעֲלוֹת (in cxxi. לַמַּעֲלוֹת), which occurs in the inscriptions. The LXX have ᾠδὴ ἀναβαθμῶν. But it is impossible to say for certain what the title means. The following are the chief attempts at solving the problem.

(1) The oldest explanation given by Jewish and Christian scholars, and implied perhaps in the LXX translation, is that the psalms were so called because sung on the fifteen steps which led from the court of the men to that of the women. According to the Talmud, two priests were stationed on the evening of the first day of the Feast of Tabernacles at the top of the steps with trumpets, while the Levites sang the psalms on the steps (according to a later tradition one psalm on each step). We have no historical evidence apart from the Talmud for such a custom; the steps most likely did not exist till Herod's time; and there is strong reason to suspect that the custom was imagined to account for the title of the psalms.

(2) Others have suggested that the psalms were sung by the exiles in returning or "going up" from Babylon, so that the word translated "graduum" would answer to the Greek ἀναβάσεις. This explanation was adopted, partially at least, by the Syriac translator, and seems to have been in the mind of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion when they used ἀναβάσεις to render מַעֲלוֹת. This view was advocated by Chrysostom and Theodoret among the Fathers, as well as by modern scholars of name. No doubt the words מַעֲלָה מִבָּבֶל do occur in Esdras vii. 9, in the sense of return, or ἀνάβασις, from Babel. But the plural number in מַעֲלוֹת retained in the Vulgate "graduum" is against this interpretation; and, besides, Ps. cxxii. implies that the exile was over some considerable time, and the Temple and city rebuilt.

(3) Closely allied with the foregoing is another explanation adopted by many great scholars—e.g. by Eichhorn, Maurer, Hengstenberg, Keil, Hupfeld, Kuenen, &c.—and which has very much to recommend it. They suppose that these psalms were sung during the "goings up" or pilgrimages to Jerusalem for the great annual feasts. This account satisfies the laws of grammatical usage (e.g. it accounts for the use of the plural), and is perfectly consistent with the contents of the psalms in question. We may reasonably conjecture that some of the psalms were actually written for the pilgrims, while others were placed in this collection because they dealt with subjects or expressed feelings which had a powerful attraction for the pious Israelite in general, and so for the pilgrim in particular. "Thus Ps. cxx.–cxxii., Ps. cxxxiii., cxxxiv. (i.e. the first and the last songs in the collection) point directly to the pilgrimages; Ps. cxxiv., cxxvi., cxxviii., cxxix., cxxxii., treat of subjects more or less connected therewith; lastly, Ps. cxxiii., cxxv., cxxvii., cxxx., cxxxi., are more general, but at the same time contain nothing which makes their incorporation in a 'petit psautier des pèlerins du second temple' inexplicable or even strange."

We add, for the sake of completeness, two other explanations. Gesenius, followed by De Wette, Winer, Delitzsch, &c., suggested that the name described the ascending rhythm of the psalms, for the sense goes on progressively, and the first or last words of a preceding are often repeated at the beginning of a subsequent sentence. It is scarcely fair to urge against this view that the same rhythm is found in the song of Deborah, and in Isa. xxvi. 5, 6. It is, however, a strong objection that this ascending rhythm is not found at all in Ps. cxxvii.–cxxxiv.; and is, to say the least, not strongly marked in Ps. cxxv. Besides, this explanation will not suit the inscription of Ps. cxxi.—viz. a song "for ascents" not "of ascents:" "gradibus," not "graduum" (לַמַּעֲלוֹת).

Fürst's theory, given in his Concordance and in his Lexicon (sub voc. מַעֲלָה), may be dismissed in a single sentence. He translates the titles "songs of excellence," a meaning which is not justified by usage, which is unlikely on the face of it, and which leaves the plural number unexplained. (Chiefly from the essay in Hupfeld's "Commentary on the Psalms," vol. iv. p. 274 seq., and from Kuenen, "Historisch-kritisch Onderzoek naar het Onstaan en de Verzameling van de Boeken des Ouden Verbonds," vol. iii., p. 218 seq.: the words in inverted commas are from the latter author.)

We may now pass on to the use of the Gradual Psalms in the Christian Church. The Fathers, as well as later Catholic writers, found various mystical meanings in the number fifteen, and regarded these Psalms as marking the steps by which the soul ascends to God. The Breviary divides the Gradual Psalms into three sets of five each, the first five ending with the common conclusion "Requiem æternam dona eis, Domine," and with a prayer for the dead, while each of the remaining psalms ends with the "Gloria Patri," and each of the remaining sets with a collect. This arrangement and the practice of reciting these psalms before matins are mentioned by Radulphus, a contemporary of Innocent III. At one time the Gradual Psalms were said before matins every day in Lent, but Pius V. limited the recitation to all Wednesdays in that season, excepting Wednesday in Holy Week, and days on which an office of nine lessons occurs. Moreover, Pius V. made the private recitation a matter of devotion, not of precept. He attached an indulgence of fifty days to the devout repetition. When, however, office is said in choir, the obligation of reciting the Gradual Psalms still continues, as appears from the Constitution of Pius V. on the Breviary as interpreted by various decisions of the Congregation of Rites. (From Gavantus, sect. 9, cap. 2.)

GREEK [SCHISMATIC] CHURCH. Under this title we include all those Christians who, being separated from the communion of the Pope, acknowledge the primacy of the Patriarch of Constantinople. The Russian Church, however, which is really Greek in the sense of the above definition, we put aside for the present, reserving our account of it for another article. At one time, as everybody knows, the Greek Churches were in full communion with the Holy See. We begin, therefore, with the history of the schism and of the origin of the Greek Church as an independent body.

Ignatius, a member of the imperial family and a monk, was made Patriarch of Constantinople in 846 or 847, during the reign of Theodora. When Theodora's son Michael III., known as Michael the Drunken, began to reign, he fell entirely under the influence of his uncle Bardus, a profligate of the most abandoned character, who lived in sin with his own stepdaughter. On the feast of the Epiphany 857 Ignatius refused to give Bardus communion, and further offended him by declining to clothe Theodora and her daughters against their will with the religious habit. Accordingly Ignatius was banished, and in 858 Photius was consecrated Patriarch in his place. Photius was the most learned man of his time, among the most learned of any time—as his Bibliotheca (or μυριοβίβλιον, as he entitled it, consisting of extracts from 280 books which he had read) still remains to testify. But he was ambitious and unscrupulous. His consecration was utterly uncanonical. For, first, Ignatius, a pious and virtuous man, was the lawful patriarch; next, Photius, who was a layman at the time of his election, was promoted to the episcopate within six days; and, lastly, he was consecrated by a bishop who was himself under sentence of deposition.

This violent change in the government of the Church caused discontent among the clergy and people, and in order to quiet them, the Emperor Michael sent ambassadors with costly presents to Pope Nicholas I., in order to secure his approbation. In spite of false statements made by the ambassadors, the Pope refused to decide till he had investigated the matter, and for this purpose despatched two legates to Constantinople. Those legates, yielding to bribery or to threats, confirmed the deposition of Ignatius on the ground that he had been elected through the undue influence of Theodora, and acknowledged the jurisdiction of Photius. This took place in a synod at Constantinople, held in 863, but the Pope remained inflexible. He sent word to the Eastern bishops that he condemned both the deposition of Ignatius and the usurpation of Photius, and in the same year, 863, he deposed the latter from the office into which he had intruded.

Three years later Bardus was murdered by the army, but the schism which he had originated still continued; nay, fresh causes of quarrel arose. The Bulgarians, a Slav people, had been converted in the middle of the ninth century by the Greek teachers, St. Cyril and St. Methodius. Some time later, when Cyril and Methodius had gone to the Moravians and Bohemians, the Bulgarian king, Michael, sent envoys to Pope Nicholas desiring information on various points. Nicholas sent Latin missionaries to the country, and the Roman missionary bishops re-confirmed all those who had received Confirmation from Greek priests, denying that Photius, who was himself without real jurisdiction, could empower his priests to confirm. In 867 Photius, now more embittered than ever, convoked a council in the imperial city, and delivered sentence of deposition and excommunication against the Pope. Further, he accused the Latin Church of heresy for adding the words "Filioque" to the Nicene Creed, and attacked the discipline and usages of the Latins, particularly their practice of fasting on Saturday, their use of milk and cheese on fasting days, and the enforced celibacy of their clergy.

Scarcely had Photius issued his pretended deposition of the Pope, when he himself was removed from office by the new emperor, Basil, who had murdered Michael; and Ignatius was reinstated. The new pope, Hadrian II., worked zealously for the restoration of peace; the Eighth General Council met at Constantinople in 869, and then the excommunication of Photius was recognised, though his followers were admitted to the communion of the Church if they consented to express their sorrow for the past. Thus Greeks and Latins were again united; but Bulgaria was still the cause of strife, and in 872 Pope John VIII. threatened Ignatius with excommunication if he insisted on regarding it as subject to his see. Peace was not actually broken till 878, when, after the death of Ignatius, Photius again ascended the patriarchal throne of Constantinople. John VIII. would not acknowledge him, except on condition that he begged pardon for his offences and renounced his claim to jurisdiction in Bulgaria. Once more Photius circumvented legates sent from Rome. At a Council of Constantinople in 879 he contrived to evade the Pope's demand for apology, and those who made any addition to the Nicene Creed were anathematised. The Pope, however, was not to be deceived. He despatched the Roman deacon Marinus (afterwards Pope) to Constantinople, and he annulled the acts of the late synod. The excommunication of Photius was reiterated by Marinus, John's successor, as well as by Pope Hadrian III. Things took a new turn under Pope Stephen V. (885–891). The Emperor Basil died in 886, and his successor, Leo VI., "the Philosopher," banished Photius, who died in 891. The schism was healed after a fashion, but the ashes of the old dissension were still smouldering, and it only needed a new Photius to kindle them into flame.
